It is well said, in every sense, that a man's religion is the chief fact with regard to him. A man's, or a nation of men's. By religion I do not mean here the church-creed which he professes, the articles of faith which he will sign and, in words or otherwise, assert; not this wholly, in many cases not this at all. We see men of all kinds of professed creeds attain to almost all degrees of worth or worthlessness under each or any of them. This is not what I call religion, this profession and assertion; which is often only a profession and assertion from the outworks of the man, from the mere argumentative region of him, if even so deep as that. But the thing a man does practically believe, (and this is often enough without asserting it even to himself, much less to others;) the thing a man does practically lay to heart, and know for certain, concerning his vital relations to this mysterious Universe, and his duty and destiny there, that is in all cases the primary thing for him, and creatively determines all the rest. This is his religion; or, it may be, his mere scepticism and no-religion: the manner it is in which he feels himself to be spiritually related to the Unseen World or No-world; and I say, if you tell me what that is, you tell me to a very great extent what the man is, what the kind of things he will do. Of a man or of a nation, we inquire, first of all, What religion they had? Was it Heathenism, plurality of gods, mere sensuous representation of this Mystery of Life, and for chief recognised element therein Physical Force? Was it Christianity; faith in an Invisible, not as real only, but as the only reality; Time, through every meanest moment of it, resting on Eternity; Pagan empire of Force displaced by a nobler supremacy, that of Holiness? Was it Scepticism, uncertainty and inquiry whether there was an Unseen World, any Mystery of Life except a mad one;—doubt as to all this, or perhaps unbelief and flat denial? Answering of this question is giving us the soul of the history of the man or nation. The thoughts they had were the parents of their actions they did; their feelings were parents of their thoughts; it was the unseen spiritual in them that determined the outward and actual: their religion, as I say, was the great fact about them. In these Discourses, limited as we are, it will be good to direct our survey chiefly to that religious phase of the matter. That once known well, all is known. We have chosen as the first Hero in our series, Odin the central figure of Scandinavian Paganism; an emblem to us of a most extensive province of things. Let us look, for a little, at the Hero as Divinity, the oldest primary form of Heroism.

Surely it seems a very strange-looking thing this Paganism; almost inconceivable to us in these days. A bewildering, inextricable jungle of delusions, confusions, falsehoods, and absurdities, covering the whole field of life there. A thing that fills us with astonishment, almost, if it were possible, with incredulity,—for truly it is not easy to understand that sane men could ever calmly, with their eyes open, believe and live by such a set of doctrines. That men should have worshipped their poor fellow-man as a God, and not him only, but stocks and stones, and all manner of animate or inanimate objects; and fashioned for themselves such a distracted chaos of hallucinations by way of Theory of the Universe: all this looks like an incredible fable. Nevertheless it is a clear fact that they did it. Such hideous inextricable jungle of misworships, misbeliefs, men,

This is strange. Yes, we may pause in sorrow and silence over the depths of darkness that are in man; if we rejoice in the heights of purer vision he has attained to. Such things were and are in man; in all men; in us, too.

Some speculators have a short way of accounting for the Pagan religion: mere quackery, priestcraft, and dupery, say they; no sane man ever did believe it,—merely contrived to persuade other men, not worthy of the name of sane, to believe it! It will be often our duty to protest against this sort of hypothesis about men's doings and history; and I here, on the very threshold, protest against it in reference to Paganism, and to all other isms by which man has ever for a length of time striven to walk in this world. They have all had a truth in them; or men would not have taken them up. Quackery and dupery do abound; in religions, above all in the more advanced decaying stages of religions, they have fearfully abounded: but quackery was never the originating influence in such things; it was not the health and life of such things, but their disease, the sure precursor of their being about to die! Let us never forget this. It seems to me a most mournful hypothesis, that of quackery giving birth to any faith even in savage men. Quackery gives birth to nothing; gives death to all. We shall not see into the true heart of anything, if we look merely at the quackeries of it; if we do not reject the quackeries altogether; as mere diseases, corruptions, with which our and all men's sole duty is to have done with them, to sweep them out of our thoughts as out of our practice. Man everywhere is the born enemy of lies. I find Grand Lamaism itself to have a kind of truth in it. Read the candid, clear-sighted, rather sceptical Mr. Hamilton's Travels into that country, and see. They have their belief, these poor Thibet people, that Providence sends down always an Incarnation of Himself into every generation. At bottom some belief in a kind of Pope! At bottom still better, belief that there is a Greatest Man; that he is discoverable; that, once discovered, we ought to treat him with an obedience which knows no bounds! This is the truth of Grand Lamaism; the "discoverability" is the only error here. The Thibet Priests have methods of their own of discovering what Man is Greatest, fit to be supreme over them. Bad methods; but are they so much worse than our methods,—of understanding him to be always the eldest-born of a certain genealogy? Alas, it is a difficult thing to find good methods for!—We shall begin to have a chance for understanding Paganism, when we first admit that to its followers it was, at one time, earnestly true. Let us consider it very certain that men did believe in Paganism; men with open eyes, sound senses, men made altogether like ourselves; that we, had we been there, should have believed in it. Ask now, What Paganism could have been?

Another theory, somewhat more respectable, attributes such things to Allegory. It was a play of poetic minds, say these theorists: a shadowing forth, in allegorical fable, in personification, and visual form, of what such poetic minds had known and felt of this Universe. Which agrees, add they, with a primary law of human nature, still everywhere observable at work, though in less important things, that what a man feels intensely, he struggles to speak out of him, to see represented before him in visual shape, and as if with a kind of life and historical reality in it. Now, doubtless, there is such a law, and it is one of the deepest in human nature; neither need we doubt that it did operate fundamentally in this business. The hypothesis which ascribes Paganism wholly or mostly to this agency, I call a little more respectable; but I cannot yet call it the true hypothesis. Think, would we believe, and take with us as our life-guidance, an allegory, a poetic sport! Not sport yet earnest is what we should require. It is a most earnest thing to be alive in this world; to die is not sport for a man. Man's life never was a sport to him; it was a stern reality, altogether a serious matter to be alive! I find, therefore, that though these Allegory-theorists are on the way toward truth in this matter, they have not reached it either. Pagan Religion is indeed an Allegory, a Symbol of what men felt and knew about the Universe; and all Religions are Symbols of that, altering always as that alters: but it seems to me a radical perversion, and even inversion, of the business, to put that forward as the origin and moving cause, when it was rather the result and termination. To get beautiful allegories, a perfect poetic symbol, was not the want of men; but to know what they were to believe about this Universe, what course they were to steer in it; what, in this mysterious Life of theirs, they had to hope and to fear, to do and to forbear doing. The Pilgrim's Progress is an Allegory, and a beautiful, just, and serious one: but consider whether Bunyan's Allegory could have preceded the Faith it symbolizes! The Faith had to be already there, standing believed by everybody;—of which the Allegory could then become a shadow; and, with all its seriousness, we may say a poetical shadow, a mere play of the Fancy, in comparison with that awful Fact and scientific certainty, which it poetically strives to emblem. The Allegory is the product of the certainty, not the producer of it; not in Bunyan's nor in any other case. For Paganism, therefore, we have still to inquire, Whence came that scientific certainty, the parent of such a bewildered heap of allegories, errors, and confusions? How was it, what was it?

Surely it were a foolish attempt to pretend "explaining," in this place, or in any place, such a phenomenon as that far-distant, distracted, cloudy, imbroglia of Paganism—more like a cloudfield, than a distant continent of firm land and facts! It is no longer a reality, yet it was one. We ought to understand that this seeming cloudfield was once a reality; that not poetic allegory, least of all that dupery and deception was the origin of it. Men, I say, never did believe idle songs, never risked their soul's life on allegories: men, in all times, especially in early earnest times, have had an instinct for detecting quacks, for detesting quacks. Let us try, leaving out both the quack-theory and the allegory one, and listening with affectionate attention to that far-off confused rumor of the Pagan ages, we cannot ascertain so much as this at least, That there was a kind of fact at the heart of them; that they too were not mendacious and distracted, but in their own poor way true and sane!

You remember that fancy of Aristotle's, of a man who had grown to maturity in some dark distance, and was brought on a sudden into the upper air to see the sun rise. This would be a man like some of the Philosophers, his eyes astonishment at the sight we daily witness with indifference! With the free open sense of a child, yet with the ripe faculty of a man, his whole heart would be kindled by that sight, he would discern it well to be Godlike, his soul would fall down in worship before it. Now, just such a childlike greatness was in the primitive nations. The first Pagan Thinker among rude men, the first man that began to think, was precisely the child-man of Aristotle. Simple, open as a child, yet with the depth and strength of a man. Nature had as yet no name to him; he had not yet united under a name the infinite variety of sights, sounds, shapes and motions, which we now collectively name Universe, Nature, or the like—and so with a name dismiss it from us. To the wild, deep-hearted man all was yet new, unveiled under names or formulas; it stood naked, flashing in on him there, beautiful, awful, unspeakable. Nature was to this man, what to the Thinker and Prophet it forever is, preternatural. This green, flowery, rock-built earth, the trees, the mountains, rivers, many-sounding seas;—that great deep sea of azure that swims overhead; the winds sweeping through it; the black cloud fashioning itself together, now pouring out fire, now hail and rain; what is it? Ay, what? At bottom we do not yet know; we can never know at all. It is not by our superior insight that we escape the difficulty; it is by our superior levity, our inattention, our want of insight. It is by not thinking that we cease to wonder at it. Hardened round us, encasing wholly every notion we form, is a wrappage of traditions, hearsays, mere words. We call that fire of the black thunder-cloud "electricity," and lecture learnedly about it, and grind the like of it out of glass and silk; but what is it? What made it? Whence comes it? Whither goes it? Science has done much for us; but it is a poor science that would hide from us the great, deep, sacred infinitude of Nescience, whither we can never penetrate, on which all science swims as a mere superficial film. This world, after all our science and sciences, is still a miracle; wonderful, inscrutable, magical and more, to whosoever will think of it.

That great mystery of Time, were there no other; the illimitable, silent, never-resting thing called Time, rolling, rushing on, swift, silent, like an all-embracing ocean-tide, on which we and all the Universe swim like exhalations, like apparitions which are, and then are not: this is for ever very literally a miracle; a thing to strike us dumb—for we have no word to speak about it. This Universe—ah me! what could the wild man know of it; what can we yet know? That it is a Force, and thousandfold Complexity of Forces; a Force which is not we. That is all; it is not we, it is altogether different from us. Force, Force, everywhere Force; we ourselves Force in the centre of that. "There is not a leaf rotting on the highway but has Force in it: how else could it rot?" Nay surely to the Atheistic Thinker, if such a one were possible, it must be a miracle too, this huge illimitable whirlwind Force, which envelopes us here; never-resting whirlwind, high as immensity, old as Eternity. What is it? God's Creation, the religious people answer; it is the Almighty God's! Atheistic science babbles poorly of it, with scientific nomenclatures, experiments and what not, as if it were a poor dead thing to be bottled up in Leyden jars, and sold over counters: but the natural sense of man, in all times, if he will honestly apply his sense, proclaims it to be a living thing—ah, an unspeakable, godlike thing; toward which the best attitude for us, after never so much science, is awe, devout prostration and humility of soul; worship if not in words, then in silence.

But now I remark further: What in such a time as ours it requires a Prophet or a Poet to teach us, namely, the stripping off of those poor, undevout wrappings, nomenclatures and scientific hearsays—this, the ancient earnest soul, as yet unencumbered with these things, did for itself. The world, which is now divine only to the gifted, was then divine to whosoever would turn his eye upon it. He stood bare before it, face to face. "All was Godlike or God," Jean Paul still finds it so; the giant Jean Paul, who has power to escape out of hearsays: but then there were no hearsays. Canopus shining down over the desert, with its blue diamond brightness, (that wild, blue, spirit-like brightness, far brighter than we ever witness here,) would pierce into the heart of the wild Ishmaelitic man, whom it was guiding through the solitary waste there. To his wild heart, with all feelings in it, with no speech for any feeling, it might seem a little eye, that Canopus, glancing out on him from the great deep Eternity; revealing the inner Splendor to him. Cannot we understand how these men worshipped Canopus; became what we call Sabaeans, worshipping the stars? Such is to me the secret of all forms of Paganism. Worship is transcendent wonder; wonder for which there is now no limit or measure; that is worship. To these primeval men, all things, and everything they saw exist beside them were an emblem of the Godlike, of some God.

And look what perennial fibre of truth was in that. To us also, through every star, through every blade of grass, is not a God made visible, if we will open our minds and eyes? We do not worship in that way now: but is it not reckoned still a merit, proof of what we call a "poetic nature," that we recognise how every object has a divine beauty in it; how every object still verily is "a window through which we may look into infinitude itself?" He that can discern the loveliness of things, we call him Poet, Painter, Man of Genius, gifted, loveable. These poor Sabaeans did even what he does—in their own fashion. That they did it, in what fashion soever, was a merit: better than what the entirely stupid man did, what the horse and camel did—namely, nothing!

But now, if all things whatsoever that we look upon are emblems to us of the Highest God, I add that more so than any of them is man such an emblem. You have heard of St. Chrysostom's celebrated saying, in reference to the Shekinah, or Ark of Testimony, visible Revelation of God, among the Hebrews: "The true Shekinah is Man!" Yes, it is even so: this is no vain phrase; it is veritably so. The essence of our being, the mystery in us that calls itself "I,"—ah, what words have we for such things?—is a breath of Heaven; the Highest Being reveals himself in man. This body, these faculties, this life of ours, is it not all as a vesture for that Unnamed? "There is but one temple in the Universe," says the devout Novallis, "and that is the Body of Man." Nothing is holier than that high form. Bending before men is a reverence done to this Revelation in the Flesh. We touch Heaven when we lay our hand on a human body!—This sounds much like a mere flourish of rhetic; but it is not so. If well meditated, it will turn out to be a scientific fact; the expression, in such words as can be had, of the actual truth of the thing. We are the miracle of miracles—the great inscrutable mystery of God. We cannot understand it, we know not how to speak of it; but we may feel and know, if we like, that it is verily so.

Well; these truths were once more readily felt than now. The young generations of the world, who had in them the freshness of young children, and yet the depth of earnest men, who did not think that they had finished off all things in Heaven and Earth by merely giving them scientific names, but had to gaze direct at them there, with awe and wonder: they felt better what of divinity is in man and Nature;—they, without being mad, could worship Nature, and man more than anything else in Nature. Worship, that is, as I said above, admire without limit: this, in the full use of their faculties, with all sincerity of heart, they could do. I consider Hero-worship to be the grand modifying element in that ancient system of thought. What I called the perplexed jungle of Paganism sprang, we may say, out of many roots: every admiration, adoration of a star or natural object, was a root or fibre of a root; but Hero-worship is the deepest root of all; the tap-root, from which in a great degree all the rest were nourished and grown.

And now if worship even of a star had some meaning in it, how much more might that of a Hero! Worship of a Hero is transcendent admiration of a Great Man. I say great men are still admirable; I say there is, at bottom, nothing else admirable! No nobler feeling than this of admiration for one higher than himself dwells in the breast of man. It is to this hour, and at all hours, the vivifying influence in man's life. Religion I find stand upon it; not Paganism only, but far higher and truer religions,—all religion hitherto known. Hero-worship, heartfelt, prostrate admiration, submission, burning, boundless, for a noblest godlike Form of Man,—is not that the germ of Christianity itself? The greatest of all Heroes is One—whom we do not name here! Let sacred silence meditate that sacred matter; you will find it the ultimate perfection of a principle extant throughout man's whole history on earth.

Or coming into lower, less unspeakable provinces, is not all Loyalty akin to religious Faith also? Faith is loyalty to some inspired Teacher, some spiritual Hero. And what therefore is loyalty proper, the life-breath of all society, but an effluence of Hero-worship, submissive admiration for the truly great? Society is founded on Hero-worship. All dignities of rank, on which human association rests, are what we may call a Heroarchy (Government of Heroes)—or a Hierarchy, for it is "sacred" enough withal! The Duke means Duz, Leader; King is Konning, Kan-ning, Man that knows or can. Society everywhere is some representation, not insupportably inaccurate, of a graduated Worship of Heroes;—reverence and obedience done to men really great and wise. Not insupportably inaccurate, I say! They are all as bank-notes, these social dignitaries, all representing gold;—and several of them, alas, always are forged notes. We can do with some forged, false notes; with a good many even; but not with all, or the most of them forged! No: there have to come revolutions then; cries of Democracy, Liberty and Equality, and I know not what:—the notes being all false, and no gold to be had for them, people take to crying in their despair that there is no gold, that there never was any!—"Gold," Hero-worship, is nevertheless, as it was always and everywhere, and cannot cease till man himself ceases.

I am well aware that in these days of Hero-worship, the thing I call Hero-worship, professes to have gone out, and finally ceased. This, for reasons which it will be worth while some time to inquire into, is an age that as it were denies the existence of great men; denies the desirableness of great men. Show our critics a great man, a Luther for example, they begin to what they call "account" for him; not to worship him, but take the dimensions of him,—and bring him out to be a little kind of man! He was the "creature of the Time," they say; the Time called him forth, the Time did everything, he nothing—but what we the little critic could have done too! This seems to me but melancholy work. The Time call forth? Alas, we have known Times call loudly enough for their great man; but not find him when they called! He was not there; Providence had not sent him; the Time, calling its loudest, had to go down to confusion and wreck because he would not come when called. For if we will think of it, no Time need have gone to ruin, could it have found a man great enough, a man wise and good enough: wisdom to discern truly what the Time wanted, valor to lead it on the right road thither; these are the salvation of any Time. But I liken common, languid Times, with their unbelief, distress, perplexity, with their languid doubting characters and embarrassed circumstances, impotently crumbling down into ever worse distress toward final ruin;—all this I liken to dry, dead fuel, waiting for the lightning out of Heaven that shall kindle it. The great man, with his free force direct out of God's own hand, is the lightning. His word is the wise healing word which all can believe in. All blazes round him now, when he has once struck on it, into fire like his own. The dry mouldering sticks are thought to have called him forth. They did want him greatly; but as to calling him forth!—Those are critics of small vision, I think, who cry: "See, it is not the sticks that made the fire!" No sadder proof can be given by a man of his own littleness than disbelief in great men. There is no sadder symptom of a generation than such general blindness to the spiritual lightning, with faith only in the heap of barren, dead fuel. It is the last consummation of unbelief. In all epochs of the world's history, we shall find the Great Man to have been the indispensable saviour of his epoch;—the lightning, without which the fuel never would have burnt. The History of the World, I said already, was the Biography of Great Men.

Such small critics do what they can to promote unbelief and universal spiritual paralysis; but happily they cannot always completely succeed. In all times it is possible for a man to arise great enough to feel that they and their doctrines are chimeras and cobwebs. And what is notable, in no time whatever can they entirely eradicate out of living men's hearts a certain altogether peculiar reverence for Great Men; genuine admiration, loyalty, adoration, however dim and perverted it may be. Hero-worship endures forever while man endures. Boswell venerates his Johnson, right truly even in the Eighteenth century. The unbelieving French believe in their Voltaire; and burst out round him into very curious Hero-worship, in that last act of his life, when they "stifle him under roses." It has always seemed to me extremely curious this of Voltaire. Truly, if Christianity be the highest instance of Hero-worship, then we may find here in Voltairism one of the lowest! He whose life was that of a kind of Antichrist, does again on this side exhibit a curious contrast. No people ever were so little prone to admire at all as those French of Voltaire. Persiflage was the character of their whole mind; adoration had nowhere a place in it. Yet see! The old man of Ferney comes up to Paris; an old, tottering, infirm man of eighty-four years. They feel that he too is a kind of Hero; that he has spent his life in opposing error and injustice, delivering Calases, unmasking hypocrites in high places;—in short that he too, though in a strange way, has fought like a valiant man. They feel withal that, if persiflage be the great thing, there never was such a persifleur. He is the realized ideal of every one of them; the thing they are all wanting to be; of all Frenchmen the most French. He is properly their god,—such god as they are fit for. Accordingly all persons, from the Queen Antoinette to the Douanier at the Porte St. Denis, do they not worship him? People of quality disguise themselves as tavern-waiters. The Maitre de Poste, with a broad oath, orders his Postilion: "Va bon train; thou art driving M. de Voltaire." At Paris his carriage is "the nucleus of a comet, whose train fills whole streets." The ladies pluck a hair or two from his fur, to keep it as a sacred relic. There was nothing highest, beautifullest, noblest in all France, that did not feel this man to be higher, beautifullest, nobler.

Yes, from Norse Odin to English Samuel Johnson, from the divine Founder of Christianity to the whitered Pontiff of Encyclopedism, in all times and places, the Hero has been worshipped. It will ever be so. We all love great men, love, venerate and bow down submissive before great men: nay, can we honestly bow down to anything else? Ah, does not every true man feel that he is himself made higher by doing reverence to what is really above him? No nobler or more blessed feeling dwells in man's heart. And to me it is very cheering to consider that no sceptical logic, or general triviality, insincerity and aridity of any Time and its influences can destroy this noble inborn loyalty and worship that is in man. In times of unbelief, which soon have to become times of revolution, much down-rushing, sorrowful decay and ruin is visible to everybody. For myself these days, I seem to see in this destructibility of Hero-worship the everlasting adamant lower than which the confused wreck of revolutionary things cannot fall. The confused wreck of things, crumbling and even crashing and tumbling all around us in these revolutionary ages, will get down so far; no farther. It is an eternal corner-stone, from which they begin to build themselves up again. That man, in some sense or other, worships Heroes; that we all of us reverence Great Men: this is, to me, the living rock amid all rushings down whatsoever;—the one fixed point in modern revolutionary history, otherwise as if bottomless and shoreless.

So much of truth, only under an ancient obsolete vesture, but the spirit of it still true, do I find in the Paganism of old nations. Nature is still divine, the revelation of the workings of God; the Hero is still worshipable: this, under poor cramped incipient forms, is what all Pagan religions have struggled, as they could, to set forth. I think Scandinavian Paganism, to us here, is more interesting than any other. It is, for one thing, the latest; it continued in these regions of Europe till the eleventh century; eight hundred years ago the Norwegians were still worshippers of Odin. It is interesting also as the creed of our fathers; the men whose blood still runs in our veins, whom doubtless we still resemble in so many ways. Strange: they did believe that, while we believe so differently. Let us look a little at this poor Norse creed, for many reasons. We have tolerable means to do it; for there is another point of interest in these Scandinavian mythologies: that they have been preserved so well.

In that strange island, Iceland—burst up, the geologists say, by fire from the bottom of the sea; a wild land of barrenness and lava; swallowed many months of every year in black tempests, yet with a wild gleaming of beauty in summer-time; towering up there, stern and grim, in the North Ocean; with its snow-jokuls, roaring geysers, sulphur pools and horrid volcanic chasms, like the waste chaotic battle-field of Frost and Fire—where of all places we least looked for Literature of written memorials, the record of these things was written down. On the seaboard of this wild land is a rim of grassy country, where cattle can subsist, and men by means of them and of what the sea yields; and it seems they were poetic men these, men who had deep thoughts in them, and uttered musical y their thoughts. Much would be lost had Iceland not been burst up from the sea, not been discovered by the Northmen! The old Norse Poets were many of them natives of Iceland.

Sæmund, one of the early Christian Priests there, who perhaps had a lingering fondness for Paganism, collected certain of their old Pagan songs, just about becoming obsolete then—Poems or Chants of a mythic, prophetic, mostly all of a religious character: this is what Norse critics call the Elder or Poetic Edda. Edda, a word of uncertain etymology, is thought to signify Ancestress. Snorro Sturleson, an Iceland gentleman, an extremely notable personage, educated by this Sæmund's grandson, took in hand next, near a century afterward, to put together, among several other books he wrote, a kind of Prose Synopsis of the whole Mythology; elucidated by new fragments of traditional verve. A work constructed really with great ingenuity, native talent, what one might call unconscious art; altogether a perspicuous, clear work, pleasant reading still: this is the Younger or Prose Edda. By these and the numerous other Sagas, mostly Icelandic, with the commentaries, Icelandic or not, which go on zealously in the North to this day, it is possible to gain some direct insight even yet; and see that old Norse system of Belief, as it were, face to face. Let us forget that it is erroneous Religion; let us look at it as old Thought, and try if we cannot sympathise with it somewhat.

The primary characteristic of this old Northland Mythology I find to be Impersonation of the visible workings of Nature. Earnest, simple recognition of the workings of Physical Nature, as a thing wholly miraculous, stupendous and divine. What we now lecture of as Science, they wondered at, and fell down in awe before, as Religion. The dark, hostile Powers of Nature they figure to themselves, "Jötuns," Giants, huge as shaggy beings of a demonic character. Frost, Fire, Sea-tempest; these are Jötuns. The friendly Powers again, as Summer-heat, the Sun, are Gods. The empire of this Universe is divided between these two; they dwell apart, in perennial internecine feud. The Gods dwell above in Asgard, the Garden of the Aesir or Divinities; Jötunheim, a distant, dark chaotic land, is the Home of the Jötuns.

Curious all this; and not idle or inane, if we will look at the foundation of it! The power of Fire, or Flame, for instance, which we designate by some trivial chemical name, thereby hiding from ourselves the essential character of wonder that dwells in it as in all things, is with these old Northmen, Loke, a most swift, subtle Demon, of the brood of the Jötuns. The savages of the Ladrone Islands too (say some Spanish voyagers,) thought Fire, which they never had seen before, was a devil or god, that bit you sharply when you touched it, and lived there upon dry wood. From us too, no Chemistry, if it had not Stupidity to help it, would hide that Flame is a wonder. What is Flame?—Frost the old Norse Seer discerns to be a monstrous Hoary Jötun, the Giant Thrym, Hrym; or Rime, the old word now nearly obsolete here, but still used in Scotland to signify hoar-frost. Rime was not then as now a dead chemical thing, but a living Jötun or Devil; the monstrous Jötun Rime drove home his Horses at night, sat "combing their names,"—which Horses were Hail-Clouds, or fleet Frost-winds. His Cows—No, not his, but a kinsman's, the Giant Hymir's Cows are Icebergs: this Hymir "looks at the rocks" with his devil-eye, and they split in the glance of it.

Thunder was not then mere Electricity, vitreous or resinous; it was the God Donner (Thunder) or Thor—God also of beneficent Summer-heat. The thunder was his wrath; the gathering of the black clouds is the drawing down of Thor's angry brows; the fire-bolt bursting out of Heaven is the all-rending Hammer flung from the hand of Thor: he urges his loud chariot over the mountain-tops—that is the peal: wrathful he "blows in his red beard;" that is the rustling stormblast before the thunder begin. Balder again, the White God, the beautiful, the just and benignant, (whom the early Christian Missionaries found to resemble Christ,) is the Sun—beautifullest of visible things; wondrous too, and divine still, after all our Astronomies and Almanacs! But perhaps the noblest god we hear tell of is one of whom Grimm the German Etymologist finds trace: the God Wunsch, or Wish. The God Wish; who could give us all that we wished! Is not this the sincerest and yet rudest voice of the spirit of man? The rudest ideal that man ever formed; which still shews itself in the latest forms of our spiritual culture. Higher considerations have to teach us that the God Wish is not the true God.

Of the other Gods or Jötuns I will mention only for etymology's sake, that Sea-tempest is the Jötun Aegir, a very dangerous Jötun; and now to this very day on our river Trent, as I learn, the Nottingham bargemen, when the river is in a certain flooded state, (a kind of backwater, or eddying swirl it has, very dangerous to them,) call it Aegir; they cry out, "Have a care, there is the Aegir coming!" Curious—that word surviving, like the peak of a submerged world! The oldest Nottingham bargemen had believed in the god Aegir. Indeed our English blood, too, in good part, is Danish, Norse; or rather, at bottom, Danish and Norse and Saxons have no distinction, except a superficial one—as of Heathen and Christian, or the like. But all over our Island we are mingled largely with Danes proper—from the incessant invasions there were; and this, of course, in a greater proportion along the east coast; and greatest of all, as I find, in the North Country. From the Humber upward, all over Scotland, the speech of the common people is still in a singular degree Icelandic; its Germanism has still a peculiar Norse tinge. They too are "Normans," Northmen—if that be any great beauty!

Of the chief god, Odin, we shall speak by and by. Mark at present so much—what the essence of Scandinavian, and indeed of all Paganism, is: a recognition of the forces of Nature as godlike, stupendous, personal agencies—as Gods and Demons. Not inconceivable to us. It is the infant Thought of man opening itself, with awe and wonder, on this ever-stupendous Universe. To me there is in the Norse System something very genuine, very great and manlike. A broad simplicity, rusticity, so very different from the light gracefulness of the old Greek Paganism, distinguishes this Scandinavian System. It is Thought—the genuine Thought of deep, rude, earnest minds, fairly open to the things about them—a face-to-face and heart-to-heart inspection of the things—the first characteristic of all good Thought in all times. Not graceful lightness, half-sport, as in the Greek Paganism; a certain homely truthfulness and rustic strength, a great rude sincerity, discloses itself here. It is strange, after our beautiful Apollo statues and clear smiling mythuses, to come down upon the Norse Gods 'brewing ale' to hold their feast with Aegir, the Sea-Jötun; sending out Thor to get the cauldron for them in the Jötun country; Thor, after many adventures, clapping the Pot on his head, like a huge hat, and walking off with it—quite lost in it, the ears of the Pot reaching down to his heels! A kind of vast hugeness—large, awkward gianthood—characterises that Norse System; enormous force, as yet altogether unruled, stalking helpless with large, uncertain strides. Consider only their primary myths of the Creation. The Gods, having got the Giant Ymer slain, a Giant made by "warm winds" and much confused work out of the conflict of Frost and Fire—determined on constructing a world with him. His blood made the Sea; his flesh was the Land, the Rocks his bones; of his eyebrows they formed Asgard their God-dwelling; his skull was the great blue vault of Immensity, and the brains of it became the Clouds. What a Hyper-Brobdingnagian business! Untamed Thought, great, giant-like, enormous—to be tamed in due time into the compact greatness, not giantlike, but godlike and stronger than gianthood, of the Shaksperes, the Goethes!—Spiritually as well as bodily these men are our progenitors.

I like, too, that representation they have of the Tree Igdrasil. All Life is figured by them as a Tree. Igdrasil, the Ash-tree of Existence, has its roots deep down in the kingdoms of Hela or Death; its trunk reaches up heaven-high, spreads its boughs over the whole Universe; it is the Tree of Existence. At the foot of it, in the Death-kingdom, sit Three Nornas, Fates—the Past, Present, Future; watering its roots from the Sacred Well. Its "boughs," with their buddings and disleafings—events, things suffered, things done, catastrophes—stretch through all lands and times. Is not every leaf of it a biography, every fibre there an act or word? Its boughs are Histories of Nations. The rustle of it is the noise of Human Existence, onward from of old. It grows there, the breath of Human Passion rustling through it—or stormiest, the stormwind howling through it like the voice of all the gods. It is Igdrasil, the Tree of Existence. It is the past, the present, and the future; what was done, what is doing, what will be done; "the infinite conjugation of the verb To do." Considering how human things circulate, each inextricably in communion with all—how the word I speak to you to-day is borrowed, not from Ulfila the Mosogoth only, but from all men since the first man began to speak—I find no similitude so true as this of a Tree. Beautiful; altogether beautiful and great. The "Machine of the Universe"—alas, do but think of that in contrast!

Well, it is strange enough this old Norse view of Nature; different enough from what we believe of Nature. Whence it specially came, one would not like to be compelled to say very minutely! One thing we may say: It came from the thoughts of Norse men;—from the thought, above all, of the first Norse man who had an original power of thinking. The first Norse "man of genius," as we should call him! Innumerable men had passed by, across this Universe, with a dumb, vague wonder, such as the very animals may feel; or with a painful, fruitlessly inquiring wonder, such as men only feel;—till the great Thinker came, the original man, the Seer; whose shaped spoken Thought awakes the slumbering capability of all into Thought. It is ever the way with the Thinker, the spiritual Hero. What he says, all men were not far from saying, were longing to say. The Thoughts of all start up, as from painful, enchanted sleep, round his Thought; answering to it, Yes, even so! Joyful to men as the dawning of day from night;—is it not, indeed, the awakening for them from no-being into being, from death into life? We still honor such a man; call him Poet, Genius, and so forth; but to these wild men he was a very magician, a worker of miraculous, unexpected blessing for them; a Prophet, a God!—Thought once awakened does not again slumber; unfolds itself into a System of Thought; grows, in man after man, generation after generation—till its full stature is reached, and such System of Thought can grow no farther, but must give place to another.

For the Norse people, the Man now named Odin, and Chief Norse God, was such a man. A Teacher, and Captain of soul and of body; a Hero, of worth immeasurable; admiration for whom, transcending the known bounds, became adoration. Has he not the power of articulate Thinking; and many other powers, as yet miraculous? So, with boundless gratitude, would the rude Norse heart feel. Has he not solved for them the Sphinx-enigma of this Universe; given assurance to them of their own destiny there. By him they know now what they have to do here, what to look for hereafter. Existence has become articulate, melodious by him; he first has made Life alive! We may call this Odin the origin of Norse Mythology: Odin, or whatever name the first Norse Thinker bore while he was a man among men. His view of the Universe once promulgated, a like view starts into being in all minds; grows, keeps ever growing, while it continues credible there. In all minds it lay written, but invisibly, as in sympathetic ink; at his word it starts into visibility in all. Nay, in every epoch of the world, the great event, parent of all others, is it not the arrival of a Thinker in the world?

One other thing we must not forget; it will explain, a little, the confusion of these Norse Eddas. They are not one coherent System of Thought; but properly the summation of several successive systems. All this of the old Norse Belief which is flung out for us, in one level of distance in the Edda, like a Picture painted on the same canvas, does not at all stand so in the reality. It stands rather at all manner of distances and depths, of successive generations since the Belief first began. All Scandinavian thinkers, since the first of them, contributed to the Scandinavian System of Thought; in ever new elaboration and addition, it is the combined work of them all. What history it had, how it changed from shape to shape, by one thinker's contribution after another, till it got to the full, final shape we see it under in the Edda, no man will now ever know: its Councils of Trebisond, Council of Trent, Athanasius, Dantes, Luthers, are sunk without echo in the dark night! Only that it had such a history we can all know. Wherever a thinker appeared, there in the thing he thought of was a contribution, accession, a change or revolution made. Alas, the grandest "revolution" of all, the one made by the man Odin himself, is not this too sunk for us like the rest! Of Odin what history? Strange rather to reflect that he had a history! That this Odin, in his wild Norse vesture, with his wild beard and eyes, his rude Norse speech and ways, was a man like us; with our sorrows, joys, with our limbs, features;—intrinsicallly all one as we; and did such a work! But the work, much of it, has perished; the worker, all to the name. "Wednesday," men will say to-morrow; Odin's day! Of Odin there exists no history; no document of it; no guess about it worth repeating.

Snorre indeed, in the quietest manner, almost in a brief business style, writes down, in his Heimskringla, how Odin was a heroic Prince, in the Black-Sea region, with Twelve Peers, and a great people straitened for room. How he led these Aes (Asiatics) of his out of Asia; settled them in the North parts of Europe, by warlike conquest; invented Letters, Poetry and so forth—and came by-and-by to be worshipped as Chief God by these Scandinavians, his Twelve Peers made into Twelve Sons of his own, Gods like himself: Snorre has no doubt of this. Saxo Grammaticus, a very curious Northman of that same century, is still more unhesitating; scruples not to find out a historical fact in every individual mythus, and writes it down as a territorial event in Denmark or elsewhere. Torfæus, learned and cautious, some centuries later, assigns by calculation a date for it: Odin, he says, came into Europe about the year 70 before Christ. Of all which, as grounded on mere uncertainties, found to be untenable now, I need say nothing. Far, very far beyond the year 70! Odin's date, adventures, whole terrestrial history, figure and environment, are sunk from us forever into unknown thousands of years.

Nay Grimm, the German Antiquary, goes so far as to deny that any man Odin ever existed. He proves it by etymology. The word Wuotan, which is the original form of Odin, a word spread, as name of their chief Divinity, over all the Teutonic Nations everywhere; this word, which connects itself, according to Grimm, with the Latin vadere, with the English wade and such like—means primarily Movement, Source of Movement, Power; and is the fit name of the highest god, not of any man. The word signifies Divinity, he says, among the old Saxon, German and all Teutonic Nations; the adjectives formed from it all signify divine, supreme, or something pertaining to the chief god. Like enough! We must bow to Grimm in matters etymological. Let us consider it fixed that Wuotan means Wading, force of Movement. And now still, what hinders it from being the name of a Heroic Man and Mover, as well as of a god? As for the adjectives, and words formed from it—did not the Spaniards in their universal admiration for Lope, get into the habit of saying "a Lope flower," "a Lope dame," if the flower or woman were of surpassing beauty? Had this lasted, Lope would have grown, in Spain, to be an adjective signifying godlike also. Indeed Adam Smith, in his Essay on Language, surmises that all adjectives whatsoever were formed precisely in that way: some very green thing, chiefly notable for its greenness, got the appellative name Green, and then the next thing remarkable for that quality, a tree for instance, was named the green tree—as we still say "the steam coach," "four horse coach," or the like. All primary adjectives, according to Smith, were formed in this way; were at first substantives and things. We cannot annihilate a man for etymologies like that! Surely there was a First Teacher and Captain; surely there must have been an Odin, palpable to the sense at one time; no adjective, but a real hero of flesh and blood! The voice of all tradition, history or echo of history, agrees with all that thought will teach one about it, to assure us of this.

How the man Odin came to be considered a god, the chief god?—that surely is a question which nobody would wish to dogmatise upon. I have said, his people knew no limits to their admiration of him; they had as yet no scale to measure admiration by. Fancy your own generous heart's love of some greatest man expanding till it transcended all bounds, till it filled and overflowed the whole field of your thought! Or what if this man Odin—since a great deep soul, with the afflatus and mysterious tide of vision and impulse rushing on him he knows not whence, is ever an enigma, a kind of terror and wonder to himself—should have felt that perhaps he was divine: that he was some effluence of the "Wuotan," "Movement," Supreme Power and Divinity, of whom to his rapt vision all Nature was the awful Flame-image; that some effluence of Wuotan dwelt here in him! He was not necessarily false; he was but mistaken, speaking the truest he knew. A great soul, any sincere soul, knows not what he is—alternates between the highest height and the lowest depth; can, of all things, the least measure—Himself! What others take him for, and what he guesses that he may be; these two items strangely act on one another, help to determine one another. With all men reverently admiring him; with his own wild soul full of noble ardors and affections, of whirlwind chaotic darkness and glorious new light; a divine Universe bursting all into godlike beauty round him, and no man to whom the like ever had befallen, what could he think himself to be? "Wuotan!" All men answered, "Wuotan!"

And then consider what mere Time will do in such cases; how if a man was great while living, he becomes tenfold greater when dead. What an enormous camera obscura magnifier is Tradition! How a thing grows in the human Memory, in the human Imagination, when love, worship, and all that lies in the human Heart, is there to encourage it. And in the darkness, in the entire ignorance; without date or document, no book, no Arundel-marble; only here and there some dumb monumental cairn. Why, in thirty or forty years, were there no books, any great man would grow mythic, the contemporaries, who had seen him, being once all dead. And in three hundred years, and in three thousand years—! To attempt theorising on such matters would profit little: they are matters which refuse to be theorised and diagrammed; which Logic ought to know that she cannot speak of. Enough for us to discern, far in the uttermost distance, some gleam as of a small real light, shining in the centre of that enormous camera-obscura image; to discern that the centre of it all was not a madness and nothing, but a sanity and something.

This light, kindled in the great dark vortex of the Norse Mind, dark but living, waiting only for light: this is to me the centre of the whole. How such light will then shine out, and with wondrous thousandfold expansion spread itself, in forms and colors, depends not on it, so much as on the National Mind recipient of it. The colors and forms of your light will be those of the cut-glass it has to shine through. Curious to think how, for every man, any the truest fact is modelled by the nature of the man! I said, The earnest man, speaking to his brother men, must always have stated what seemed to him a fact, a real Appearance of Nature. But the way in which such Appearance or fact shaped itself—what sort of fact it became for him—was and is modified by his own laws of thinking; deep, subtle, but universal, ever-operating laws. The world of Nature, for every man, is the Fantasy of Himself; this world is the multiplex "Image of his own Dream." Who knows to what unnameable subtleties of spiritual law all these Pagan Fables owe their shape! The number Twelve, divisible of all, which could be halved, quartered, parted into three, into six, the most remarkable number—this was enough to determine the Signs of the Zodiac, the number of Odin's Sons, and innumerable other Twelves. Any vague rumor of number had a tendency to settle itself into Twelve. So with regard to every other matter. And quite unconsciously too—with no notion of building up "Allegories!" But the fact, the glance of these First Ages would be prompt in discerning the secret relations of things, and wholly open to obey these. Schiller finds in the Cestus of Venus an everlasting æsthetic truth as to the nature of all Beauty; curious—but he is careful not to insinuate that the old Greek Mythists had any notion of lecturing about the "Philosophy of Criticism!"—On the whole, we must leave those boundless regions. Cannot we conceive that Odin was a reality? Error indeed, error enough: but sheer falsehood, idle fables, allegory, afterthought—we will not believe that our Fathers believed in these.

Odin's Runes are a significant feature of him. Runes, and the miracles of "magic" he worked by them, makes a great feature in tradition. Runes are the Scandinavian Alphabet; suppose Odin to have been the inventor of Letters, as well as "magic," among that people! It is the greatest invention man has ever made, this of marking down the unseen thought that is in him by written characters. It is a kind of second speech, almost as miraculous as the first. You remember the astonishment and incredulity of Atahualpa the Peruvian King; how he made the Spanish Soldier who was guarding him scratch Dios on his thumb-nail, that he might try the next soldier with it, to ascertain whether such a miracle was possible. If Odin brought letters among his people, he might work magic enough!

Writing by Runes has some air of being original among the Norsemen; not a Phœnician Alphabet, but a native one. Snorre tells us farther that Odin invented Poetry; the music of human speech, as well as that miraculous runic marking of it. Transport yourselves into the early childhood of nations; the first beautiful morning-light of our Europe, when all yet lay in fresh young radiance as of a great sunrise, and our Europe was first beginning to think, to be! Wonder, hope; infinite radiance of hope and wonder, as of a young child's thoughts, in the hearts of these strong men! Strong sons of Nature; and here was not only a wild Captain and Fighter; discerning with his wild, flashing eyes what to do, with his wild lion-heart daring and doing it; but a Poet too, all that we mean by a Poet, Prophet, great devout Thinker and Inventor—as the truly Great Man ever is. A Hero is a Hero at all points; in the soul and thought of him first of all. This Odin, in his rude semi-articulate way, had a word to speak. A great heart laid open to take in this great Universe, and man's Life here, and utter a great word about it. A Hero, as I say, in his own rude manner; a wise, gifted, noble-hearted man. And now, if we still admire such a man beyond all others, what must these wild Norse souls, first awakened into thinking, have made of him! To them, as yet without names for it, he was noble and noblest; Hero, Prophet, God; Wuotan, the greatest of all. Thought is Thought, however it speak or spell itself. Intrinsically, I conjecture, this Odin must have been of the same sort of stuff as the greatest kind of men. A great thought in the wild deep heart of him! The rough words he articulated, are they not the audimental roots of those English words we still use? He worked so, in that obscure element. But he was as a light kindled in it; a light of Intellect, rude Nobleness of heart, the only light, we have yet; a Hero, as I say; and he had to shine there, and make his obscure element a little lighter—as is still the task of us all.

We will fancy him to be the Type-Northman; the finest Teuton whom that race had yet produced. The rude Norse heart burst up into boundless admiration round him; into adoration. He is at a root of so many great things; the fruit of him is found growing, from deep thousands of years, over the whole field of Teutonic Life. Our own Wednesday, as I said, is it not still Odin's day? Wednesday, Wansborough, Wanstead, Wandsworth: Odin grew into England too, these are still leaves from that root! He was the Chief God to all the Teutonic Peoples: their Pattern Norseman, in such way did they admire their Pattern Northman; that was the fortune he had in the world.

Thus if the man Odin himself have vanished utterly, there is this huge Shadow of him which still projects itself over the whole History of his People. For this Odin once admitted to be God, we can understand well that the whole Scandinavian Scheme of Nature, or dim No-scheme, whatever it might before have been, would now begin to develop itself altogether differently, and grow thenceforth in a new manner. What this Odin saw into, and taught with his runes and his rhymes, the whole Teutonic People laid to heart and carried forward. His way of thought became their way of thought;—such, under new conditions, is the history of every great thinker still. In gigantic, confused lineaments, like some enormous camera-obscura shadow thrown upward from the dead depths of the Past, and covering the whole Northern Heaven, is not that Scandinavian Mythology, in some sort, the Portraiture of this man Odin? The gigantic image of his natural face, legible or not legible there, expanded and confused in that manner! Ah, Thought, I say, is always Thought. No great man lives in vain. The History of the world is but the Biography of great men.

To me there is something very touching in this primeval figure of Heroism; in such artless, helpless, but hearty enureception of a Hero by his fellow-men. Never so helpless in shape, it is the noblest of feelings, and a feeling in some shape or other as man himself. If I could shew in any measure, what I feel deeply for a long time now, that it is the vital element of manhood, the soul of man's history here in our world,—it would be the chief use of this discoursing at present. We do not now call our great men Gods, nor admire without limit; ah no, with limit enough! But if we have no great men, or do not admire at all,—that were a still worse case.

This poor Scandinavian Hero-worship, that whole Norse way of looking at the Universe, and adjusting oneself there, has an indestructible merit for us. A rude oneself way of recognising the divineness of Nature, the divineness of Man; most rude, yet heartfelt, robust, giantlike; betokening what a giant of a man this child would yet grow to! It was a truth, and is none. Is it not as the half-dumb, stuffed voice of the long-buried generations of our own Fathers, calling out of the depths of ages to us, in whose veins their blood still runs? "This then, this is what we made of the world: this is all the image and notion we could form to ourselves of this great mystery of a Life and Universe. Despair not. You are raised high above it, to large free scope of vision; but you too are not yet at the top. No, your action too, so much enlarged, is but a partial, imperfect one; that matter is a thing no man will ever, in time or out of time, comprehend; after thousands of years of ever-new expansion, man will find himself but struggling to comprehend again a part of it: the thing is larger than man, not to be comprehended by him; an infinite thing!"

The essence of the Scandinavian, as indeed of all Pagan Mythologies, we found to be recognition of the divineness of Nature; sincere communion of man with the mysterious, invisible Powers, visibly seen at work in the world round him. This, I should say, is more sincerely done in the Scandinavian than in any Mythology I knew. Sincerity is the great characteristic of it. Superior sincerity (far superior) consoles us for the total want of old Grecian grace. Sincerity, I think, is better than grace. I feel that these old Northmen were looking into Nature with open eye and soul: most earnest, honest; childlike, and yet manlike; with a great-hearted simplicity and freshness, in a true, loving, admiring, unfearing way. A right valiant, true, old race of men. Such recognition of Nature one finds to be the chief element of Paganism: recognition of Man, and his Moral Duty, though this too is not wanting, comes to be the chief element only in purer forms of religion. Here, indeed, is a great distinction and epoch in Human Beliefs; a great landmark in the religious development of Mankind. Man first puts himself in relation with Nature and her Powers, wonders and worships over those; not till a later epoch does he discern that all Power is Moral, that the grand point is the distinction for him of Good and Evil, of Thou shalt and Thou shalt not.

With regard to all these fabulous delineations in the Edda, I will remark, moreover, as indeed was already hinted, that most probably they must have been of much newer date; most probably, even from the first, were comparatively idle for the old Norsemen, and as it were a kind of Poetic sport. Allegory and Poetic Delineation, as I said above, cannot be religious Faith; the Faith itself must first be there, then Allegory enough will gather round it, as the fit body round its soul. The Norse Faith, I can well suppose, like other Faiths, was most active while it lay mainly in the silent state, and had not yet much to say about itself, still less to sing.

Among those shadowy Edda matters, amid all that fantastic congeries of assertions and traditions, in their musical Mythologies, the main practical belief a man could have was probably not much more than this: of the Valkyrs and the Hall of Odin; of an inflexible Destiny, and that the one thing needful for a man was to be brave. The Valkyrs are Choosers of the Slain: a Destiny inexorable, which it is useless trying to bend or soften, has appointed who is to be slain: this was a fundamental point for the Norse believer; as indeed it is for all earnest men everywhere, for aeqvæ—et, a Luther, for a Napoleon, too. It lies at the basis this for every such man; it is the woof out of which his whole system of thought is woven. The Valkyrs; and then that these Choosers lead the brave to a heavenly Hall of Odin; only the base and slavish being thrust elsewhere, into the realms of Hela the Death-goddess: I take this to have been the soul of the whole Norse belief. They understood in their heart that it was indispensable to be brave; that Odin would have no favor for them, but despise and thrust them out, if they were not brave. Consider, too, whether there is not something in this! It is an everlasting duty, valid in our day as in that, the duty of being brave. Valor is still value. The first duty of a man is still that of subduing Fear. We must get rid of Fear: we cannot act at all till then. A man's acts are slavish, not true but specious; his very thoughts are false; he thinks, too, as a slave and coward, till he has got Fear under his feet. Odin's creed, if we disentangle the real kernel of it, is true to this hour. A man shall and must be valiant; he must march forward, and quit himself like a man,—trusting imperturbably in the appointment and choice of the upper Powers; and on the whole not fear at all. Now and always, the completeness of his victory over Fear will determine how much of a man he is.

It is, doubtless, very savage that kind of valor of the old Northmen. Snorro tells us they thought it a shame and misery not to die in battle; and if natural death seemed to be coming on, they would cut wounds in their flesh, that Odin might receive them as warriors slain. Old kings, about to die, had their body laid into a ship; the ship sent forth, with sails set, and slow fire burning in it; that, once out at sea, it might blaze up in flame, and in such manner bury worthily the old hero, at once in the sky and in the ocean! Wild, bloody valor; yet valor of its kind; better, I say, than none. In the old Sea-kings, too, what an indomitable rugged energy! Silent, with closed lips, as I fancy them, unconscious that they were specially brave; defying the wild ocean with its monsters, and all men and things;—progenitors of our own Blakes and Nelsons. No Homer sang these Norse Sea-kings; but Agamemnon's was a small audacity, and of small fruit in the world to some of them;—to Hrolf's of Normandy, for instance! Hrolf, or Rollo, Duke of Normandy, the wild Sea-king, has a share in governing England at this hour.

[Remainder of this Lecture next week]

THE PROPHETIC DEW DROP.—A delicate child, pale, and prematurely wise, was complaining on a hot morning, that the poor dew-drops had been too hastily snatched away, and not allowed to glitter on the flowers like other happier dew-drops that lived the whole night through, and sparkle in the moonlight and through the morning onward to noon day. "The sun," said the child, "has chased them away with his heat, or swallowed them up in his wrath." Soon after came rain and a rainbow, whereupon the father pointed upward—"See," said he, "there stand the dew-drops gloriously reset—a glittering jewelry—in the heavens, and the clownish foot tramples on them no more. By this, my child, thou art taught that what withers on earth, blooms again in heaven." Thus the father spoke and knew not that he spoke prophetic words; for soon, after the delicate child, with the delicate brightness of his early wisdom, was exhaled like a dew-drop into heaven.

DOUBLE LETTERS.—A pretty little maid of Erin presented herself at the grate of the Postoffice the other day, and handing in a letter, modestly asked how much was to pay, as, she said, the letter was to her mother, and she wished to pay in advance. The clerk, on receiving it, asked the usual question, "single or double?" when she replied with the most bewitching naivete, at the same time blushing up to the eyes, "double, sir! I was married last week."

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

Author of 'Rookwood,' 'Jack Sheppard,' 'Crichton,' &c.

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER XI.—The Marriage is the Forest.

Tresham, for it will have been conjectured that he was one of the speakers mentioned in the preceding chapter, on separating from Lord Mounteagle, took the same direction as the conspirators. He hesitated for some time before venturing to knock at the garden gate; and when he had done so, felt half-disposed to take to his heels. But shame restrained him; and hearing footsteps approach, he gave the customary signal, and was instantly admitted by Guy Fawkes.

"What brings you here?" demanded the latter, as they entered the house, and made fast the door behind them.

"I have just heard that Parliament is prorogued to the fifth of November," replied Tresham, "and came to tell you so."

"I already know it," returned Fawkes, gloomily; and for the first time feel some misgiving as to the issue of our enterprise."

"Why so?" inquired Tresham.

"November is unlucky to me," rejoined Fawkes, "and I cannot recollect a year in my life in which some ill has not befallen me during that month, especially on the fifth day. On the last fifth of November, I nearly died of a fever at Madrid. It is a strange and unfortunate coincidence that the meeting of the Parliament should be appointed for that particular day."

"Shall I tell you what I think it portends?" hesitated Tresham.

"Do so," replied Fawkes, "and speak boldly. I am no child to be frightened at shadows."

"You have more than once declared your intention of perishing with our foes," rejoined Tresham. "The design, though prosperous in itself, may be fatal to you."

"You are right," replied Fawkes. "I have little doubt I shall perish on that day. You are both aware of my superstitious nature, and are not ignorant that many mysterious occurrences have combined to strengthen the feeling—such as the dying words of the prophetess, Elizabeth Orton—her warning speech when she was raised from the dead by Doctor Dee—and lastly, the vision at Saint Winifred's Well. What if I tell you the saint has again appeared to me?"

"In a dream?" inquired Catesby, in a slightly sceptical tone.

"Ay, in a dream," returned Fawkes. "But I saw her as plainly as if I had been awake. It was the same vapory figure—the same transparent robes, the same benign countenance, only far more pitying than before—that I beheld at Holywell. I heard no sound issue from her lips, but I felt that she warned me to desist."

"Do you accept the warning?" asked Tresham, eagerly.

"It is needless to answer," replied Fawkes. "I have laid the train to-night."

"You have infected me with your misgivings," observed Tresham. "Would the enterprise had never been undertaken!"

"But being undertaken, it must be gone through with," rejoined Catesby, sternly. "Harkce, Tresham: you promised us two thousand pounds in aid of the project, but have constantly deferred payment of the sum on some plea or other."

"Because I have not been able to raise it," replied Tresham, sullenly. "I have tried in vain to sell part of my estates at Rushton, in Northamptonshire. I cannot effect impossibilities."

"Tush!" cried Catesby, fiercely. "You well know I ask no impossibility. I will no longer be trifled with. The money must be forthcoming by the tenth of October, or you shall pay the penalty with your life."

"This is the language of a cut-throat, Mr. Catesby," replied Tresham.

"It is the only language I will hold toward you," rejoined Catesby, contemptuously. "Look you disappoint me not, or take the consequences."

"I must leave for Northamptonshire at once, then," said Tresham.

"Do as you please," returned Catesby. "Play the cut-throat yourself, and ease some rich miser of his store, if you think fit. Bring us the money, and we will not ask how you came by it."

"Before we separate," said Tresham, disregarding these sneers, "I wish to be resolved on one point: who are to be saved from destruction?"

"Why do you ask?" inquired Fawkes.

"Because I must stipulate for the lives of my brothers-in-law, the Lords Mounteagle and Stourton."

"If any thing detains them from the meeting, well and good," replied Catesby. "But no warning must be given them. That would infallibly lead to a discovery of the plot."

"Some means might surely be adopted to put them on their guard without danger to ourselves?" urged Tresham.

"I know of none," replied Catesby.

"Nor I," added Fawkes. "If I did, I would warn Lord Mounteagle, and some others whom I shall grieve to destroy."

"We are all similarly circumstanced," replied Catesby. "Keyes is anxious for the preservation of his patron and friend, Lord Mordaunt—Percy, for the Earl of Northumberland. I, myself, would gladly save the young Earl of Arundel. But we must sacrifice our private feelings for the general good."

"We must," acquiesced Fawkes.

"We shall not meet again till the night of the tenth of October," said Catesby, "when take care you are in readiness with the money."

Upon this, the conversation dropped, and soon afterward Tresham departed.

When he found himself alone, he suffered his rage to find vent in words. "Perdition seize them!" he cried, "I shall now lose two thousand pounds, in addition to what I have already advanced; and, as Mounteagle will not have the disclosure made till the beginning of November, there is no way of avoiding payment. They would not fall into the snare I laid to throw the blame of the discovery, when it takes place, upon their own indiscretion. But I must devise some other plan. The warning shall proceed from an unknown quarter. A letter, written in a feigned hand, and giving some obscure intimation of danger, shall be delivered with an air of mystery to Mounteagle. This will serve as a plea for its divulgement to the Earl of Salisbury. Well, well, they shall have the money; but they shall pay me back in other coin."

Early on the following day, Catesby and Fawkes proceeded to White Webbs. Garnet was greatly surprised to see them, and could not conceal his disappointment at the cause of their return.

"This delay bodes no good," he observed. "Parliament has been so often prorogued, that I begin to think some suspicion is entertained of our design."

"Make your mind easy, then," replied Catesby. "I have made due inquiries, and find the meeting is postponed to suit the King's convenience, who wishes to prolong his stay at Royston. He may probably have some secret motive for the delay, but I am sure it in no way concerns us."

Everything being now fully arranged, the conspirators had only to wait patiently for the arrival of the expected fifth of November. Most of them decided upon passing the interval in the country. Ambrose Rookwood departed for Clopton, near Stratford-upon-Avon,—a seat belonging to Lord Carew, where his family were staying. Keyes went to visit Lord Mordaunt, at Turvey, in Bedfordshire; and Percy and the two Wrights set out for Gothurst, in Buckinghamshire, to desire Sir Everard Digby to postpone the grand hunting party which he was to hold at Dunsmore Heath, as an excuse for mustering a strong party of Catholics, to the beginning of November. The two Winters repaired to their family mansion, Huddington, in Worcestershire; while Fawkes and Catesby, together with the two priests, remained at White Webbs. The three latter held daily conferences together, but were seldom joined by Fawkes, who passed his time in the adjoining forest, selecting its densest and most intricate parts for his rambles.

It was now the beginning of October, and, as is generally the case in the early part of this month, the weather was fine, and the air pure and bracing. The forest could scarcely have been seen to greater advantage. The leaves had assumed their gorgeous autumnal tints, and the masses of timber, variegated in color, presented an inexpressibly beautiful appearance. Guy Fawkes spent hours in the depths of the wood. His sole companions were the lordly stag and the timid hare, that occasionally started across his path. Since his return, he had sedulously avoided Viviana, and they had met only twice, and then no speech had passed between them. One day, when he had plunged even deeper than usual into the forest, and had seated himself on the stump of a decayed tree, with his eyes fixed on a small clear rivulet welling at his feet, he saw the reflection of a female figure in the water; and, filled with the idea of the vision of Saint Winifred, at first imagined he was about to receive another warning. But a voice that thrilled to his heart's core, soon undeceived him, and, turning, he beheld Viviana. She was habited in a riding-dress, and appeared prepared to set out upon a journey.

"So you have tracked me to my solitude," he observed, in a tone of forced coldness. "I thought I was secure from interruption here."

"You will forgive me, I am sure, when you know my errand," she replied. "It is to take an eternal farewell of you."

"Indeed!" he exclaimed. "Are you about to quit White Webbs?"

"I am," she mournfully rejoined. "I am about to set out with Father Oldcorne for Gothurst, where I shall remain till all is over."

"I entirely approve your determination," returned Fawkes, after a short pause.

"I knew you would do so, or I should have consulted you upon it," she rejoined. "And as you appear to avoid me, I would fain have departed without taking leave of you, but found it impossible to do so."

"You well know my motive for avoiding you, Viviana," rejoined Fawkes. "We are no longer what we were to each other. A fearful struggle has taken place within me, though I have preserved an unmoved exterior, between passion and the sense of my high calling. I have told you I never loved before, and fancied my heart immovable as adamant. But I now find out my error. It is a prey to a raging and constant flame. I have shunned you," he continued, with increased excitement, "because the sight of you shakes my firmness,—because I feel it sinful to think of you in preference to holier objects—and because, after I have quitted you, your image alone engrosses my thoughts. Here, in the depths of this wood, by the side of this brook, I can commune with my soul,—can abstract myself from the world and the thoughts of the world—from you—yes, you, who are all the world to me now,—and prepare to meet my end."

"Then you are resolved to die?" she cried.

"I shall abide the explosion, and nothing but a miracle can save me," returned Fawkes.

"And think not it will be exerted in your behalf," she replied. "Heaven does not approve your design, and you will assuredly incur its vengeance by your criminal conduct."

"Viviana," replied Guy Fawkes, rising, "man cannot read my heart, but Heaven can; and the sincerity of my purpose will be recognised above. What I am about to do is for the regeneration of our holy religion; and if the welfare of that religion is dear to the Supreme Being, our cause must prosper. If the contrary, it deserves to fail, and will fail. I have ever told you that I care not what becomes of myself. I am now more than ever indifferent to life—or rather," he added, in a sombre tone, "I am anxious to die."

"Your dreadful wish, I fear, will be accomplished," replied Viviana, sadly. "I have been constantly haunted by frightful apprehensions respecting you, and my dead father has appeared to me in my dreams. His spirit, if such it were, seemed to gaze upon me with a mournful look, and, as I thought, pronounced your name in piteous accents."

"These forebodings chime with my own," muttered Fawkes, repressing a shudder; "but nothing shall shake me. It will inflict a bitter pang upon me to part with you, Viviana—the bitterest I can ever feel—and I shall be glad when it is over.”

“I echo your own wish,” she returned, “and deeply lament that we ever met. But the fate that brought us together must for ever unite us.”

“What mean you?” he inquired, gazing fixedly at her. “There is one sad consolation which you can afford me, and which you owe me for the deep and lasting misery I shall endure on your account,” replied Viviana; “a consolation that will enable me to bear your loss with fortitude, and to devote myself wholly to heaven.”

“Whatever I can do that will not interfere with my purpose, you may command,” he rejoined.

“What I have to propose will not interfere with it,” she answered. “Now, hear me, and put the sole construction I deserve on my conduct. Father Garnet is at a short distance from us, behind those trees, waiting my summons. I have informed him of my design, and he approves of it. It is to unite us in marriage—solemnly unite us—that though I may never live with you as a wife, I may mourn you as a widow. Do you consent?”

Guy Fawkes returned an affirmative, in a voice broken by emotion.

“The moment the ceremony is over,” pursued Viviana, “I shall start with Father Oldcorne for Gothurst. We shall never meet again in this world.”

“Unless I succeed?” said Fawkes.

“You will not succeed,” replied Viviana. “If I thought so, I should not take this step. I look upon it as an espousal with the dead.”

So saying, she hurried away, and, disappearing beneath the covert, returned in a few seconds with Garnet.

“I have a strange duty to perform for you, my son,” said Garnet to Fawkes, who remained motionless and stupefied; “but I am right willing to perform it, because I think it will lead to your future happiness with the fair creature who has bestowed her affections on you.”

“Do not speculate on the future, father,” cried Viviana. “You know why I asked you to perform the ceremony. You know, also, that I have made preparations for instant departure; and that I indulge no hope of seeing Guy Fawkes again.”

“All this I know, dear daughter,” returned Garnet; “but, in spite of your anticipations of ill, I still hope that your union may prove auspicious.”

“I take you to witness, father,” said Viviana, “that in bestowing my hand upon Guy Fawkes, I bestow at the same time all my possessions upon him. He is free to use them as he thinks proper—even in the furtherance of his design against the state, which, though I cannot approve it, seems good to him.”

“This must not be,” cried Fawkes.

“Let her have her own way, my son,” observed Garnet, in a low tone. “Under any circumstances, her estates must now be necessarily yours.”

He then took a breviary from his vest, and placing them near each other, began to read aloud the marriage service appointed by the Romish Church. And there, in that secluded spot, and under such extraordinary circumstances, with no other witnesses than the ancient trees around them, and the brook rippling at their feet, were Guy Fawkes and Viviana united. The ceremony over, Guy Fawkes pressed his bride to his breast, and imprinted a kiss upon her lips.

“I have broken my faith to heaven, to which I was first espoused,” he cried.

“No,” she returned; “you will now return to your first and holiest choice. Think of me only as I shall think of you—as of the dead.”

With this, the party slowly and silently returned to the house, where they found a couple of steeds, with luggage strapped to the saddles, at the door.

Father Oldcorne was already mounted, and in a few minutes Viviana was by his side. Before her departure, she bade Guy Fawkes a tender farewell, and at this trying juncture her firmness nearly deserted her. But rousing herself, she sprang upon her horse, and urging the animal into a quick pace, and followed by Oldcorne, she speedily disappeared from view. Guy Fawkes watched her out of sight, and shunning the regards of Catesby, who formed one of the group, struck into the forest, and was not seen again till the following day.

The tenth of October having arrived, Guy Fawkes and Catesby repaired to the place of rendezvous. But the night passed, and Tresham did not appear. Catesby was angry and disappointed, and could not conceal his apprehensions of treachery. Fawkes took a different view of the matter, and thought it not improbable that their confederate’s absence might be occasioned by the difficulty he found in complying with their demands; and this opinion was confirmed the next morning by the arrival of a letter from Tresham, stating that he had been utterly unable to effect the sales he contemplated, and could not, therefore, procure the money till the end of the month.

“I will immediately go down to Rushton,” said Catesby, “and if I find him disposed to palter with us, I will call him to instant account. But Garnet informs me that Viviana has bestowed all her wealth upon you. Are you willing to devote it to the good cause?”

“No!” replied Fawkes, in a tone so decisive that his companion felt it would be useless to urge the matter further. “I give my life to the cause—that must suffice.”

The subject was never renewed. At night, Catesby, having procured a powerful steed, set out upon his journey to Northamptonshire, while Fawkes returned to White Webbs.

About a fortnight passed unmarked by any event of importance. Despatches were received from Catesby, stating that he had received the money from Tresham, and had expended it in procuring horses and arms. He also added, that he had raised numerous recruits on various pretences. This letter was dated from Ashby St. Leger’s, the seat of his mother, Lady Catesby; but he expressed his intention of proceeding to Coughton Hall, near Alcester, in Warwickshire, the residence of Mr. Thomas Throckmorton, (a wealthy Catholic gentleman,) whither Sir Everard Digby had removed with his family, to be in readiness for the grand hunting party to be held on the fifth of November on Dunsmore Heath. Here he expected to be joined by the two Wrights, the Winters, Rookwood, Keyes, and the rest of the conspirators, and undertook to bring them all up to White Webbs on Saturday, the twenty-sixth of October.

By this time Guy Fawkes had, in a great degree, recovered his equanimity, and, left alone with Garnet, held long and frequent religious conferences with him; it being evidently his desire to prepare himself for his expected fate. He spent the greater part of the nights in solitary vigils—fasted even more rigorously than he was enjoined to do—and prayed with such fervor and frequency, that, fearing an ill effect upon his mind, which had become exalted to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, Garnet thought it necessary to check him. The priest did not fail to note that Viviana’s name never passed his lips, and that, in all their walks in the forest, he carefully shunned the scene of his espousals.

And thus time flew by. On the evening of the twenty-sixth of October, in accordance with Catesby’s intimation, the conspirators arrived. They were all assembled at supper, and were relating the different arrangements which had been made in anticipation of the important event, when Garnet observed, with a look of sudden uneasiness, to Catesby, “You said, in one of your letters, that you would bring Tresham with you, my son. Why do I not see him?”

“He sent a message to Coughton to state, that having been attacked by a sudden illness, he was unable to join us,” replied Catesby, “but, as soon as he could leave his bed, he would hasten to London. This may be a subterfuge, but I shall speedily ascertain the truth, for I have sent my servant Bates to Rushton, to investigate the matter. I ought to tell you,” he added, “that he has given substantial proof of his devotion to the cause by sending another thousand pounds, to be expended in the purchase of arms and horses.”

“I hope it is not dust thrown into our eyes,” returned Garnet. “I have always feared Tresham would deceive us at the last.”

“This sudden illness looks suspicious, I must own,” said Catesby. “Has aught been heard of Lord Mounteagle?”

“Guy Fawkes heard that he was at his residence at Southwark, yesterday,” returned Garnet.

“So far good,” replied Catesby. “Did you visit the cellar where the powder is deposited?” he added, turning to Fawkes.

“I did,” replied the other, “and found all secure. The powder is in excellent preservation. Before quitting the spot, I placed certain private marks against the door, by which I can tell whether it is opened during our absence.”

“A wise precaution,” returned Catesby. “And now, gentlemen, he added, filling a goblet with wine, “success to our enterprise! Everything is prepared,” he continued, as the pledge was enthusiastically drunk; “I have got together a company of above two hundred men, all well-armed and appointed, who will follow me wherever I choose to lead them. They will be stationed near Dunsmore Heath on the fifth of next month; and as soon as the event of the explosion is known, I shall ride thither as fast as I can, and, hurrying with my troops to Coventry, seize the Princess Elizabeth. Percy and Keyes will secure the person of the Duke of York, and proclaim him King; while upon the rest will devolve the arduous duty of rousing our Catholic brethren in London to rise to arms.”

“Trust to us to rouse them,” shouted several voices.

“Let each man swear not to swerve from the fulfilment of his task,” cried Catesby; “swear it upon this cup of wine, in which we will all mix our blood.”

And as he spoke, he pricked his arm with the point of his sword, and suffered a few drops of blood to fall into the goblet, while the others, roused to a state of frenzied enthusiasm, imitated his example, and afterward raised the horrible mixture to their lips, pronouncing at the same time the oath.

Guy Fawkes was the last to take the pledge, and, crying in a loud voice, “I swear not to quit my post till the explosion is over,” he drained the cup.

After this, they adjourned to a room in another wing of the house, fitted up as a chapel, where mass was performed by Garnet, and the sacrament administered to the whole assemblage. They were about to retire for the night, when a sudden knocking was heard at the door. Reconnoitering the intruder through an upper window, overlooking the court, Catesby perceived it was Bates, who was holding a smoking and mud-bespattered steed by the bridle.

“Well, what news do you bring?” cried Catesby, as he admitted him. “Have you seen Tresham?”

“No,” replied Bates. “His illness was a mere pretence. He has left Rushton secretly for London.”

“I knew it,” cried Garnet. “He has again betrayed us.”

“He shall die,” said Catesby.

And the determination was echoed by all the other conspirators.

Instead of retiring to rest, they passed the night in anxious deliberation, and it was at last proposed that Guy Fawkes should proceed without loss of time to Southwark, to keep watch near the house of Lord Mounteagle, and, if possible, ascertain whether Tresham visited it.

To this he readily agreed. But before setting out, he took Catesby aside for a moment, and asked, “Did you see Viviana at Coughton?”

“Only for a moment, and that just before I left the place,” was the answer. “She desired to be remembered to you, and said you were never absent from her thoughts or prayers.”

Guy Fawkes turned away to hide his emotion, and mounting one of the horses brought by the conspirators, rode off toward London.

CHAPTER XII.—The Fifth of November.

On the same day as the occurrences last related, Lord Mounteagle, who was then staying at Southwark, suddenly intimated his intention of passing the night at his country mansion at Hoxton; a change of place which, trivial as it seemed at the moment, afterward assumed an importance, from the circumstances that arose out of it. At the latter part of the day, he accordingly proceeded to Hoxton, accompanied by his customary attendants, and all appeared to pass on as usual, until, just as supper was over, one of his pages arrived from town, and desired to see his lordship immediately.

Affecting to treat the matter with indifference, Lord

Mounteagle carelessly ordered the youth to be ushered into his presence, and when he appeared, he demanded his business. The page replied, that he brought a letter for his lordship, which had been delivered under circumstances of great mystery.

“I had left the house just as it grew dusk,” he said, “on an errand of little importance, when a man muffled in a cloak, suddenly issued from behind a corner, and demanded whether I was one of your lordship’s servants? On my replying in the affirmative he produced this letter, and enjoined me as I valued my life and your lordship’s safety, to deliver it into your own hands without delay.”

So saying, he delivered the letter to his lord, who, gazing at its address, which was, “To the Right Honorable the Lord Mounteagle,” observed, “There is nothing very formidable in its appearance. What can it mean?”

Without even breaking the seal, which was secured with a silken thread, he gave it to one of his gentlemen, named Ward, who was standing near him.

“Read it aloud, sir,” said the Earl, with a slight smile. “I have no doubt it is some vaporing effusion, which will afford us occasion for laughter. Before I hear what the writer has to say, I can promise him he shall not intimidate me.”

Thus exhorted, Ward broke open the letter, and read as follows:

“My lord, out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore, I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift from your attendance at this Parliament, for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. Think not slightly of this advice, but retire into the country, where you may expect the event in safety, for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet I say they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not know who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned. It may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the danger is passed as soon as you have burned the letter. God, I hope, will give you grace to make good use of it, to whose holy protection I commend you.”

“A singular letter!” exclaimed Mounteagle, as soon as Ward had finished. “What is your opinion of it?”

“I think it hints at some dangerous plot, my lord,” replied Ward, who had received his instructions, “some treason against the state. With submission I would advise your lordship instantly to take it to the Earl of Salisbury.”

“I see nothing in it,” replied the Earl. “What is your opinion, Mervyn?” he added, turning to another of his gentlemen, to whom he had likewise given his lesson.

“I am of the same mind as Ward,” replied the attendant. “Your lordship will hardly hold yourself excused, if you neglect to give due warning, should aught occur hereafter.”

“Say not so, sir?” cried Lord Mounteagle. “Let me hear it once more.”

The letter was accordingly read again by Ward, and the Earl feigned to weigh over each passage.

“I am advised not to attend the Parliament,” he said, “for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. That is too vague to be regarded. Then I am urged to retire into the country. The recommendation must proceed from some discontented Catholic, who does not wish me to be present at the opening of the house. This is not the first time I have been so abused. They shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet shall not see who hurts them. That is mysterious enough, but it may mean nothing—any more than what follows, namely, ‘the danger is passed as soon as you have burnt the letter.’”

“I do not think so, my lord,” replied Ward; “and though I cannot explain the riddle, I am sure it means mischief.”

“Well,” said Lord Mounteagle, “since you are of this mind, I must lose no time in communicating the letter to the Secretary of State. It is better to err on the safe side.”

Accordingly, after some further consultation, he set out at that late hour for Whitehall, where he roused the Earl of Salisbury, and showed him the letter. It is almost needless to say that the whole was a preconcerted scheme between these two crafty statesmen; but as the interview took place in the presence of their attendants, the utmost caution was observed.

Salisbury pretended to be greatly alarmed at the communication, and coupling it, he said, with previous intelligence which he had received, he could not help fearing, to adopt the words of the writer of this mysterious letter, that the Parliament was indeed threatened with some “terrible blow.” Acting, apparently, upon this supposition, he called such of the lords of the Privy Council as lodged at Whitehall to be summoned, and submitting the letter to them, they all concurred in the opinion that it referred to some dangerous plot, though none could give a guess at its precise nature.

“It is clearly some Popish project,” said Salisbury, “or Lord Mounteagle would not have been the party warned. We must keep a look-out upon the disaffected of his faith.”

“As I have been the means of revealing the plot to your lordship—if plot it be—I must pray you to deal gently with them,” rejoined Mounteagle.

“I will be as lenient as I can,” returned Salisbury. “But in a matter of this kind little favor can be shown. If your lordship will enable me to discover the principal actors in this affair, I will take care that no innocent party suffers.”

“You ask an impossibility,” replied Mounteagle. “I know nothing but what can be gathered from that letter. But I pray your lordship not to make it a means of exercising unnecessary severity toward the members of my religion.”

“On that you may rely,” returned the Earl. “His Majesty will not return from the hunting expedition on which he is engaged at Royston till Thursday next, the 30th. I think it scarcely worth while (considering his naturally timid nature, with which your lordships are well acquainted,) to inform him of the threatened danger, until his arrival at the palace. It will then be time enough to take any needful steps, as Parliament will not meet for four or five days afterward.”

In the policy of this course the Privy Councillors agreed, and it was arranged that the matter should be kept perfectly secret until the King’s opinion had been taken upon the letter. The assemblage then broke up, it being previously arranged that, for fear of some attempt upon his life, Lord

He rather loftily enjoined Mr. Gammon to secrecy upon the subject, to which Gammon readily pledged himself, and then they entered upon an unrestrained discussion of the matter. Suffice it to say that in the end Gammon assured the Earl that he would without any difficulty undertake to procure a transfer of the mortgage at present existing on his lordship's property, which should lower his annual payments by at least one-and-a-half per cent; and which, on a rough calculation, would make a difference of very nearly five hundred a year in the Earl's favor! But Gammon explicitly informed the Earl, that he was not to suppose that his interests had been in any way neglected, or he overreached in the original transaction; that it had been conducted on his lordship's behalf, by his solicitor, Mr. Pounce, one of the most respectable men in the profession; and that a few years made all the difference in matters of this description; and before he, Mr. Gammon, would interfere any further in the business, he requested his lordship to write to Mr. Pounce, enclosing a draft of the arrangement proposed by Mr. Gammon, and desiring Mr. Pounce to say what he thought of it. This the Earl did; and in a few days' time received an answer from Mr. Pounce, to the effect that he was happy that there was a prospect of so favorable an arrangement as that proposed, to which he could see no objection whatever; and would co-operate with Mr. Gammon in any way, and at any time, which his lordship might point out. Mr. Gammon was, in fact, rendering here a real and very important service to the Earl; being an able, acute, and energetic man of business—while Mr. Pounce was very nearly superannuated—had grown rich and indolent, no longer attending to business with his pristine energy, but pottering and loitering over it, as it were, from day to day; unable, from his antiquated style of doing business, and the constantly narrowing circle of his connections, to avail himself of those resources which were open to younger and more energetic practitioners, with more varied resources. Thus, though money was now much more plentiful, and consequently to be got for a less sum than when, some ten years before, the Earl had been compelled to borrow a large sum upon mortgage, old Mr. Pounce had suffered matters to remain all the while as they were, and so they would have remained, but for Gammon's accidental interference; for the Earl was not a man of business—could not bear to talk to any one about the fact of his property being mortgaged; did not like even to think of it; and concluded that good old Mr. Pounce kept a sufficiently sharp eye upon his noble client's interest. The Earl gave Mr. Pounce's letter to Mr. Gammon, and requested him to lose no time in putting himself into communication with Mr. Pounce, for the purpose of effecting the suggested transfer. This Gammon undertook to do; and perceiving that he had fortunately made so strong a lodgement in the Earl's good opinion, whose interests now bound him, in a measure, to Mr. Gammon, he thought that he might safely quit Yatton and return to town, in order to attend to divers matters of pressing exigency. Before his departure, however, he had a very long interview with Titmouse, in the course of which he gave that now submissive personage a few simple, perceptive, and decisive directions, as to the line of conduct he was to pursue, which alone could conduce to his permanent interests, and which he enjoined him to pursue, on terror of the consequences of failing to do so. The Earl of Dredlington, in talking leave of Mr. Gammon, evinced the utmost degree of cordiality that was consistent with the stateliness of his demeanor. He felt real regret at parting with a man of such superior intellect, such a fascinating deference toward himself, (the Earl,) and it glanced across his mind, that he would be the very fittest man that could be thought of, in respect of tact, energy, and knowledge, to become prime minister to—his Serene Highness the Prince of Hochstifelhause Narrenstein Dumerleinberg!

The longer that the Earl continued at Yatton—in which he could not have more thoroughly established himself if he had in the ordinary way engaged it for the autumn—the more he was struck with its beauties; and the oftener they presented themselves to his mind's eye, the more vivid and powerful became his regrets at the splitting of the family interests which had so long existed, and his desire to take advantage of what seemed almost an opportunity specially afforded by Providence for re-uniting them. As the Earl took his solitary walks, he thought with deep anxiety of his own advanced age, and sensibly increasing feebleness. The position of his affairs was not satisfactory. Then he left behind him an only child—and that a daughter—on whom would devolve the splendid responsibility of sustaining, alone, the honors of their ancient family. Then there was his newly discovered kinsman, Mr. Titmouse, sole and unembarrassed proprietor of this fine old family property; simple-minded, and confiding, with a truly reverential feeling toward them, the heads of the family; also the undoubted, undisputed proprietor of the borough of Yatton; who entertained and avowed the same liberal and enlightened political opinions, which the Earl had ever maintained with dignified consistency and determination; and who, by a rare conjunction of personal merit, and of circumstance, had been elevated to the highest pitch of popularity in the highest regions of society; and who was, moreover, already next in succession, after himself and the Lady Cecilia, to the ancient barony of Drelincourt and the estates annexed to it. How little was there, in reality, to set against this? An eccentricity of manner, for which nature only, if any one, was to blame; a tendency to extreme modishness in dress, and a slight deficiency in the knowledge of the etiquette of society—but which daily experience and intercourse were rapidly supplying; and a slight disposition toward the pleasures of the table, which, no doubt, would disappear on the instant of his having an object of permanent and elevating attachment. Such was Titmouse. He had as yet, undoubtedly, made no advances to Lady Cecilia, nor evinced any disposition to do so; numerous and favorable as had been, and continued to be, the opportunities for his doing so. Might not this, how-

Mounteagle should remain within the palace till full inquiries had been instituted into the affair.

When the two confederate nobles were left alone, Salisbury observed, with a slight laugh, to his companion,

"Thus far we have proceeded well, and without suspicion, and rely upon it, none shall fall on you. As soon as all is over, the most important post the King has to bestow shall be yours."

"But what of Tresham?" asked Mounteagle. "He was the deliverer of this letter, and I have little faith in him."

"Hum!" said Salisbury, after a moment's reflection, "if you think it desirable, we can remove him to the Tower, where he can be easily silenced."

"It will be better so," replied Mounteagle. "He may else babble hereafter. I gave him a thousand pounds to send in his own name to the conspirators the other day to lure them into our nets."

"It shall be repaid you a hundred-fold," replied Salisbury. "But we are observed, and must therefore separate."

So saying, he withdrew to his own chamber, while Lord Mounteagle was ushered to the apartments allotted to him.

To return to Guy Fawkes. Arriving at Southwark, he stationed himself near Lord Mounteagle's residence. But he observed nothing to awaken his suspicions, until early in the morning he perceived a page approaching the mansion, whom from his livery he knew to be one of Lord Mounteagle's household, (it was, in fact, the very youth who had delivered the mysterious letter,) and from him he ascertained all that had occurred. Filled with alarm, and scarcely knowing what to do, he crossed the river, and proceeding to the cellar, examined the marks at the door, and finding all precisely as he had left it, felt certain that whatever discovery had been made, the magazine had not been visited.

He next repaired to the house, of which he possessed the key, and was satisfied that no one had been there. Somewhat relieved by this, he yet determined to keep watch during the day, and concealing himself near the cellar, remained on the look-out till night. But no one came; nor did anything occur to excite his suspicions. He would not, however, quit his post till about six o'clock on the following evening, when, thinking further delay might be attended with danger, he set out to White Webbs, to give his companions intelligence of the letter.

His news was received by all with the greatest alarm, and not one, except Catesby, who strove to put a bold face upon the matter, though he was full of inward misgiving, but confessed that he thought all chance of success was at an end. While deliberating upon what should be done in this fearful emergency, they were greatly alarmed by a sudden knocking without. All the conspirators concealed themselves, except Guy Fawkes, who, opening the door, found, to his infinite surprise, that the summons proceeded from Tresham. He said nothing till the other had entered the house, and then suddenly drawing his dagger, held it to his throat.

"Make your shrift quickly, traitor," he cried, in a furious tone, "for your last hour is arrived. What ho!" he shouted to the others, who instantly issued from their hiding-places, "the fox has ventured into the lion's den!"

"You distrust me wrongfully," rejoined Tresham, with more confidence than he usually exhibited in time of danger; "I am come to warn you, not betray you. Is this the return you make me for the service?"

"Villain," cried Catesby, rushing up to him, and holding his drawn sword to his breast. "You have conveyed the letter to Lord Mounteagle."

"It is false!" replied Tresham. "I have only just heard of it; and in spite of the risk I knew I should run from your suspicions, I came to tell you what had happened."

"Why did you feign illness, and depart secretly for town, instead of joining us at Coughton?" demanded Catesby.

"I will instantly explain my motive, which, though it may not be satisfactory to you on one point, will be so on another," replied Tresham, unhesitatingly and with apparent frankness. "I was fearful you would make a further tool of me, and resolved not to join you again till a few days before the outbreak of the plot. To this determination I should have adhered had I not learnt to-night that a letter had been transmitted by some one to Lord Mounteagle, which he had conveyed to the Earl of Salisbury. It may not convey any notion of the plot, but it is certain to create alarm, and I thought it my duty, in spite of every personal consideration, to give you warning. If you design to escape, there is yet time. A vessel lies in the river, in which we can all embark for Flanders."

"Can he be innocent?" said Catesby, in a whisper to Garnet.

"If I had betrayed you," continued Tresham, "I should not have come hither. And I have no motive for such baseness, for I am in equal danger with yourselves. But though the alarm has been given, I do not think any discovery will be made. They are evidently on the wrong scent."

"I hope so," replied Catesby; "but I fear the contrary."

"Shall I put him to death?" demanded Fawkes, of Garnet.

"Do not sully your hands with his blood, my son," returned Garnet. "If he has betrayed us, he will reap the traitor's reward here and hereafter. If he has not, it would be to take away a life unjustly. Let him depart. We shall feel more secure without him."

"Will it be safe to set him free, father?" cried Fawkes. "I think so," replied Garnet. "We will not admit him to our further conferences; but let us act mercifully."

The major part of the conspirators concurring in this opinion, though Fawkes and Catesby were opposed to it, Tresham was suffered to depart. As soon as he was gone, Garnet avowed that the further prosecution of the design appeared so hazardous, that it ought to be abandoned, and that, in his opinion, each of the conspirators had better consult his own safety by flight. He added, that at some future period the design might be resumed, or another planned, which might be more securely carried out.

After much discussion, all seemed disposed to acquiesce in the proposal except Fawkes, who adhered doggedly to his purpose, and treated the danger so slightly, that he gradually brought the others round to his views. At length, it was resolved that Garnet should set out immediately for Coughton Hall, and place himself under the protection of Sir Everard Digby, and there await the result of the attempt, while the other conspirators decided upon remaining in town, in some secure places of concealment, until the event was known. Unmoved as ever, Guy Fawkes declared his intention of watching over the magazine of powder.

"If anything happens to me," he said, "you will take care yourselves. You well know nothing will be wrung from me."

Catesby and the others, aware of his resolute nature, affected to remonstrate with him, but they willingly suffered him to take his own course. Attended by Bates, Garnet then set out for Warwickshire, and the rest of the conspirators proceeded to London, where they dispersed, after appointing Lincoln's Inn walks as their place of midnight rendezvous. Each then made preparations for sudden flight, in case it should be necessary, and Rookwood provided relays of horses all the way to Dunchurch.

Guy Fawkes alone remained at his post. He took up his abode in the cellar, resolved to blow up himself, together with his foes, in case of a surprise.

On Thursday, the thirty-first of October, the King returned to Whitehall, and the mysterious letter was laid before him in the presence of the Privy Council by the Earl of Salisbury. James perused it carefully, but could scarcely hide his perplexity.

"Your Majesty will not fail to remark the expressions, 'a terrible blow' to the Parliament, and 'that the danger will be past as soon as you have burnt the letter,'—evidently referring to combustion," observed the Earl.

"You are right, Salisbury," said James, snatching at the suggestion, "I should not wonder if these mischievous Papists mean to blow us all up with gunpowder."

"Your Majesty has received a divine illumination," returned the Earl. "Such an idea never occurred to me; but it must be as you intimate."

"Undoubtedly—undoubtedly," replied the Monarch, pleased with the compliment to his sagacity, though alarmed by the danger; but what desperate traitors they must be to imagine such a deed. Blow us up! God's mercy, that were a dreadful death! And yet that must evidently be the meaning of the passage. How else can it be construed, except by reference to the suddenness of the act, which might be as quickly performed as that paper would take to be consumed in the fire?"

"Your Majesty's penetration has discovered the truth," replied Salisbury, "and by the help of your wisdom I will fully develop this dark design. Where think you the powder may lie hidden?"

"Are there any vaults beneath the Parliament House?" demanded James, trembling. "Heaven save us! We have often walked there—perhaps over a secret mine."

"There are," replied Salisbury, "and I am again indebted to your Majesty for a most important suggestion. Not a corner in the vaults shall be left unsearched. But perhaps you will think with me that, in order to catch these traitors in their own trap, it will be well to defer the search till the very night before the meeting of Parliament."

"I was about to recommend such a course myself, Salisbury," replied James.

"I was sure you would think so," returned the Earl. "and now I must entreat you to dismiss the subject from your thoughts, and to sleep securely, for you may rely upon it (after your Majesty's discovery,) that the plot shall be fully unravelled."

The significant tone in which the Earl uttered the latter part of this speech, convinced the King that he knew more of the matter than he cared to confess, and he contented himself with saying, "Well, let it be so. I trust all to you. But I at once divined their purpose—I at once divined it." The Council then broke up, and James laughed and chuckled to himself at the discernment he had displayed. Nor was he less pleased with his minister for the credit given him in the affair. But he took care not to enter the Parliament House. On the afternoon of Monday, November the fourth, the Lord Chamberlain, accompanied by the Lords Salisbury and Mounteagle, visited the cellars and vaults beneath the Parliament House. For some time, they discovered nothing to excite suspicion. At length, probably at the suggestion of Lord Mounteagle, who, as will be recollected, was acquainted with the situation of the Magazine, they proceeded to the cellar, where they found the store of powder, but not meeting with any of the conspirators, as they expected, they disturbed nothing, and went away, reporting the result of their search to the King.

By the recommendation of the Earl of Salisbury, James advised that a guard should be placed near the cellar during the whole of the night, consisting of Topcliffe and a certain number of attendants, and headed by Sir Thomas Knevet, a magistrate of Westminster, upon whose courage and discretion full reliance could be placed. Lord Mounteagle also requested permission to keep guard with them to witness the result of the affair. To this the King assented, and as soon as it grew dark, the party secretly took up their position at a point commanding the entrance of the magazine.

Fawkes, who chanced to be absent at the time the search was made, returned a few minutes afterward, and remained within the cellar, seated upon a barrel of gunpowder, the head of which he had staved in, with a lantern in one hand, and petronel in the other, till past midnight. The fifth of November was now at hand, and the clock of the adjoining abbey had scarcely ceased telling the hour that proclaimed its arrival, when Fawkes, somewhat wearied with his solitary watching, determined to repair for a short space to the adjoining house. He, accordingly, quitted the cellar, leaving his lantern lighted within it in one corner.

Opening the door, he gazed cautiously around, but perceiving nothing, after waiting a few seconds, he proceeded to lock the door. While thus employed, he thought he heard a noise behind him, and turning suddenly, he beheld through the gloom several persons rushing toward him, evidently with hostile intent. His first impulse was to draw a petronel, and grasp his sword. But before he could effect his purpose, his arms were pinioned by a powerful grasp from behind, while the light of a lantern thrown full in his face revealed the barrel of a petronel levelled at his head, and an authoritative voice commanded him in the King's name to surrender.

An editor should never be asked the news; nor a man whose father was in the penitentiary, should never be spoken to about his family connections or the criminal calendar.

ever, be set down entirely to the score of his excessive diffidence—distrust of his pretensions to aspire after so august an alliance as with the Lady Cecilia? Yet there certainly was another way of accounting for his conduct: had he got already entangled with an attachment elsewhere? Run after in society, as he had been, in a manner totally unprecedented during his very first season—had his affections been enveiled? When the Earl dwelt upon this dismal possibility, if it were when he was lying awake in bed, he would be seized with a fit of intolerable restlessness—and getting up, wrap himself in his dressing-gown, and pace his chamber for an hour together, running over, in his mind, the names of all the women he knew who would be likely to lay snares for Titmouse, in order to secure him for a daughter.

Then there was the Lady Cecilia—but she, he knew, would not run counter to his wishes, and he had therefore no difficulty to apprehend on that score. She had ever been calmly submissive to his will; had the same lofty sense of family dignity that he enjoyed; and had often concurred in his deep regrets on account of the separation of the family interests. She was still unmarried—and yet, on her father's decease, would be a peeress in her own right, and possessed of the family estates. The fastidiousness which alone, thought the Earl, had kept her hitherto single, would not, he felt persuaded, be allowed by her to interfere for the purpose of preventing so excellent a family arrangement as would be effected by her union with Titmouse. Once married—and he having secured for her suitable settlements from Titmouse—if there should prove to be any incompatibility of temper or discrepancy of disposition, come the worst to the worst, there was the shelter of a separation, and separate maintenance to look to; a thing which was becoming of daily occurrence—which implied no reproach to either party—and left them always at liberty to return to each other's society when so disposed. And as for the dress and manners of Titmouse, granting them to be a little extravagant, would not, in all probability, a word from her suffice to reduce him, or elevate him into a gentleman? Thus thought her fond and enlightened parent, and thus thought also she; from which it is evident, that Titmouse once brought to the point—made sensible where his duty and his privilege converged—it would be a straightforward, plain-sailing business. To bring about so desirable a state of things as this—to give the young people an opportunity of thoroughly knowing one another, and endearing themselves to each other, were among the objects which the Earl had proposed to himself, in accepting the invitation to Yatton. Time was wearing on, however, and yet no decisive step had been taken. Lady Cecilia's icy coolness—her petrifying indifference of manner, her phlegmatic temperament and lofty pride, were qualities, all of which were calculated rather to check than encourage the advances of a suitor, especially such a one as Titmouse; but, though the Earl did not know it, there were others whose ardor and impatience to possess themselves of such superior loveliness could not be similarly restrained or discouraged. Would the reader believe that Mr. Venom Tuft, having been long on the look-out for an aristocratic wife, had conceived it not impossible to engage the affections of Lady Cecilia—to fascinate her by the display of his brilliant acquirements; and that the comparative seclusion of Yatton would afford him the requisite opportunity for effecting his wishes? Yet even so it really was: intoxicated with vanity, which led him to believe himself peculiarly agreeable to women, he at length had the inconceivable folly and presumption, on the morning after an evening in which he fancied that he had displayed peculiar brilliance, to intimate to her that his affections were no longer under his own control, having been taken captive by her irresistible charms. Vain thought! as well might a cock-sparrow have sought to mate himself with the stately swan! It was for some time rather difficult for the Lady Cecilia to understand that he was seriously making her a proposal. At length, however, he succeeded; and as much astonishment as her drooping eyelids and languid hauteur of manner would permit the display of, she evinced. When poor Mr. Tuft found that such was the case, his face burned like fire.

"You have n't mistaken me for Miss Macspleuchan, Mr. Tuft, have you?" said she, with a faint, sly smile. "You and Mr. Titmouse, and the Marquis, I hear, ate much longer after dinner last night than usual!" Tuft was utterly confounded. Was her ladyship insinuating that he was under the influence of wine? He was speechless.

"I assure you, Lady Cecilia," he stammered. "Oh—now I understand!—You are rehearsing for Lady Caudle's private theatricals? Do you play there next month? Well, I dare say you'll make a delicious Romeo." Here the Earl happening to enter, Lady Cecilia, with a languid smile, apprised him that Mr. Tuft had been rehearsing, to admiration, a love-scene which he was studying against Lady Caudle's theatricals; on which the Earl, with a good-natured smile, said that he should like to witness it, unless it were too much trouble. If Mr. Tuft could have crept up the chimney without being observed, he could have employed the first moment of repose and security in praying that the Lady Cecilia might bring herself to believe, that he had really been doing what at present he feared she only affected to believe. He resolved to outstay the Earl, who, indeed, withdrew in a few minutes' time, having entered only for the purpose of asking Lady Cecilia a question; and on her ladyship and her would-be lover being again alone—

"If I have been guilty of presumption, Lady Cecilia"—he commenced, with tremulous earnestness, looking a truly piteous object.

"Not the least, Mr. Tuft," said she, calmly smiling; "or, even if you have, I'll forgive it on one condition—"

"Your ladyship has only to intimate—"

"That you will go through it all with Miss Macspleuchan; or, could n't we get up a sweet scene with my maid? Annette is a pretty little thing, and her broken English—"

"Your ladyship is pleased to be exceedingly severe; but I feel that I deserve it. Still, knowing your ladyship's good-nature, I will venture to ask one great favor, which, if you refuse, I will within an hour quit Yatton; that your ladyship will, in mercy to my feelings, mention this little scene to no one."

"If you wish it, Mr. Tuft, I will preserve your secret," she replied, in a kinder and more serious manner than he had ever witnessed in her; and, when he had escaped into solitude, he could hardly tell whom he hated most—himself or the Lady Cecilia. Several days afterward, the Marquis Gants-Jaunes de Millefleurs, purposing to quit Yatton on his way northward, sought a favorable opportunity to lay himself—the brilliant, irresistible Marquis—at the feet of the all-conquering Lady Cecilia, the future Lady Drelincourt, peeress in her own right, and mistress of the family estates. He had done the same kind of thing half a dozen times to as many women—all of them of ample fortune, and most of them, also, of rank. His manner was exquisitely delicate and winning; but Lady Cecilia, with a slight blush, (for she was really pleased,) calmly refused him. He saw it was utterly in vain; for a few moments he felt in an unutterably foolish position, but quickly recovering himself, assumed an air of delicate raillery, and put her into such good humor, that, forgetful in the moment of her promise to poor Tuft, she, in the strictest confidence in the world, communicated to the Marquis the offer which Mr. Tuft had been beforehand with him in making her! The Marquis's cheek flushed and tingled; and, without being able to analyse what passed through his mind, the result was, an intolerable feeling, as if he and Tuft were a couple of sneaking adventurers, and worse—of exposed adventurers. For almost the first time in his life, he felt an embarrassment amid the momentary conflict of his thoughts and feelings, which kept him silent. At length, "I presume, Lady Cecilia," said he, in a low tone, with an air of distress, and a glance that did more in his behalf with Lady Cecilia than a thousand of his most flattering and eloquent speeches, "I shall, in like manner, have afforded amusement to your ladyship and Mr. Tuft?"

"Sir," said she, haughtily, and coloring—"Mr. Tuft and the Marquis Gants-Jaunes de Millefleurs, are two very different persons; I am surprised, Monsieur le Marquis, that you should have made such an observation."

He felt greatly consoled, and perfectly secure against being exposed to Tuft, as Tuft had been exposed to him. Yet he was mistaken. How can the reader forgive Lady Cecilia for her double breach of promise, when he is informed that a day or two afterward, Tuft and she being thrown together, partly out of pity to her rejected and bitterly-mortified suitor, and partly from an impulse of womanly vanity, and partly from a sort of glimpse of even-handed justice, requiring such a step as a kind of reparation to Tuft for her exposure of him to the Marquis—she, in the strictest confidence, informed him that his example had been followed by the Marquis, forgetful of that excellent maxim, "begin nothing of which you have not well considered the end." It had not occurred to her ladyship as being a thing almost certain to ensue upon her breach of faith, that Tuft should ask her whether she had violated his confidence. He did so: she blushed scarlet—and though, like her papa, she could have equivocated when she could not have lied, here she was in a dilemma from which nothing but a fib could possibly extricate her; and in a confident tone, but with a burning cheek, she simply told a falsehood, and had the pain of being conscious, by Mr. Tuft's look, that he scarcely believed her. Nothing could exceed the comical air of embarrassment of the Marquis and Mr. Tuft, whenever, after this, they were alone together! To return, however, to the Earl of Dreddlington, (who was really in ignorance of the Marquis and Mr. Tuft's proposals to Lady Cecilia,) the difficulty which at present harassed his lordship was, how he could, without compromising his own dignity, or injuring his darling scheme by a premature development of his purpose, sound Titmouse upon the subject. How to break the ice—to broach the subject—was the great problem which the Earl turned over and over again in his mind. Now be it observed, that when a muddle-headed man is called upon at length to act, however long beforehand he may have had notice of it—however assured of the necessity there will be for eventually taking one course or another, and consequently enjoying an ample opportunity for consideration, he remains confused and irresolute up to the very last instant—when he acts, after all, merely as the creature of caprice and impulse,—'twas thus with Lord Dreddlington. He had thought of half-a-dozen different ways of commencing with Titmouse, and decided upon adopting each; yet, when the anxiously-looked-for moment had arrived, he lost sight of them all, in his inward fluster and narrowness.

'Twas noon, and Titmouse, smoking a cigar, was walking slowly up and down, his hands stuck into his suitout pockets, and resting on his hips, in the fir-tree walk at the end of the garden—the spot to which he seemed, during the stay of his grand guests, to have been tacitly restricted for the enjoyment of that luxury. When the Earl saw that Titmouse was aware that his lordship had observed him, and tossed aside his cigar, the Earl "begged" he would go on, and tried to calm and steady himself, by a moment's reflection upon his overwhelming superiority over Titmouse in every respect; but it was in vain.

Now what anxiety and embarrassment would the Earl have been spared had he been aware of one little fact, that Mr. Gammon was unconsciously, secretly, and potentially his lordship's friend in the great matter which lay so near to his heart? For so it was in truth. He had used all the art he was master of, and availed himself of all his mysterious power over Titmouse, to get him at all events to make an advance to his distinguished kinswoman. Considering, however, how necessary it was "to be off with the old love before he was on with the new," he had commenced operations by satisfying Titmouse how vain and hopeless, and, indeed, unworthy of him, was his passion for poor Miss Aubrey. Here, however, Gammon had not so much difficulty to contend with as he had anticipated; for Miss Aubrey's image had been long jostled out of his recollection, by the innumerable brilliant and fashionable women among whom he had been latterly thrown. When, therefore, Gammon informed him that Miss Aubrey had fallen into a decline; and that moreover, when he (Gammon) had according to his promise to Titmouse, taken an opportunity of pressing his wishes upon her, she had scornfully scouted the bare notion of such a thing; [all which was, of course, Mr. Gammon's pure invention]—

"Pon—my soul! The—devil—she did!" said Titmouse, with an air of insolent astonishment. "The gal's a devilish pretty gal, no doubt," he presently continued, knocking the ashes off his cigar, with an indifferent air; "but—it's too good a joke—pon my soul it is; but d'ye think, Gammon, she ever supposed I meant marriage? By Jove!" Here he winked his eye at Gammon, and then slowly expelled a mouthful of smoke. Gammon had grown pale with the conflict excited within, by the last words of the execrable little miscreant. He controlled his feelings, however, and succeeded in preserving silence.

"Ah—well!" continued Titmouse, after another whiff or two, with an air of commiseration, "if the poor gal's book'd—eh? it's n'q use; there's no harm done. Devilish poor, all of 'em, I hear! It's d—d hard, by the way, Gammon, that the prettiest gals are always the soonest picked off." As soon as Gammon had completely mastered his feelings, he proceeded to excite the pride and ambition of Titmouse, by representations of the splendor of an alliance with the last representative of so ancient and illustrious a house; in fact, when Gammon came, he said, to think of it, he found it was too grand a stroke, and that she would not entertain the notion for a moment; that she had refused crowds of young lords; that she would be a peeress of the realm in her own right, with an independent income of £5000 a-year; mansions, seats, and castles, in each of the four quarters of the kingdom—topics such as these excited and inflated him to the full extent desired by Mr. Gammon, who, moreover—that was the great topic of his last interview with Titmouse, before leaving Yatton, as I have already apprised the reader—with great solemnity of manner, gave him distinctly to understand, that on his being able to effect an alliance with the Lady Cecilia, absolutely depended his continuance in or expulsion from the possession of the whole Yatton property. Thus it came to pass, that Titmouse was penetrated by a far keener desire to ally himself to the Lady Cecilia, than ever the Earl had experienced to bring about such an auspicious event; and at the very moment of Titmouse's catching sight of the Earl, while pacing up and down the fir-tree walk, inhaling the soothing influence of his cigar—as I a short time ago presented him to the reader—he was tormenting himself with apprehensions that such a prize was too splendid for him to draw, and asking himself the constantly recurring question, how, in the name of all that was funny, could he set the thing a-going!—When Greek met Greek, then came—it was said—the tug of war; and when the Earl of Dreddlington and Titmouse—a great fool and a little fool—came to encounter each other—each impelled by the same wishes, and restrained by similar apprehensions—it was like the encounter of two wily diplomatists, sitting down with the intention of outwitting each other, in obtaining an object, in respect of which their aim was, unknown to each other in fact, precisely coincident, this hidden coincidence being the exact point which their exquisite manoeuvres had succeeded in reciprocally masking; it being quite possible for Talleyrand and Pozzo di Borgo, pitted against each other, under similar circumstances, to separate, after a dozen long conferences, each having failed to secure their common object—peace.

"Well, Mr. Titmouse"—commenced the Earl, blandly, springing at once, with graceful boldness, out of the mist, confusion, and perplexity which prevailed amongst his lordship's ideas—"what are you thinking about?—For you seem to be thinking!" and a courteous little laugh accompanied the last words.

"Pon—pon my life—I—beg your lordship's pardon—but it's—monstrous odd your lordship should have known it"—stammered Titmouse, his face suddenly growing of a scarlet color. "Sir," replied the Earl, with greater skill than he had ever evinced in his whole life before—such is the effect of any one's being intensely in earnest—"it is not at all odd, when it happens that—the probability is—that—we are, perhaps—mind, sir, I mean possibly—thinking about the same thing!" Titmouse grew more and more confused, gazing in silence, with a strange, simpering stare at his noble companion, who, with his hands joined behind him, was walking slowly along with Titmouse.

"Sir," continued the Earl, in a low tone, breaking a very awkward pause—"it gives me satisfaction to assure you, that I can fully appreciate the delicate embarrassment which I perceive you are now"—

"My lord—your lordship's most uncommon polite"—quoth Titmouse, suddenly taking off his hat, and bowing very low. The Earl moved his hat also, and slightly bowed, with a proudly-gratified air; and again occurred a little pause, which was broken by Titmouse.

"Then your lordship thinks it will do?" he inquired, very sheepishly, but anxiously.

"Sir, I have the honor to assure you, that as far as I am concerned, I see no objection."

"Yes—but excuse me, my lord—your lordship sees—I mean—my lord, your lordship sees?"

"Sir, I think—nay, I believe I do"—interrupted the Earl, wishing to relieve the evident embarrassment of his companion—"but—I see nothing that should alarm you."

[How interesting to watch the mysterious process by which these two powerful minds were gradually approximating toward understanding each other! 'Twas a sort of equation with an unknown quantity, in due course of evolution.]

"Does n't your lordship, indeed?" inquired Titmouse, rather briskly.

"Sir, it was a saying of one of the great—I mean, sir, it is—you must have often heard, sir—in short, nothing venture nothing have."

"I'd venture a precious deal, my lord, if I only thought I could get what I'm after."

"Sir?" exclaimed the Earl, condescendingly.

"If your lordship would only be so particular—so uncommon kind—as to name the thing to her ladyship—by way of—eh, my lord? A sort of breaking the ice, and all that?"

"Sir, I feel and have a just pride in assuring you, that the Lady Cecilia is a young lady of that superior delicacy of"—

"Does your lordship really think I've a ghost of a chance?" interrupted Titmouse, anxiously. "She must have named the thing to your lordship, no doubt—eh, my lord?"

This queer notion of the young lady's delicacy a little staggered her distinguished father for a moment or two. What was he to say? She and he had really often named the thing to each other; and here the question was put to him plumply. The Earl scorned a flat lie, and never condescended to equivocation except when it was absolutely necessary.

"Sir," he said, hesitatingly; "undoubtedly—if I were to say—that now and then, when your attentions have been so pointed—

"Pon my life, my lord, I never meant it; if your lordship will only believe me," interrupted Titmouse earnestly; "I beg a thousand pardons—I meant no harm, my lord."

"Sir, there is no harm done," said the Earl, kindly. "Sir, I know human nature too well, or I have lived thus long to little purpose, not to be aware that we are not always master of our own feelings."

"That's exactly it, my lord! Excuse me, but your lordship's hit the thing!"

"Do not imagine, Mr. Titmouse, that I think your attentions may have been unpleasant to the Lady Cecilia—by no means; I cannot, with truth, say any such thing!"

"Oh, my lord!" exclaimed Titmouse, taking off his hat, bowing, and placing his hand upon his breast, where his little heart was palpitating with unusual force and distinctness.

"Faint heart," says the proverb, Mr. Titmouse—ah, ha!" quoth the Earl with gentle gaiety.

"Yes, my lord, it's enough to make one faint, indeed! Now, if your lordship—(I'm not used to the sort of thing, my lord!)—would just make a sort of beginning for me, my lord, with the Lady Cicely—to set us going, my lord—the least above would do, my lord."

"Well, Mr. Titmouse," said the Earl, with a gracious smile, "since your modesty is so overpowering, I'll try—to become your ambassador to the Lady Cecilia. If, Mr. Titmouse," his lordship presently added, in a serious tone, "you are fortunate enough to succeed in engaging the affections of the Lady Cecilia, you will discover that you have secured indeed an invaluable prize."

"To be sure, my lord! And consider, too, her ladyship's uncommon high rank—it's so particular condescending. By the way, my lord, will she—if she and I can hit it off, so as to marry one another—be called Mrs. Titmouse, or shall I be called Lord Titmouse? I wonder how that will be, my lord? 'Tis only, your lordship understands, on Lady Cicely's account I ask, because it's, in course, all one to me when once we're married."

The Earl was gazing at him as he went on, with an expression of mingled surprise and concern: presently, however, he added with calm seriousness, "Sir, it is not an unreasonable question, though I should have imagined that you could hardly have been—but—in short the Lady Cecilia will retain her rank, and become the Lady Cecilia Titmouse—that is during my life: but, on my demise, she succeeds to the barony of Drelincourt, and then will be called, of course, Lady Drelincourt."

"And what shall I be then, my lord?" inquired Titmouse, eagerly.

"Sir, you will of course continue Mr. Titmouse"—"Pon my life, my lord, shall I, indeed?" he interrupted, with a crest-fallen air. "Mr. Titmouse and Lady Drelincourt? Excuse me, my lord, but it don't sound at all like man and wife!"

"Sir, so it always has been, and will be, and so it ever ought to be," replied the Earl, gravely.

"Well, but, my lord, (excuse me, my lord,) but marriage is a very serious thing, my lord, your lordship knows."

"It is, sir, indeed," replied the Earl, gloom visibly overspreading his features.

"Suppose," continued Titmouse, "Lady Cicely should die before me?"

The Earl, remaining silent, fixed on Titmouse the eye of a FATHER—a father, though a very foolish one; and presently, with a sensible tremor in his voice, replied, "Sir, these are rather singular questions—but, in such a mournful contingency as the one you have hinted at—"

"Oh, my lord! I humbly beg pardon—of course, I should be, 'pon my soul, my lord, most uncommon sorry," interrupted Titmouse, with a little alarm in his manner.

"I was saying, sir—that in such an event, if Lady Drelincourt left no issue, you would succeed to the barony; but should she leave issue, they will be called Honorables!"

"What!—the 'Honorable Tittlebat Titmouse,' if it's a boy, and the 'Honorable Cecilia Titmouse,' if it's a girl!"

"Sir, it will be so—unless you should choose to take the name and arms of Dreddingtons, on marrying the sole heiress!"

"Oh! indeed, my lord? 'Pon my life, my lord, that's worth considering—because I a n't over and above pleased with my own name. What will it cost to change it now, my lord?"

"Sir," said the Earl, struck with the idea, "that is really a matter worth considering. In a matter of that magnitude, sir, I presume that expense would not be a matter of serious consideration."

After some further conversation, the Earl came plump upon the great pivot upon which the whole arrangement was to turn—settlements and jointures—oh, as to them, Titmouse, who was recovering from the shock of the discovery that his marriage, however it might degrade the Lady Cecilia, would not enoble him—promised everything—would leave everything in the hands of his lordship. Soon afterward they separated; the Earl suggesting to him, that probably in a matter of infinite delicacy, like that on which they had been conversing, he would keep his own counsel; to which also Titmouse pledged himself. Soon afterward, and before seeing his daughter, with an anxious, but not an excited air, he ordered his horse and took a long ride, accompanied only by his groom: and if ever in his whole life he had attempted serious reflection it was on the occasion of that same long, slow, and solitary ride; then, for the first time, he forgot his peerage, and thought only of the man—and the father.

But to what purpose? Shortly after his return he sought the Lady Cecilia, and performed his promise, by preparing her to receive, probably on the ensuing day, the proposals of TITTLEBAT TITMOUSE.

The desired opportunity occurred the next day. Titmouse had slept like a top all night, after smoking in his bed-room a great many cigars, and drinking two or three tumblers of brandy and water; but Lady Cecilia had passed a very uneasy, and almost a sleepless night, and did not make her appearance at the breakfast-table. Understanding, however, that her ladyship was in the drawing-room and alone, about noon, Titmouse, who had bestowed during the interval more than usual pains upon his dress, gently opened the door, and observing that she was alone, reclining on the sofa, with a sudden beating of the heart, closed the door and approached her, bowing profoundly. Poor Lady Cecilia immediately sat up, very pale and trembling.

"Good-morning, good-morning, Lady Cicely," commenced Titmouse, taking a chair and sitting down in it, plump opposite to her.

"You are n't well this morning, are you, Lady Cicely?" said he, observing how pale she looked, and that she did not seem disposed to speak.

"I am quite well," she replied, in a low tone; and then each was silent.

"It's beginning to look like winter a little, eh, Lady Cicely?" said he, after an embarrassing pause, looking through the windows. 'Twas an overcast day; and a strong wind was stripping the bare and yellow leaves and in great number from the lofty trees which were not far distant, and which gave forth a melancholy, rushing, moaning sound; and another pause ensued.

"Certainly it is getting rather cheerless," replied Lady Cecilia. Titmouse turned pale; and, twirling his fingers in his hair, fixed upon her a stupid and most embarrassing look, under which her eyes fell toward the ground, and remained looking in that direction.

"I—I—hope his lordship's been saying a good word for me, Lady Cicely?"

"My father mentioned your name to me yesterday," she replied, trembling excessively.

"Pon my soul, monstrous kind!" said Titmouse, trying desperately to look at his ease. "Said he'd break the ice for me." Here ensued another pause. "Every body must have a beginning, you know. 'Pon my solemn honor, all he said about me is quite true." Profoundly as was Lady Cecilia depressed, she looked up at Titmouse for a moment with evident surprise. "Now, Lady Cicely, just as between friends, did n't he tell you something very particular about me? Did n't he? Eh?" She made him no answer.

"I dare say, Lady Cicely, though somehow you look sad enough, you a n't vexed to see me here? Eh? There's many and many a woman in London that would—but it's no use now. 'Pon my soul I love you, I do, Lady Cicely;" she trembled violently, for he was drawing his chair nearer to her. She felt sick—sick almost to death.

"I know it's—it's a monstrous unpleasant piece of—I mean it's an awkward thing to do; but I hope you love me, Lady Cicely, eh? a little?" Her head hung down, and a very scalding tear oozed out and trickled down her cheek. "Hope you ar' n't sorry, dear Lady Cicely? I'm most uncommon proud and happy! Come, Lady Cicely." He took the thin white hand that was nearest him, and raised it to his lips; had his perception been only a trifle keener, he could not have failed to perceive a faint thrill pervade Lady Cecilia as he performed this act of gallantry, and an expression of features which looked very much like disgust. He had soon love made on the stage frequently, and, as he had seen lovers do there, he now dropped down on one knee, still holding Lady Cecilia's hand in his, and pressing it a second time to his lips.

"If your ladyship will only make me—so happy—as to be—my wife—'pon my life, you're welcome to all I have; and you may consider this place entirely your own! Do you understand me, dearest Lady Cicely? Come! 'Pon my life—I'm quite distracted—do you love me, Lady Cicely? Only say the word." A faint—a very faint sound issued from her lips—'twas "Yes." Oh, poor Lady Cecilia! "Then, as true as God's in heaven, dear gal, I love you," said he, with ardor and energy; and rising from his knee, he sat down beside her upon the sofa—placed an arm round her waist, and with his other hand grasped hers and—imprinted a kiss upon the pale cheek which had been so haughtily withdrawn from the presumptuous advances of the Marquis de Millesseurs, and from some half-dozen others; several of whom were men of high real pretensions—elegant in person and manners—of great accomplishments—of intellect—of considerable fortune—of good family; but in her opinion, and that of the Earl, her father, not of family good enough, nor fortune considerable enough, to entitle them to an alliance with her.

"Pon my life, Lady Cicely, you are a most lovely gal," quoth Titmouse, with increasing energy—"and now you're all my own! Though I am only plain Mr. Titmouse, and you'll be Lady Cicely still. I'll make you a good husband!" and again he pressed her hand and kissed her cold cheek. But slow and dull as were the Lady Cecilia's feelings, they were becoming too much excited to admit of her continuing much longer in the room.

"I'm sure you'll excuse me, Mr. Titmouse," said she, rising, and speaking quickly and faintly. When she had regained her room, she wept bitterly for upwards of an hour; and Miss Macspleuchan, who knew full well the cause of it, knew not how to console one who had so deliberately prostrated herself before the hideous little image of Mammon; who, in degrading herself, had also—and Miss Macspleuchan's bosom swelled with wounded pride and indignation at the thought—degraded her whole sex. In due time, however, the Aurora, a morning fashionable London newspaper, thus announced to the public the auspicious event which I have so faithfully, feeling much pain the while, described to the reader:—

"It is rumored that Mr. Titmouse, who so lately recovered the very large estates of Yatton, in Yorkshire, and whose appearance in the fashionable world has created so great a sensation, and who is already connected, by consanguinity, with the ancient and noble family of Dreddington, is about to form a closer alliance with it, and is now the accepted suitor of the lovely and accomplished Lady Cecilia Philippe Leopoldina Plantagenet, sole daughter and heiress of the Right Hon. the Earl of Dreddington, and next in succession to the barony of Drelincourt, the most ancient, we believe, in the kingdom."

EXTRAORDINARY—If True—The Harrisburg Gazette tells of a soldier who, about one hundred and fifty years ago, was frozen in Siberia. The last expression he made was, "It is ex—". He then froze as stiff as marble. In the summer of 1840, some French physicians found him after having lain frozen one hundred and fifty years. They gradually thawed him. Upon animation being restored he concluded his sentence with "ceedingly cold."

Quilp was asked by a whig beggar how many inspectors there are in the Custom House?

"About forty inspectors," dryly answered Quilp, "and four hundred Exportors!"—[Boston Post.

Master Humphrey's Clock.

BARNABY RUDGE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

Clear of the locksmith's house, Sim Tappertit laid aside his cautious manner, and assuming in its stead that of a ruffling, swaggering, roving blade, who would rather kill a man than otherwise, and eat him too if needful, made the best of his way along the darkened streets.

Half pausing for an instant now and then to smite his pocket and assure himself of the safety of his master key, he hurried on to Barbican, and turning into one of the narrowest of the narrow streets which diverged from that centre, slackened his pace and wiped his heated brow, as if the termination of his walk were near at hand.

It was not a very choice spot for midnight expeditions, being in truth one of more than questionable character, and of an appearance by no means inviting. From the main street he had entered, itself little better than an alley, a low-browed doorway led into a blind court, or yard, profoundly dark, unpaved, and reeking with stagnant odors. Into this ill-favored pit, the locksmith's vagrant 'prentice groped his way; and stopping at a house, from whose defaced and rotten front the rude effigy of a bottle swung to and fro like some gibbeted malefactor, struck thrice upon an iron grating with his foot. After listening in vain for some response to his signal, Mr. Tappertit became impatient, and struck the grating thrice again.

A further delay ensued, but it was not of long duration. The ground seemed to open at his feet, and a ragged head appeared.

"Is that the captain?" said a voice as ragged as the head.

"Yes," replied Mr. Tappertit, haughtily, descending as he spoke, "who should it be?"

"It's so late, we gave you up," returned to voice, as its owner stopped to shut and fasten the grating. "You're late, sir."

"Lead on," said Mr. Tappertit, with a gloomy majesty, "and make remarks when I require you. Forward!"

This latter word of command was perhaps somewhat theatrical and unnecessary, inasmuch as the descent was by a very narrow, steep, and slippery flight of steps, and any rashness or departure from the beaten track must have ended in a yawning water-butt. But Mr. Tappertit being, like some other great commanders, favorable to strong effects, and personal display, cried "Forward!" again, in the hoarsest voice he could assume; and led the way, with folded arms and knitted brows, to the cellar down below, where there was a small copper fixed in one corner, a chair or two, a form and table, a glimmering fire, and a truckle-bed, covered with a ragged patchwork rug.

"Welcome, noble captain!" cried a lanky figure, rising as from a nap.

The captain nodded. Then, throwing off his outer coat, he stood composed in all his dignity, and eyed his follower over.

"What news to-night?" he asked, when he had looked into his soul.

"Nothing particular," replied the other, stretching himself—and he was so long already that it was quite alarming to see him do it—"how come you to be so late?"

"No matter," was all the captain deigned to say in answer. "Is the room prepared?"

"It is," replied his follower.

"The comrade—is he here?"

"Yes. And a sprinkling of the others—you hear 'em?"

"Playing skittles!" said the captain moodily. "Light-hearted revellers!"

There was no doubt respecting the particular amusement in which these heedless spirits were indulging, for even in the close and stifling atmosphere of the vault, the noise sounded like distant thunder. It certainly appeared, at first sight, a singular spot to choose, for that or any other purpose of relaxation, if the other cellars answered to the one in which this brief colloquy took place; for the floors were of sodden earth, the walls and roof of damp bare brick tapestried with the tracks of snails and slugs; the air was sickening, tainted, and offensive. It seemed, from one strong flavor which was uppermost among the various odors of the place, that it had, at no very distant period, been used as a storehouse for cheeses; a circumstance which, while it accounted for the greasy moisture that hung about it, was greatly suggestive of rats. It was naturally damp beside, and little trees of fungus sprang from every mouldering corner.

The proprietor of this charming retreat, and owner of the ragged head before-mentioned—for he wore an old tie-wig as bare and frouzy as a stunted hearth-broom—had by this time joined them; and stood a little apart, rubbing his hands, wagging his heavy bristled chin, and smiling in silence. His eyes were closed; but had they been wide open, it would have been easy to tell, from the attentive expression of the face he turned toward them—pale and unwholesome as might be expected in one of his underground existence—and from a certain anxious raising and quivering of the lids, that he was blind.

"Even Stagg hath been asleep," said the long comrade, nodding toward this person.

"Sound, captain, sound!" cried the blind man; "what does my noble captain drink—is it brandy, rum, usquebaugh? Is it soaked gunpowder, or blazing oil? Give it a name, heart of oak, and we'd get it for you, if it was wine from a bishop's cellar, or melted gold from King George's mint."

"See," said Mr. Tappertit, haughtily, "that it's something strong, and comes quick; and so long as you take care of that, you may bring it from the devil's cellar, if you like."

"Boldly said, noble captain!" rejoined the blind man. "Spoken like the 'Prentices' Glory. Ha, ha! From the devil's cellar! A brave joke! The captain joketh. Ha, ha, ha!"

"I'll tell you what, my fine feller," said Mr. Tappertit eyeing the host over as he walked to a closet, and to ck on a bottle and glass as carelessly as if he had been in full possession of his sight, "if you make that row, you'll find that the captain's very far from joking, and so I tell you."

"He's got his eyes on me!" cried Stagg, stopping short on his way back, and affecting to screen his face with the bottle. "I feel 'em though I can't see 'em. Take 'em off, noble captain. Remove 'em, for they pierce like gimlets."

Mr. Tappertit smiled grimly at his comrade; and twisting out one more look—a kind of ocular screw—under the influence of which the blind man feigned to undergo great anguish and torture, bade him, in a softened tone, approach, and hold his peace.

"I obey you, captain," cried Stagg, drawing close to him and filling out a bumper without spilling a drop, by reason that he held his little finger at the brim of the glass, and stopped at the instant the liquor touched it, "drink, noble governor. Death to all masters, life to all 'prentices, and love to all fair damsels. Drink, brave general, and warm your gallant heart!"

Mr. Tappertit condescended to take the glass from his outstretched hand. Stagg then dropped on one knee, and gently smoothed the calves of his legs, with an air of humble admiration.

"That I had but eyes!" he cried, "to behold my captain's symmetrical proportions! That I had but eyes, to look upon these twin invaders of domestic peace!"

"Get out!" said Mr. Tappertit, glancing downward at his favorite limbs. "Go along, will you, Stagg!"

"When I touch my own afterwards," cried the host, smiting them reproachfully, "I hate 'em. Comparatively speaking, they've no more shape than wooden legs, beside these models of my noble captain's."

"Yours!" exclaimed Mr. Tappertit. "No, I should think not. Don't talk about those precious old toothpicks in the same breath with mine; that's rather too much. Here. Take the glass. Benjamin. Lead on. To business!"

With these words, he folded his arms again; and frowning with a sullen majesty, passed with his companion through a little door at the upper end of the cellar, and disappeared; leaving Stagg to his private meditations.

The vault they entered, strewn with sawdust and dimly lighted, was between the outer one from which they had just come, and that in which the skittle-players were diverting themselves; as was manifested by the increased noise and clamor of tongues, which was suddenly stopped, however, and replaced by a dead silence, at a signal from the long comrade. Then, this young gentleman, going to a little cupboard, returned with a thigh-bone, which in former times must have been part and parcel of some individual at least as long as himself, and placed the same in the hands of Mr. Tappertit; who, receiving it as a sceptre and staff of authority, cocked his three-cornered hat fiercely on the top of his head, and mounted a large table, whereon a chair of state, cheerfully ornamented with a couple of skulls, was placed ready for his reception.

He had no sooner assumed this position, than another young gentleman appeared, bearing in his arms a huge clasped book, who made him a profound obeisance, and delivering it to the long comrade, advanced to the table, and turning his back upon it, stood there Atlas-wise. Then, the long comrade got upon the table too; and seating himself in a lower chair than Mr. Tappertit's, with much state and ceremony, placed the large book on the shoulders of their mute companion as deliberately as if he had been a wooden deak, and prepared to make entries therein with a pen of corresponding size.

When the long comrade had made these preparations, he looked toward Mr. Tappertit; and Mr. Tappertit, flourishing the bone, knocked nine times therewith upon one of the skulls. At the ninth stroke, a third young gentleman emerged from the door leading to the skittle ground, and bowing low, awaited his commands.

"Prentice!" said the mighty captain, "who waits without?"

The 'prentice made answer that a stranger was in attendance, who claimed admission into that secret society of 'Prentice Knights, and a free participation in their rights, privileges, and immunities. Thereupon Mr. Tappertit flourished the bone again, and giving the other skull a prodigious rap on the nose, exclaimed "Admit him!" At these dread words the 'prentice bowed once more, and so withdrew as he had come.

There soon appeared at the same door, two other 'prentices, having between them a third, whose eyes were bandaged, and who was attired in a bag-wig, and a broad-skirted coat, trimmed with tarnished lace; and who was girded with a sword, in compliance with the laws of the Institution regulating the introduction of candidates, which required them to assume this courtly dress, and kept it constantly in lavender, for their convenience. One of the conductors of this novice held a rusty blunderbuss pointed toward his ear, and the other a very ancient sabre, with which he carved imaginary offenders as he came along in a sanguinary and anatomical manner.

As this silent group advanced, Mr. Tappertit fixed his hat upon his head. The novice then laid his hand upon his breast and bent before him. When he had humbled himself sufficiently, the captain ordered the bandage to be removed, and proceeded to eye him over.

"Ha!" said the captain thoughtfully, when he had concluded this ordeal. "Proceed."

The long comrade read aloud as follows:—"Mark Gilbert. Age, nineteen. Bound to Thomas Curzon, hosier, Golden Fleece, Aldgate. Loves Curzon's daughter. Cannot say that Curzon's daughter loves him. Should think it probable. Curzon pulled his ears last Tuesday week."

"How!" cried the captain, starting.

"For looking at his daughter, please you," said the novice.

"Write Curzon down, Denounced," said the captain. "Put a black cross against the name of Curzon."

"So please you," said the novice. "that's not the worst—he calls his 'prentice idle dog, and steps his beer unless he works to his liking. He gives Dutch cheese, too, eating Cheshire, sir, himself; and Sundays out, are only once a month."

"This," said Mr. Tappertit, gravely, "is a flagrant case. Put two black crosses to the name of Curzon."

"If the society," said the novice, who was an ill-looking, one-sided, shambling lad, with sunken eyes set close together in his head—"if the society would burn his house down—for he's not insured—or beat him as he comes home from his club at night, or help me to carry off his daughter, and marry her at the Fleet, whether she gave consent or no—"

Mr. Tappertit waved his grizzly truncheon as an admonition to him not to interrupt, and ordered three black crosses to the name of Curzon.

"Which means," he said in a gracious explanation, "vengeance, complete and terrible. 'Prentice, do you love the Constitution?"

To which the novice (being to that end instructed by his attendant sponsors) replied, "I do!"

"The Church, the State, and everything established—but the masters?" quoth the captain.

Again the novice said, "I do."

Having said it, he listened meekly to the captain, who, in an address prepared for such occasions, told him how that under that same Constitution (which was kept in a strong-box somewhere, but where exactly he could not find out, or he would have endeavored to procure a copy of it), the 'prentices had, in times gone by, had frequent holidays of right, broken people's heads by scores, defied their masters, nay, even achieved some glorious murders in the streets, which privileges had gradually been wrested from them, and in all which noble aspirations they were now restrained; how the degrading checks imposed upon them were unquestionably attributable to the innovating spirit of the times, and how they united, therefore, to resist all change, except such change as would restore good old English customs, by which they would stand or fall. After illustrating the wisdom of going backward, by reference to that sagacious fish, the crab, and the not unfrequent practice of the mule and donkey, he described their general objects; which were briefly vengeance on their Tyrant Masters (of whose grievous and insupportable oppression no 'prentice could entertain a moment's doubt), and the restoration, as aforesaid, of their ancient rights and holidays; for neither of which objects were they now quite ripe, being barely twenty strong, but which they pledged themselves to pursue with fire and sword when needful. Then he described the oath which every member of that small remnant of a noble body took, and which was of a dreadful and impressive kind; binding him, at the bidding of his chief, to resist and obstruct the Lord Mayor, sword-bearer, and chaplain; to despise the authority of the sheriffs; and to hold the court of aldermen as nought; but not on any account, in case the fullness of time should bring a general rising of 'prentices, to damage or in any way disfigure Temple Bar, which was strictly constitutional and always to be approached with reverence. Having gone over these several heads with great eloquence and force, and having further informed the novice that this society had had its origin in his own teeming brain, stimulated by a swelling sense of wrong and outrage, Mr. Tappertit demanded whether he had strength of heart to take the mighty pledge required, or whether he would withdraw while retreat was yet within his power.

To this the novice made rejoinder that he would take the vow, though it should choke him; and it was accordingly administered with many impressive circumstances, among which the lighting up of the two skulls with a candle-end inside of each, and a great many flourishes with the bone, were chiefly conspicuous; not to mention a variety of grave exercises with the blunderbuss and sabre, and some dismal groaning by unseen 'prentices without. All these dark and direful ceremonies being at length completed, the table was put aside, the chair of state removed, the sceptre locked up in its usual cupboard, the doors of communication between the three cellars thrown freely open, and the 'Prentice Knights resigned themselves to merriment.

But Mr. Tappertit, who had a soul above the vulgar herd, and who, on account of his greatness, could only afford to be merry now and then, threw himself on a bench with the air of a man who was faint with dignity. He looked with an indifferent eye, alike on skittles, cards, and dice, thinking only of the locksmith's daughter, and the base degenerate days on which he had fallen.

"My noble captain neither games, nor sings, nor dances," said his host, taking a seat beside him. "Drink, gallant general!"

Mr. Tappertit drained the proffered goblet to the dregs; then thrust his hands into his pockets, and with a lowering visage walked among the skittles, while his followers (such is the influence of superior genius) restrained the ardent ball, and held his little shins in dumb respect.

"If I had been born a corsair or a pirate, a brigand, genteel highwayman or patriot—and they're the same thing," thought Mr. Tappertit, musing among the nine-pins, "I should have been all right. But to drag out an ignoble existence unknown to mankind in general—patience! I will be famous yet. A voice within me keeps on whispering Greatness. I shall burst out one of these days, and when I do, what power can keep me down? I feel my soul getting into my head at the idea. More drink there!"

"The novice," pursued Mr. Tappertit, not exactly in a voice of thunder, for his tones, to say the truth, were rather cracked and shrill—but very impressively, notwithstanding—"where is he?"

"Here, noble captain!" cried Stagg. "One stands beside me who I feel is a stranger."

"Have you," said Mr. Tappertit, letting his gaze fall on the party indicated, who was indeed the new knight, by this time restored to his own apparel: "Have you the impression of your street-door key in wax?"

The long comrade anticipated the reply, by producing it from the shelf on which it had been deposited.

"Good," said Mr. Tappertit, scrutinizing it attentively, while a breathless silence reigned around; for he had constructed secret door-keys for the whole society, and perhaps owed something of his influence to that mean and trivial circumstance—on such slight accidents do even men of mind depend!—"This is easily made. Come hither, friend."

With that, he beckoned the new knight apart, and putting the pattern in his pocket, motioned to him to walk by his side.

"And so," he said, when they had taken a few turns up and down, "you—you love your master's daughter?"

"I do," said the 'prentice. "Honor bright. No chaff, you know."

"Have you," rejoined Mr. Tappertit, catching him by the wrist, and giving him a look which would have been expressive of the most deadly malevolence, but from an accidental hiccup that rather interfered with it; "have you a rival?"

"Not as I know on," replied the 'prentice.

"If you had now—" said Mr. Tappertit—"what would you—eh?"

The 'prentice looked fierce and clenched his fists.

"It is enough," cried Mr. Tappertit hastily, "we understand each other. We are observed. I thank you."

So saying, he cast him off again; and calling the long comrade aside after taking a few hasty turns by himself, bade him immediately write and post against the wall, a notice, proscribing one Joseph Willet (commonly known as Joe) of Chigwell; forbidding all 'Prentice Knights to succor, comfort, or hold communion with him; and requiring them, on pain of excommunication, to molest, hurt, wrong, annoy, and pick quarrels with the said Joseph, whenever and wheresoever they, or any of them, should happen to encounter him.

Having relieved his mind by this energetic proceeding, he condescended to approach the festive board, and warming by degrees, at length deigned to preside, and even to enchant the company with a song. After this, he rose to such a pitch as to consent to regale the society with a hornpipe, which he actually performed to the music of a fiddle (played by an ingenious member) with such surpassing agility and brilliancy of execution, that the spectators could not be sufficiently enthusiastic in their admiration; and their host protested, with tears in his eyes, that he had never truly felt his blindness until that moment.

But the host withdrawing—probably to weep in secret—soon returned with the information that it wanted little more than an hour of day, and that all the cocks in Barbican had already begun to crow, as if their lives depended on it. At this intelligence, the 'Prentice Knights arose in haste, and marshalling into a line, filed off one by one and dispersed with all speed to their several homes, leaving their leader to pass the grating last.

"Good night, noble captain," whispered the blind man as he held it open for his passage out. "Farewell brave general. Bye, bye, illustrious commander. Good luck go with you for a—conceited, bragging, empty-headed, duck-legged idiot."

With which parting words, coolly added as he listened to his receding footsteps and locked the grate upon himself, he descended the steps, and lighting the fire below the little copper, prepared, without any assistance, for his daily occupation; which was to retail at the area-head above pennyworths of broth and soup, and savory puddings, compounded of such scraps as were to be bought in the heap for the last money at Fleet Market in the evening time; and for the sale of which he had need to have depended chiefly on his private connexion, for the court had no thoroughfare, and was not that kind of place in which many people were likely to take the air, or to frequent as an agreeable promenade.

CHAPTER IX.

Chroniclers are privileged to enter where they list, to come and go through keyholes, to ride upon the wind, to overcome, in their soarings up and down, all obstacles of distance, time, and place. Thrice blessed be this last consideration, since it enables us to follow the diadainful Miggs even into the sanctity of her chamber, and to hold her in sweet companionship through the dreary watches of the night!

Miss Miggs, having undone her mistress, as she phrased it, (which means, assisted to undress her,) and having seen her comfortably to bed in the back-room on the first floor, withdrew to her own apartment, in the attic story. Notwithstanding her declaration in the locksmith's presence, she was in no mood for sleep; so, putting her light upon the table and withdrawing the little window curtain, she gazed out pensively at the wild night sky.

Perhaps she wondered what star was destined for her habitation when she had run her little course below; perhaps speculated which of those glimmering spheres might be the natural orbit of Mr. Tappertit; perhaps marvelled how they could gaze down on that perfidious creature, man, and not sicken and turn green as chemists' lamps; perhaps thought of nothing in particular. Whatever she thought about, there she sat, until her attention, alive to anything connected with the insinuating 'prentice, was attracted by a noise in the next room to her own—his room; the room in which he slept, and dreamed—it might be, sometimes dreamed of her.

That he was not dreaming now, unless he was taking a walk in his sleep, was clear, for every now and then there came a shuffling noise, as though he were engaged in polishing the whitewashed wall; then a gentle creaking of his door; then the faintest indication of his stealthy footsteps on the landing-place outside. Noting this latter circumstance, Miss Miggs turned pale and shuddered, as mistrusting his intentions; and more than once exclaimed, below her breath, "Oh! what a Providence it is as I am bolted in!"—which, owing doubtless to her alarm, was a confusion of ideas on her part between a bolt and its use; for though there was one on the door, it was not fastened.

Miss Miggs' sense of hearing, however, having as sharp an edge as her temper, and being of the same snappish and suspicious kind, very soon informed her that the footsteps passed her door, and appeared to have some object quite separate and disconnected from herself. At this discovery she became more alarmed than ever, and was about to give utterance to those cries of "Thieves!" and "Murder!" which she had hitherto restrained, when it occurred to her to look softly out, and see that her fears had some good palpable foundation.

Looking out accordingly, and stretching her neck over the hand rail, she desisted, to her great amazement, Mr. Tappertit completely dressed, stealing down stairs, one step at a time, with his shoes in one hand and a lamp in the other. Following him with her eyes, and going down a little way herself to get the better of an intervening angle, she beheld him trust his head in at the parlor door, draw it back again with great swiftness, and immediately begin a retreat up stairs with all possible expedition.

"Here's mysteries!" said the damsel, when she was safe in her own room again, quite out of breath. "Oh gracious, here's mysteries!"

The prospect of finding anybody out in anything, would have kept Miss Miggs awake under the influence of herbane. Presently she heard the step again, as she would have done if it had been that of a feather endowed with motion and walking down on tiptoe. Then gliding out as before, she again beheld the retreating figure of the 'prentice; again he looked cautiously in at the parlor door, but this time, instead of retreating, he passed in and disappeared.

Miggs was back in her room, and had her head out of the window, before an elderly gentleman could have winked and recovered from it. Out he came at the street door, shut it carefully behind him, tried it with his knee, and swaggered off, putting something in his pocket as he went along. At this spectacle Miggs cried "Gracious!" again, and then "Goodness gracious!" and then, "Goodness gracious me!" and then, candle in hand, went down stairs as he had done. Coming to the workshop, she saw the lamp burning on the forge, and everything as Sim had left it.

"Why I wish I may only have a walking funeral, and never be buried decent with a mourning-coach and feathers, if the boy hasn't been and made a key for his own self!" cried Miggs. "Oh the little villain!"

This conclusion was not arrived at without consideration, and much peeping and peering about; nor was it unassisted by the recollection that she had on several occasions come upon the 'prentice suddenly, and found him busy at some mysterious occupation. Least the fact of Miss Miggs calling him, on whom she stooped to cast a favorable eye, a boy, should create surprise in any breast, it may be observed that she invariably affected to regard all male bipeds under thirty as mere chits and infants; which phenomenon is not unusual in ladies of Miss Miggs's temper, and is indeed generally found to be the associate of such indomitable and savage virtue.

Miss Miggs deliberated within herself for some little time, looking hard at the shop door while she did so, as though her eyes and thoughts were both upon it; and then, taking a sheet of paper from a drawer, twisted it into a long thin spiral tube. Having filled this instrument with a quantity of small coal dust from the forge, she approached the door, and dropping on one knee before it, dexterously blew into the keyhole as much of these fine ashes as the lock would hold. When she had filled it to the brim in a very workmanlike and skilful manner, she crept up stairs again, and chuckled as she went.

"There!" cried Miggs, rubbing her hands, "now let's see whether you won't be glad to take some notice of me, mister. He, he, he! You'll have eyes for somebody besides Miss Dolly now, I think. A fat-faced puss she is, as ever I come across!"

As she uttered this criticism, she glanced approvingly at her small mirror, as who should say, I thank my stars that can't be said of me!—as it certainly could not; for Miss Miggs's style of beauty was of that kind which Mr. Tappertit himself had not inaptly termed, in private, "scraggy."

"I don't go to bed this night!" said Miggs, wrapping herself in a shawl, drawing a couple of chairs near the window, flouncing down upon one, and putting her feet upon the other, "till you come home, my lad. I wouldn't," said Miggs viciously, "no, not for five-and-forty pound!"

With that, and with an expression of face in which a great number of opposite ingredients, such as mischief, cunning, malice, triumph, and patient expectation, were all mixed up together in a kind of physiognomical punch, Miss Miggs composed herself to wait and listen, like some fair ogress who had set a trap and was watching for a nibble from a plump young traveller.

She sat there, with perfect composure, all night. At length, just upon break of day, there was a footstep in the street, and presently she could hear Mr. Tappertit stop at the door. Then she could make out that he tried his key—that he was blowing into it—that he knocked it on the nearest post to beat the dust out—that he took it under a lamp to look at it—that he poked bits of stick into the lock to clear it—that he peeped into the keyhole, first with one eye, and then with the other—that he tried the key again—that he could not turn it, and what was worse could not get it out—that he bent it—that then it was much less disposed to come out than before—that he gave it a mighty twist and a great pull, and then it came out so suddenly that he staggered backward—that he kicked the door—that he shook it—finally, that he smote his forehead, and sat down on the step in despair.

When this crisis had arrived, Miss Miggs, affecting to be exhausted with terror, and to cling to the window-sill for support, put out her nightcap, and demanded in a faint voice who was there.

Mr. Tappertit cried "Hush!" and, backing into the road, exhorted her in frenzied pantomime to secrecy and silence.

"Tell me one thing," said Miggs. "Is it thieves?"

"No—no—no!" cried Mr. Tappertit.

"Then," said Miggs, more faintly than before, "it's fire. Where is it, sir? It's near this room, I know. I've a good conscience, sir, and would much rather die than go down a ladder. All I wish is, respecting my love to my married sister, Golden Lion Court, number twenty-six, second bell-handle on the right hand door-post."

"Miggs!" cried Mr. Tappertit, "do n't you know me? Sim, you know—Sim!"

"Oh! what about him!" cried Miggs, clasping her hands. "Is he in any danger? Is he in the midst of flames and blazes? Oh gracious, gracious!"

"Why I'm here, an't I?" rejoined Mr. Tappertit, knocking himself on the breast. "Do n't you see me? What a fool you are, Miggs!"

"There!" cried Miggs, unmindful of this compliment. "Why—so it—Goodness, what is the meaning of—If you please, Mim, here's—"

"No, no!" cried Mr. Tappertit, standing on tiptoe, as if by that means he, in the street, were any nearer being able to stop the mouth of Miggs in the garret. "Do n't—I've been out without leave, and something or another's the matter with the lock. Come down, and undo the shop window, that I may get in that way."

"I durst n't do it, Simmun," cried Miggs—for that was her pronunciation of his christian name. "I durst n't do it, indeed. You know, as well as any body, how particular I am. And to come down in the dead of night, when the house is wrapped in slumbers and veiled in obscurity. And there she stopped and shivered, for her modesty caught cold at the very thought.

"But Miggs," cried Mr. Tappertit, getting under the lamp, that she might see his eyes. "My darling Miggs"—Miggs screamed slightly.

"—That I love so much, and never can help thinking of,—and it is impossible to describe the use he made of his eyes when he said this—"do—for my sake, do."

"Oh Simmun," cried Miggs, "this is worse than all. I know if I come down, you'll go, and—"

"And what, my precious?" said Mr. Tappertit.

"And try," said Miggs, hysterically, "to kiss me, or some such dreadful thing; I know you will!"

"I swear I won't," said Mr. Tappertit, with remarkable earnestness. "Upon my soul I won't. It's getting broad day and the watchman's waking up. Angelica Miggs! If you'll only come and let me in, I promise you faithfully and truly I won't."

Miss Miggs, whose gentle heart was touched, did not wait for the oath (knowing how strong the temptation was, and fearing he might forswear himself), but tripped lightly down the stairs, and with her own fair hands drew back the rough fastenings of the workshop window. Having helped the wayward 'prentice in, she faintly articulated the words "Simmun is safe!" and yielding to her woman's nature, immediately became insensible.

"I knew I should quench her," said Sim, rather embarrassed by this circumstance. "Of course I was certain it would come to this, but there was nothing else to be done—if I had n't eyed her over, she would n't have come down. Here. Keep up a minute, Miggs. What a slippery figure she is! There's no holding her comfortably. Do keep up a minute, Miggs, will you?"

As Miggs, however, was deaf to all entreaties, Mr. Tappertit leant her against the wall as one might dispose of a walking-stick or umbrella, until he had secured the window, when he took her in his arms again, and, in short stages and with great difficulty—arising mainly from her being tall and his being short, and perhaps in some degree from that peculiar physical conformation on which he had already remarked—carried her up stairs, and planting her, in the same umbrella or walking-stick fashion, just inside her own door, left her to her repose.

"He may be as cool as he likes," said Miss Miggs, recovering as soon as she was left alone; "but I'm in his confidence and he can't help himself, nor could n't if he was twenty Simmunes!"

CHAPTER X.

It was on one of those mornings, common in early spring, when the year, fickle and changeable in its youth like all other created things, is undecided whether to step backward into winter or forward into summer, and in its uncertainty inclines now to the one and now to the other, and now to both at once—wooling summer in the sunshine, and lingering still with winter in the shade—it was, in short, on one of those mornings, when it is hot and cold, wet and dry, bright and lowering, sad and cheerful, withering and genial, in the compass of one short hour, that old John Willet, who was dropping asleep over the copper boiler, was roused by the sound of a horse's feet, and glancing out at window, beheld a traveller of goodly promise checking his bridle at the Maypole door.

He was none of your flippant young fellows, who would call for a tankard of mulled ale, and make themselves as much at home as if they had ordered a hog'shead of wine; none of your audacious young swaggerers, who would even penetrate into the bar—that solemn sanctuary—and, smiting old John upon the back, inquire if there was never a pretty girl in the house, and where he hid his little chambermaids, with a hundred other impertinencies of that nature; none of your free-and-easy companions, who would scrape their boots upon the fire-dogs in the common room, and be not at all particular on the subject of spittoons; none of your unconscionable blades, requiring impossible chops, and taking unheard-of pickles for granted. He was a staid, grave, placid gentleman, something past the prime of life, yet upright in his carriage, for all that, and slim as a greyhound. He was well-mounted upon a sturdy chestnut cob, and had the graceful seat of an experienced horseman; while his riding gear, though free from such fopperies as were then in vogue, was handsome and well chosen. He wore a riding-coat of a somewhat brighter green than might have been expected to suit the taste of a gentleman of his years, with a short black velvet cape, laced pocket-holes and cuffs, all of a jaunty fashion; his linen, too, was of the finest kind, worked in a rich pattern at the wrists and throat, and scrupulously white. Although he seemed, judging from the mud he had picked up on the way, to have come from London, his horse was as smooth and cool as his own iron-grey periwig and pig-tail. Neither man nor beast had turned a single hair; and, saving for his soiled skirts and spatter-dashes, this gentleman, with his blooming face, white teeth, exactly-ordered dress, and perfect calmness, might have come from making an elaborate and leisurely toilet, to sit for an equestrian portrait at old John Willet's gate.

It must not be supposed that John observed these several characteristics by other than very slow degrees, or that he took in more than half a one at a time, or that he even made up his mind upon that, without a great deal of very serious consideration. Indeed, if he had been distracted in the first instance by questionings and orders, it would have taken him at the least a fortnight to have noted what is here set down; but it happened that the gentleman, being struck with the old house, or with the plump pigeons which were skimming and curtsying about it, or with the tall maypole, on the top of which a weathercock, which had been out of order for fifteen years, performed a perpetual walk to the music of its own creaking, sat for some little time looking round in silence. Hence John, standing with his hand upon the horse's bridle, and his great eyes on the rider, and with nothing passing to divert his thoughts, had really got some of these little circumstances into his brain, by the time he was called to speak.

"A quaint place this," said the gentleman—and his voice was as rich as his dress. "Are you the landlord?"

"At your service, sir," replied John Willet.

"You can give my horse good stabling, can you, and me an early dinner (I am not particular what, so that it be cleanly served,) and a decent room—of which there seems to be no lack in this great mansion," said the stranger, again running his eyes over the exterior.

"You can have, sir," returned John, with a readiness quite surprising, "any thing you please."

"It's well I am easily satisfied," returned the other with a smile "or that might prove a hardy pledge, my friend." And saying so, he dismounted, with the aid of the block before the door, in a twinkling.

"Halloa there! Hugh!" roared John. "I ask your pardon, sir, for keeping you standing in the porch; but my son has gone to town on business, and the boy being, as I may say, of a kind of use to me, I'm rather put out when he's away. Hugh!—a dreadful idle vagrant fellow, sir—half a gipsy as I think—always sleeping in the sun in summer, and in the straw in winter time air—Hugh! Dear Lord, to keep a gentleman a waiting here, through him!—Hugh! I wish that chap was dead, I do indeed."

"Possibly he is," returned the other. "I should think if he were living he would have heard you by this time."

"In his fits of laziness, he sleeps so desperate hard," said the distracted host, "if you were to fire off cannon-balls into his ears, it would n't wake him, sir."

The guest made no remark upon this novel cure for drowsiness, and recipe for making people lively, but with his hands clasped behind him stood in the porch, apparently very much amused to see old John, with the bridle in his hand, wavering between a strong impulse to abandon the animal to his fate, and a half disposition to lead him into the house, and shut him up in the parlor, while he waited on his master.

"Pillory the fellow, here he is at last," cried John, in the very height and zenith of his distress. "Did you hear me calling, villain?"

The figure he addressed made no answer, but putting his hand upon the saddle, sprang into it at a bound, turned the horse's head toward the stable, and was gone in an instant.

"Brisk enough when he is awake," said the guest.

"Brisk enough, sir!" replied John, looking at the place where the horse had been, as if he did not yet understand quite, what had become of him. "He melts, I think. He goes like a drop of froth. You look at him, and there he is. Yet look at him again, and—there he is n't."

Having, in the absence of any more words, put this sudden climax to what he had faintly intended should be a long explanation of the whole life and character of his man, the oracular John Willet led the gentleman up his wide dismantled staircase into the Maypole's best apartment.

It was spacious enough in all conscience, occupying the whole depth of the house, and having at either end a great bay window, as large as many modern rooms; in which some few panes of stained glass, emblazoned with fragments of armorial bearings, though cracked, and patched, and shattered, yet remained, attesting, by their presence, that the former owner had made the very light subservient to his state, and pressed the sun itself into his list of flatterers; bidding it, when it shone into his chamber, reflect the badges of his ancient family, and take new hues and colors from their pride.

But these were old days, and now every little ray came and went as it would; telling the plain, bare, searching truth. Although the best room of the inn, it had the melancholy aspect of grandeur in decay, and was much too vast for comfort. Rich rustling hangings, waving on the walls; and, better far, the rustling of youth and beauty's dress; the light of women's eyes, outshining the tapers and their own rich jewels; the sound of gentle tongues, and music, and the tread of maiden feet, had once been there, and filled it with delight. But they were gone, and with them all its gladness. It was no longer a home; children were never born and bred there; the fireside had become mercenary—a something to be bought and sold—a very courtesan: let who would die, or sit beside, or leave it, it was still the same—it missed nobody, cared for nobody, had equal warmth and smiles for all. God help the man whose heart ever changes with the world, as an old mansion when it becomes an inn!

No effort had been made to furnish this chilly waste, but before the broad chimney a colony of chairs and tables had been planted on a square of carpet, flanked by a ghostly screen, enriched with figures, grinning and grotesque. After lighting with his own hands the faggots which were heaped upon the hearth, old John withdrew to hold grave council with his cook, touching the stranger's entertainment; while the guest himself, seeing small comfort in the yet unkindled wood, opened a lattice in the distant window, and basked in a sickly gleam of cold March sun.

Leaving the window now and then, to rake the crackling logs together, or pace the echoing room from end to end, he closed it when the fire was quite burnt up, and having wheeled the easiest chair into the warmest corner summoned John Willet.

"Sir," said John.

He wanted pen, ink and paper. There was an old standish on the high mantel-shelf containing a dusty apology for all three. Having set this before him, the landlord was retiring, when he motioned him to stay.

"There's a house not far from here," said the guest when he had written a few lines, "which you call the Warren, I believe?"

As this was said in the tone of one who knew the fact, and asked the question as a thing of course, John contented himself with nodding his head in the affirmative; at the same time taking one hand out of his pocket to cough behind, and then putting it in again.

"I want this note"—said the guest, glancing on what he had written, and folding it, "conveyed there without loss of time, and an answer brought back here. Have you a messenger at hand?"

John was thoughtful for a minute or thereabouts, and then said Yes.

"Let me see him," said the guest.

This was disconcerting; for Joe being out, and Hugh engaged in rubbing down the chestnut cob, he designed sending on the errand Barnaby, who had just then arrived in one of his rambles, and who, so that he thought himself employed on grave and serious business, would go anywhere.

"Why, the truth is," said John after a long pause, "that the person who'd go quickest, is a sort of natural, as one may say, sir; and though quick of foot, and as much to be trusted as the post itself, he's not good at talking, being touched and flighty, sir."

"You do n't," said the guest, raising his eyes to John's fat face, "you do n't mean—what's the fellow's name—you do n't mean Barnaby?"

"Yes I do," returned the landlord, his features turning quite expressive with surprise.

"How comes he to be here?" inquired the guest, leaning back in his chair, speaking in the bland, even tone, from which he never varied; and with the same soft, courteous, never-changing smile upon his face. "I saw him in London last night."

"He's for ever here one hour, and there the next," returned old John, after the usual pause to get the question in his mind. "Sometimes he walks, and sometimes runs. He's known along the road by everybody, and sometimes comes here in a cart or chaise, and sometimes riding double. He comes and goes, through wind, rain, snow and hail, and on the darkest nights. Nothing hurts him."

"He goes often to this Warren, does he not?" said the guest carelessly. "I seem to remember his mother telling me something to that effect yesterday. But I was not attending to the good woman much."

"You're right sir," John made answer, "he does. His father, sir, was murdered in that house."

"So I have heard," returned the guest taking a gold toothpick from his pocket with the same sweet smile. "A very disagreeable circumstance for the family."

"Very," said John with a puzzled look, as if it occurred to him, dimly and afar off, that this might by possibility be a cool way of treating the subject.

"All the circumstances after a murder," said the guest soliloquising, "must be dreadfully unpleasant—so much bustle and disturbance—no repose—a constant dwelling upon one subject—and the running in and out, and up and down stairs, intolerable. I would n't have such a thing happen to anybody I was nearly interested in, on any account. 'T would be enough to wear one's life out. You were going to say, friend—" he added, turning to John again.

"Only that Mrs. Rudge lives on a little pension from the family, and that Barnaby's as free of the house as any cat or dog about it," answered John. "Shall he do your errand, sir?"

"Oh yes," replied the guest. "Oh certainly. Let him do it by all means. Please to bring him here that I may charge him to be quick. If he objects to come you may tell him it's Mr. Chester. He will remember my name, I dare say."

John was so very much astonished to find who his visitor was, that he could express no astonishment at all, by looks or otherwise, but left the room as if he were in the most placid and imperturbable of all conditions. It has been reported that when he got down stairs, he looked steadily at the boiler for ten minutes by the clock, and all that time never once left off shaking his head; for which statement there would seem to be some ground of truth and feasibility, inasmuch as that interval of time did certainly elapse before he returned with Barnaby to the guest's apartment.

"Come hither lad," said Mr. Chester. "You know Mr. Geoffrey Haredale?"

Barnaby laughed, and looked at the landlord as though he would say, "You hear him?" John, who was greatly shocked at this breach of decorum, clapped his finger to his nose, and shook his head in mute remonstrance.

"He knows him, sir," said John, frowning aside at Barnaby, "as well as you or I do."

"I have n't the pleasure of much acquaintance with the gentleman," returned his guest. "You may have. Limit the comparison to yourself, my friend."

Although this was said with the same easy affability, and the same smile, John felt himself put down, and laying the indignity at Barnaby's door, determined to kick his raven, on the very first opportunity.

"Give that," said the guest, who had by this time sealed the note, and who beckoned his messenger toward him as he spoke, "into Mr. Haredale's own hands. Wait for an answer, and bring it back to me—here. If you should find that Mr. Haredale is engaged just now, tell him—can he remember a message, landlord?"

"When he chooses, sir," replied John. "He won't forget this one."

"How are you sure of that?"

John merely pointed to him as he stood with his head bent forward, and his earnest gaze fixed closely on his questioner's face; and nodded sagely.

"Tell him, then, Barnaby, should he be engaged," said Mr. Chester, "that I shall be glad to wait his convenience here, and to see him (if he will call) at any time this evening. At the worst I can have a bed here, Willet, I suppose?"

Old John, immensely flattered by the personal notoriety implied in this familiar form of address, answered, with something like a knowing look, "I should believe you could sir," and was turning over in his mind various forms of eulogium, with the view of selecting one appropriate to the qualities of his best bed, when his ideas were put to flight by Mr. Chester giving Barnaby the letter, and bidding him make all speed away.

"Speed!" said Barnaby, folding the little packet in his breast, "Speed! If you want to see hurry and mystery, come here. Here!"

With that, he put his hand, very much to John Willet's horror, on the guest's fine broadcloth sleeve, and led him stealthily to the back window.

"Look down there," he said softly; "do you mark how they whisper in each other's ears; then dance and leap, to make believe they are in sport? Do you see how they stop for a moment, when they think there is no one looking, and mutter among themselves again; and then how they roll and gambol, delighted with the mischief they've been plotting? Look at 'em now. See how they whirl and plunge. And now they stop again, and whisper, cautiously together—little thinking, mind, how often I have lain upon the grass and watched them. I say—what is it that they plot and hatch? Do you know?"

"They are only clothes," returned the guest, "such as we wear; hanging on those lines to dry, and fluttering in the wind."

"Clothes!" echoed Barnaby, looking close into his face, and falling quickly back. "Ha, ha! Why, how much better to be silly, than as wise as you! You do n't see shadowy people there, like those that live in sleep—not you. Nor eyes in the knotted panes of glass, nor swift ghosts when it blows hard, nor do you hear voices in the air, nor see men stalking in the sky—not you! I lead a merrier life than you, with all your cleverness. You're the dull men. We're the bright ones. Ha! ha! I'll not change with you, clever as you are—not I!"

With that, he waved his hat above his head, and darted off.

"A strange creature, upon my word!" said the guest, pulling out a handsome box, and taking a pinch of snuff.

"He wants imagination," said Mr. Willet, very slowly, and after a long silence; "that's what he wants. I've tried to instil it into him, many and many's the time; but"—John added to this in confidence—"he an't made for it; that's the fact."

To record that Mr. Chester smiled at John's remark, would be little to the purpose, for he preserved the same conciliatory and pleasant look at all times. He drew his chair nearer to the fire though, as a kind of hint that he would prefer to be alone, and John, having no reasonable excuse for remaining, left him to himself.

Very thoughtful old John Willet was, while the dinner was preparing; and if his brain were ever less clear at one time than another, it is but reasonable to suppose that he added it in no small degree by shaking his head so much that day. That Mr. Chester, between whom and Mr. Haredale, it was notorious to all the neighborhood, a deep and bitter animosity existed, should come down there for the sole purpose, as it seemed, of seeing him, and should choose the Maypole for their place of meeting, and should send to him express, were stumbling blocks John could not overcome. The only resource he had, was to consult the boiler, and wait impatiently for Barnaby's return.

But Barnaby delayed beyond all precedent. The visitor's dinner was served, removed, his wine was set, the fire replenished, the hearth clean swept; the light waned without, it grew dusk, became quite dark, and still no Barnaby appeared. Yet, though John Willet was full of wonder and misgiving, his guest sat cross-legged in the easy chair, to all appearance as little ruffled in his thoughts as in his dress—the same calm, easy, cool gentleman, without a care or thought beyond his golden toothpick.

"Barnaby's late," John ventured to observe, as he placed a pair of tarnished candlesticks, some three feet high, upon the table, and snuffed the lights they held.

"He is rather so," replied the guest, sipping his wine. "He will not be much longer, I dare say."

John coughed and raked the fire together.

"As your roads bear no very good character, if I may judge from my son's mishap, though," said Mr. Chester, "and as I have no fancy to be knocked on the head—which is not only disconcerting at the moment, but places one, besides, in a ridiculous position with respect to the people who chance to pick one up—I shall stop here to-night. I think you said you had a bed to spare?"

"Such a bed, sir," returned John Willet; "ay, such a bed as few, even of the gentry's houses, own. A fixter here, sir. I've heard say that bedstead is nigh two hundred years of age. Your noble son—a fine young gentleman—slept in it last, sir, half a year ago."

"Upon my life, a recommendation!" said the guest, shrugging his shoulders and wheeling his chair nearer to the fire. "See that it be well aired, Mr. Willet, and let a blazing fire be lighted there at once. This house is something damp and chilly."

John raked the faggots up again, more from habit than presence of mind, or any reference to this remark, and was about to withdraw, when a bounding step was heard upon the stair, and Barnaby came panting in.

"He'll have his foot in the stirrup in an hour's time," he cried, advancing. "He has been riding hard all day—has just come home—but will be in the saddle again, as soon as he has eat and drank, to meet his loving friend."

"Was that his message?" asked the visitor, looking up, but without the smallest discomposure—or at least without the show of any.

"All but the last words," Barnaby rejoined. "He meant those. I saw that, in his face."

"This for your pains," said the other, putting money in his hand, and glancing at him steadfastly. "This for your pains, sharp Barnaby."

"For Grip, and me, and Hugh, to share among us," he rejoined, putting it up, and nodding, as he counted it on his fingers. "Grip one, me two, Hugh three; the dog, the goat, the cats—well, we shall spend it pretty soon, I warn you. Stay.—Look. Do you wise men see nothing there, now?"

He bent eagerly down on one knee, and gazed intently at the smoke, which was rolling up the chimney in a thick black cloud. John Willet, who appeared to consider himself particularly and chiefly referred to under the term wise men, looked that way likewise, and with great solidity of feature.

"Now, where do they go to, when they spring so fast up there," asked Barnaby; "eh? Why do they tread so closely on each other's heels, and why are they always in a hurry—which is what you blame me for, when I only take pattern by these busy folk about me. More of 'em! catching to each other's skirts; and as fast as they go, others come! What a merry dance it is! I would that Grip and I could frisk like that!"

"What has he in that basket at his back?" asked the guest after a few moments, during which Barnaby was still bending down to look higher up the chimney, and earnestly watching the smoke.

"In this?" he answered, jumping up, before John Willet could reply—shaking it as he spoke, and stooping his head to listen. "In this? What is there here? Tell him!"

"A devil, a devil, a devil," cried a hoarse voice.

"Here's money!" said Barnaby, chinking it in his hand, "money for a treat, Grip!"

"Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah!" replied the raven, "keep up your spirits. Never say die. Bow, wow, wow!"

Mr. Willet, who appeared to entertain strong doubts whether a customer in a laced coat and fine linen could be supposed to have any acquaintance even with the existence of such unpollite gentry as the bird claimed to belong to, took Barnaby off at this juncture, with the view of preventing any other improper declarations, and quitted the room with his very best bow.

CHAPTER XI.

There was great news that night for the regular Maypole customers, to each of whom, as he struggled in to occupy his allotted seat in the chimney corner, John, with a most impressive slowness of delivery, and in an apoplectic whisper, communicated the fact that Mr. Chester was alone in the large room up stairs, and was waiting the arrival of Mr. Geoffrey Haredale, to whom he had sent a letter, (doubtless of a threatening nature,) by the hands of Barnaby, then and there present.

For a little knot of smokers and solemn goosies, who had seldom any new topics of discussion, this was a perfect Godsend. Here was a good, dark-looking, mystery progressing under that very roof—brought home to the fire-side as it were, and enjoyable without the smallest pains or trouble. It is extraordinary what a zest and relish it gave to the drink, and how it heightened the flavor of the tobacco. Every man smoked his pipe with a face of grave and serious delight, and looked at his neighbour with a sort of quiet congratulation. Nay, it was felt to be such a holiday and special night, that, on the motion of little Solomon Daisy, every man (including John himself) put down his sixpence for a can of flip, which grateful beverage was brewed with all despatch, and set down in the midst of them on the brick floor; both that it might simmer and stew before the fire and that its fragrant steam, rising up among them and mixing with the wreaths of vapour from their pipes, might shroud them in a delicious atmosphere of their own, and shut out all the world. The very furniture of the room seemed to mellow and deepen in its tone; the ceiling and walls looked blacker and more highly polished, the curtains of a ruddier red; the fire burnt clear and high, and the crickets in the hearth-stone chirped with a more than wonted satisfaction.

There were present, two, however, who showed but little interest in the general contentment. Of these, one was Barnaby himself, who slept, or, to avoid being beset with questions, feigned to sleep, in the chimney-corner; the other, Hugh, who, sleeping too, lay stretched upon the bench on the opposite side, in the full glare of the blazing fire.

The light that fell upon this slumbering form, showed it in all its muscular proportions. It was that of a young man, of a hale athletic figure, and a giant's strength, whose sun-burnt face and swarthy throat, overgrown with jet black hair, might have served a painter for a model. Loosely attired, in the coarsest and roughest garb, with scraps of straw and hay—his usual bed—clinging here and there, and mingling with his uncombed locks, he had fallen asleep in a posture as careless as his dress. The negligence and disorder of the whole man, with something fierce and sullen in his features, gave him a picturesque appearance, that attracted the regards even of the Maypole customers who knew him well, and caused Long Parkes to say that Hugh looked more like a poaching rascal to-night than ever he had seen him yet.

"He's waiting here, I suppose," said Solomon, "to take Mr. Haredale's horse."

"That's it sir," replied John Willet. "He's not often in the house, you know. He's more at his ease among horses than men. I look upon him as an animal himself."

Following up this opinion with a shrug that seemed meant to say, "we can't expect every body to be like us," John put his pipe into his mouth again, and smoked like one who felt his superiority over the general run of mankind.

"That chap, sir," said John, taking it out again after a time, and pointing at him with the stem, "though he's got all his faculties about him—bottled up and corked down, if I may say so, somewhere or another—"

"Very good!" said Parkes, nodding his head. "A very good expression, Johnny. You'll be tackling somebody, presently. You're in twig to-night, I see."

"Take care," said Mr. Willet, not at all grateful for the compliment, "that I don't tackle you, sir, which I shall certainly endeavor to do, if you interrupt me when I'm making observations. That chap, I was saying, though he has all his faculties about him, somewhere or another, bottled up and corked down, has no more imagination than Barnaby has. And why has n't he?"

The three friends shook their heads at each other, saying by that action, without the trouble of opening their lips, "Do you observe what a philosophical mind our friend has?"

"Why has n't he?" said John, gently striking the table with his open hand. "Because they was never drawn out of him when he was a boy. That's why. What would any of us have been, if our fathers had n't drawn out our faculties out of us? What would my boy Joe have been, if I had n't drawn his faculties out of him?—Do you mind what I'm saying of, gentlemen?"

"Ah! we mind you," cried Parkes. "Go on improving us, Johnny."

"Consequently, then," said Mr. Willet, "that chap, whose mother was hung when he was a little boy, along with six others, for passing bad notes—and it's a blessed thing to think how many people are hung in batches every six weeks for that, and such like offences, as showing how wide awake our government is—that chap that was then turned loose, and had to mind cows, and frighten birds away, and what not, for a few pence to live on, and so got on by degrees to mind horses, and to sleep in course of time in lofts and litter, instead of under haystacks and hedges, till at last he came to be hostler at the Maypole for his board and lodging and a annual trifle—that chap that can't read nor write, and has never had much to do with any thing but animals, and has never lived in any way but like the animals he has lived among, is a animal. And," said Mr. Willet, arriving at his logical conclusion, "is to be treated accordingly."

"Willet," said Solomon Daisy, who had exhibited some impatience at the intrusion of so unworthy a subject on their more interesting theme, "when Mr. Chester comes this morning, did he order the large room?"

"He signified, sir," said John, "that he wanted a large apartment. Yes. Certainly."

"Why, then, I'll tell you what," said Solomon, speaking softly and with an earnest look. "He and Mr. Haredeale are going to fight a duel in it."

Everybody looked at Mr. Willet, after this alarming suggestion. Mr. Willet looked at the fire, weighing in his own mind the effect which such an occurrence would be likely to have on the establishment.

"Well," said John, "I do n't know—I am sure—I remember that when I went up last, he had put the lights upon the mantel-shelf."

"It's as plain," returned Solomon, "as the nose on Parkes's face"—Mr. Parkes, who had a large nose, rubbed it, and looked as if he considered this a personal allusion—"they'll fight in that room. You know by the newspapers what a common thing it is for gentlemen to fight in coffee-houses without seconds. One of 'em will be wounded or perhaps killed in this house."

"That was a challenge that Barnaby took then, eh?" said John.

"—Inclosing a slip of paper with the measure of his sword upon it, I'll bet a guinea," answered the little man. "We know what sort of gentleman Mr. Haredeale is. You have told us what Barnaby said about his looks, when he came back. Depend upon it, I'm right. Now, mind."

The slip had no flavor till now. The tobacco had been of mere English growth, compared with its present taste. A duel in that great old rambling room up stairs, and the best bed ordered already for the wounded man!

"Would it be swords or pistols now?" said John.

"Heaven knows. Perhaps both," returned Solomon. "The gentlemen wear swords, and may easily have pistols in their pockets—most likely have, indeed. If they fire at each other without effect, then they'll draw, and go to work in earnest."

A shade passed over Mr. Willet's face as he thought of broken windows and disabled furniture, but thinking himself that one of the parties would probably be left alive to pay the damage, he brightened up again.

"And then," said Solomon, looking from face to face, "then we shall have one of those stains upon the floor that never come out. If Mr. Haredeale wins, depend upon it, it'll be a deep one; or if he loses, it will perhaps be deeper still, for he'll never give in unless he's beaten down. We know him better, eh?"

"Better indeed!" they whispered all together.

"As to it's ever being got again," said Solomon, "I tell you it never will, or can be. Why, do you know that it has been tried, at a certain house we are not acquainted with?"

"The Warren!" cried John. "No, sure!"

"Yes, sure—yes. It's only known by very few. It has been whispered about though, for all that. They played the board away, but there it was. They went deep, but it went deeper. They put new boards down, but there was one great spot that came through still, and showed itself in the old place. And—harkye—draw nearer—Mr. Geoffrey made that room his study, and sits there, always, with his foot (as I have heard) upon it; and he believes, through thinking of it long and very much, that it will never fade until he finds the man who did the deed."

As this recital ended, and they all drew closer round the fire, the tramp of a horse was heard without.

"The very man!" cried John, starting up, "Hugh! Hugh!"

The sleeper staggered to his feet, and hurried after him. John quickly returned, ushering in with great attention and deference, (for Mr. Haredeale was his landlord), the long expected visitor, who strode into the room clanking his heavy boots on the floor; and looking keenly round upon the bowing group, raised his hat in acknowledgment of their profound respect.

"You have a stranger here, Willet, who sent to me," he said, in a voice which sounded naturally stern and deep. "Where is he?"

"In the great room up stairs, sir," answered John.

"Show the way. Your staircase is dark, I know. Gentlemen, good-night."

With that, he signed to the landlord to go on before; and went clanking out, and up the stairs; old John, in his agitation, ingeniously lighting everything but the way, and making a stumble at every second step.

"Stop!" he said, when they reached the landing. "I can announce myself. Do n't wait."

He laid his hand upon the door, entered, and shut it heavily. Mr. Willet was by no means disposed to stand there listening by himself, especially as the walls were very thick; so he descended, with much greater alacrity than he had come up, and joined his friends below.

THE JEWEES.—Fontanes asked Chateaubriand, "if he could assign a reason why the women of the Jewish race were so much handsomer than the men;" to which Chateaubriand gave the following truly poetical and Christian one: "The Jewesses," he said, "have escaped the curse which alighted upon their fathers, husbands, and sons. Not a Jewess was to be seen among the crowd of priests and rabble who insulted the Son of God, scourged him, crowned him with thorns, and subjected him to ignominy and the agony of the cross. The women of Judea believed in the Saviour, and assisted and soothed him under afflictions. A woman of Bethany poured on his head precious ointment, which she kept in a vase of alabaster. The sinner anointed his feet with perfumed oil, and wiped them with her hair. Christ, on his part, extended his mercy to the Jewesses. He raised from the dead the son of the widow of Nain, and Martha's brother, Lazarus. He cured Simon's mother-in-law, and the woman who touched the hem of his garment. To the Samaritan woman he was a spring of living water, and a compassionate judge to the woman in adultery. The daughters of Jerusalem wept over him; the holy women accompanied him to Calvary, brought balm and spices, and weeping sought him in the sepulchre. 'Woman, why weepest thou?' His first appearance after the resurrection, was to Mary Magdalene. He said to her, 'Mary.' At the sound of his voice, Mary Magdalene's eyes were opened, and she answered, 'Master.' The reflection of some very beautiful ray must have rested on the brow of the Jewesses."

DROPPING.—A person having been hanged, a stranger asked his wife of what distemper her poor husband died. "He took a drop too much," said she.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1841.

THE DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT.

General Harrison expired at Washington, on the fourth of April, thirty minutes before one o'clock. The Members of his Cabinet issued the following circular:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, April 4, 1841.

An all-wise Providence having suddenly removed from this life, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late President of the United States, we have thought it our duty, in the recess of Congress, and in the absence of the Vice President from the seat of Government, to make this afflicting bereavement known to the country, by this declaration, under our hands.

He died at the President's house, in this city, this fourth day of April, Anno Domini, 1841, at thirty minutes before one o'clock in the morning.

The people of the United States, overwhelmed, like ourselves, by an event so unexpected and so melancholy, will derive consolation from knowing that his death was calm and resigned, as his life has been patriotic and useful and distinguished; and that the last utterance of his lips expressed a fervent desire for the perpetuity of the Constitution, and the preservation of its true principles. In death, as in life, the happiness of his country was uppermost in his thoughts.

DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.
THOMAS EWING, Secretary of the Treasury.
JOHN BELL, Secretary of War.
J. C. CRITTENDEN, Attorney General.
FRANCIS GRANGER, Postmaster General.

Deep gloom has fallen upon this city. In every face is written the sad intelligence. We had not proceeded far from our own door, this morning, before we saw and felt that the President was dead. Nearly every newspaper, nobly casting aside partisan feelings in grief for this national calamity, has put on the habiliments of mourning. All speak of the departed, as of a great man gone from our Israel. The measure of his days was full; the measure of his glory was full even to running over; for him the dark hour came when it could be succeeded by a dazzling brightness that knows no spot or stain. The laurels of his fame are green as the buds of spring—enduring as those which are graven on the brows of marble heroes.

The singular presentiment which is said to have attended General Harrison through the latter years of life, has been wonderfully verified. He was wont to say that he felt a certain assurance that he should be President of the United States before he died. Alas! the oracle in his own heart did not also declare that he would die very soon after this same of honor had been attained!

Mingled with the mournful regrets which this event has inspired, are the happy consolations that our President was fit to die. Death, Judgment, Eternity: these had been ever in the background of what he thought and did. When into the depth of their far-reaching and solemn shadows his spirit withdrew—leaving the lustre which surrounded it on earth—they fell with no bleak and bitter chill, but with a warm, embracing fondness, a surrounding love, like those celestial clouds in which the form of Enoch was enveloped when the angels took him.

REPORT OF THE PHYSICIANS.

WASHINGTON, April 4, 1841.

Dear Sir: In compliance with the request made to us by yourself and the other gentlemen of the Cabinet, the attending and consulting Physicians have drawn up the abstract of a report on the President's case, which I herewith transmit to you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THO. MILLER, M.D., Attending Physician.

To the Hon. D. Webster, Secretary of State.

On Saturday, March 27, 1841, President Harrison, after several days' previous indisposition, was seized with a chill and other symptoms of fever. The next day Pneumonia, with congestion of the liver and derangement of the stomach and bowels, was ascertained to exist. The age and debility of the patient, with the immediate prostration, forbade a resort to general blood-letting. Topical depletion, blistering, and appropriate internal remedies, subdued, in a great measure, the disease of the lungs and liver, but the stomach and intestines did not regain a healthy condition. Finally, on the 3rd of April, at 3 o'clock, P. M., profuse diarrhoea came on, under which he sank, at thirty minutes to 1 o'clock, on the morning of the 4th.

The last words uttered by the President, as heard by Dr. Worthington, were these: "Sir, I wish you to understand the true principles of the Government. I wish them carried out. I ask nothing more."

DEATH OF GENERAL HARRISON.

From the National Intelligencer.

The solemn event which is announced above, although the public will have been in some degree prepared for it, will be to the whole country an astounding blow. The interrupted health of the deceased patriot, his robust constitution and active strength, up to the last week of his life, had left his countrymen nothing to wish and nothing to fear in regard either to his bodily or mental capacity for the able discharge of the high trust to which he was called. The tens of thousands of citizens who assembled to witness the ceremony of his inauguration felt, in the clear tones of his trumpet voice, an assurance that he possessed health and strength equal to the arduous duties which lay before him. But this promise and this confidence were soon to suffer a sad reverse. The week before last, pursuing the practice of his active life, and his habit of early rising and exercise, the President, in the course of a long walk before breakfast, was overtaken by a slight shower, and got wet. The following day he felt symptoms of indisposition, which were followed by pneumonia, or bilious pleurisy, which ultimately baffled all medical skill, and terminated his virtuous, useful, and illustrious life, on Sunday morning, after an illness of eight days. He expired a little after midnight, surrounded by those members of his family who were in the city, the members of his Cabinet, and many personal friends. Immediately after his demise, the members of the Cabinet retired, and drew up and signed the above announcement, and caused it to be published. In the course of Saturday the President appeared so much better as to inspire hopes that his disease would be subdued, but about four P. M. a sudden and very unfavorable change took place, and he continued to sink until death closed the scene.

The last time the President spoke was at nine o'clock—a little more than three hours before he expired; and the words which he then uttered were so remarkable that they deserve to be recorded and remembered. While Dr. Worthington and one or two other attendants were standing over him, having just administered to his comfort, he cleared his throat, as if desiring to speak audibly, and, as though he fancied himself addressing his successor, or some official associate in the Government, said: "SIR, I WISH YOU TO UNDERSTAND THE TRUE PRINCIPLES OF THE GOVERNMENT. I WISH THEM CARRIED OUT. I ASK NOTHING MORE."

These, his last words, were uttered in a distinct voice, and, as they were well calculated to do, impressed the gentlemen present so solemnly that Dr. Worthington immediately wrote them down for preservation. They present a brief but impressive record of the thoughts which occupied the last moments of the departed patriot, and are characteristic of the Roman devotion to his country which animated him throughout his life, and shone forth even in the hour of death. Thus passed from life, and from the station on earth most worthy of a noble ambition, this good, and wise and illustrious citizen. It is not for us to attempt to do justice to the solemnity of the occasion, or to the deep grief which pervades all hearts. As more fitting and adequate than any thing which we could say, we quote the impressive language uttered from one of our pulpits yesterday by an eloquent divine:

"The intelligence of this morning, my Christian friends, has filled thousands of hearts, and will fill thousands more, with sadness and anxiety. The Chief Magistrate of our Union is no more! One short month since, amidst the breathless attention of an immense multitude, with clear and solemn voice, he called God to witness that he would faithfully discharge the duties of his high office. He has now gone to appear in the presence of that God. The praises of his friends, the denunciations of his enemies, are alike awed into silence before this dispensation of mysterious Providence. Amid the busy schemings of man the Supreme Ruler has manifested his power; and we read with trembling sadness his awful lesson, of the uncertainty of human life, the emptiness of earthly glory."

"You have seen—how recently and sadly seen, that the summit of human power affords no security from the shafts of death. The illustrious man, lately almost a nation's idol, now lies in the calm deep slumber which knows no waking till the final day. Those deeds of service to his country which were so familiar to the lips of thousands, and that fidelity to his country's good, lately so fervently expressed, and as we trust so sincerely felt—these and all else that graced his character have followed him to the bar of the just and the merciful Judge. Before that bar, my friends, we also are to appear. We know not how soon. May we so use the present time as to prepare ourselves for that awful hour."

FROM THE CONSTITUTION OF THE U. STATES.

ARTICLE II. SECTION I.

"In case of removal of the President from office or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President or Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

[FROM THE ACT OF CONGRESS, MARCH 1, 1792.]

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That in case of a removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the Executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, specifying that electors of the President of the United States shall be appointed or chosen, in the several States, within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December then next ensuing: Provided, There shall be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the said first Wednesday in December; but if there shall not be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the first Wednesday in December, and if the term for which the President and Vice President last in office were elected shall not expire on the 3d day of March next ensuing, then the Secretary of State shall specify in the modification that the electors shall be appointed or chosen within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December in the year next ensuing, within which time the electors shall accordingly be appointed or chosen; and the electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, and the proceedings and duties of the said electors and others shall be pursuant to the directions prescribed in this act.

JOHN TYLER, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

John Tyler, who, by a dispensation of Providence, has become the legitimate President of the United States, is a native of that same county of Hanover in Virginia, which gave birth to our late lamented Chief Magistrate. In his political faith and attachments he is a democrat of the old Jeffersonian school, and was one of the most efficient supporters of the last war in the lower House of Congress. He has long been the friend of Henry Clay, and was, at the Harrisburgh Convention, one of the last who consented to the substitution of another candidate for the Presidency.

In the Senate of the United States, Mr. Tyler maintained a steady opposition to the measures of the late administration, until, in conformity with the Virginian doctrine of instruction, he resigned his seat. He has, however, in his recorded speeches, expressed himself opposed to the re-chartering of a United States Bank, although it is believed that his opinions have undergone some modification upon this subject within the last two or three years. Certain it is, he is decidedly opposed to the Sub-Treasury scheme, and to the exercise of the veto power by the President.

From his personal appearance we should judge that Mr. Tyler was about fifty years of age. He is tall and slim in his figure, and strongly reminds one of the published likenesses of Patrick Henry. His hair is still unsilvered, and his countenance is indicative of manly frankness, courtesy, and amiability of temper. His manners are courtly and cordial, and his style of reception singularly gracious and prepossessing. In his demeanor as Vice President he has been remarkably modest and unobtrusive, indicating no disposition to interfere in the distribution of offices, or to bias the judgment of the Executive and his Cabinet. Indeed, he has been almost wholly overlooked by the managing politicians and leaders at Washington, inasmuch as his position, apart from the unlooked-for contingency which has now called him to the White House, was one of little more influence than that of an ordinary Senator. Certain people will undoubtedly now be very active in attempts to make up for their past inattention.

Mr. Tyler is a fluent and graceful speaker, although in personal intercourse he is by no means inclined to be garrulous. He is unquestionably a man of sterling abilities and good sense, and will not be blinded and moulded by any man or set of men. He is in the full vigor of all his faculties, in the prime of life, without even the sense of sight impaired. We believe he will make a good, patriotic and wise President.

Already some moanings have been raised by certain cliques of politicians among us, because of the fact that Mr. Tyler is from the South of the Potomac. With such malcontents we have few sympathies. We want neither a Northern policy nor a Southern policy pursued in the conduct of our national affairs, but an American policy, not limited by state lines, but covering the whole Union in its capacious embrace, and still abiding always rigidly within the boundaries of the Federal Constitution. Such will, we believe, be the policy of John Tyler; and to such will the majority of the people of the United States give their unflinching support.

It cannot be denied that Mr. Webster, by his superior knowledge of public affairs, his aptitude, experience and vast ability, and the energy of his stronger will, was fast gaining an ascendancy in the direction of things at Washington, which was almost irresistible. He was virtually the premier of the administration, and had Gen. Harrison survived, his influence would probably have been paramount. The tables are now reversed. Mr. Clay and his friends come in for a share of influence—greater, no doubt, than the Webster party can ever hope to exercise. It is our own persuasion that Mr. Webster will resign his seat in the Cabinet, and accept of the mission to England. The present aspect of our relations with Great Britain seems to call loudly for such an embassy, and we should rejoice to see our country represented abroad by a man so truly and eminently great as Daniel Webster.

THE LATE PRESIDENT.—The arrangements in our city on Wednesday for paying a tribute of respect to the memory of our lamented Chief Magistrate were appropriate to the occasion, and gained additional interest from the fact that they occurred simultaneously with the performance of his funeral obsequies at Washington.

The national flag was displayed at half-mast throughout the day at all public and prominent places in the city and also on all the shipping in port. All places of business were closed at noon—our streets wore the appearance of a quiet Sabbath—and the tolling of bells from 12 o'clock till 2, together with the minute-guns fired from the Battery, all united to give the scene an air of grave solemnity and profound sorrow. In the evening, all places of public amusement, theatres, &c., were closed.

We perceive by our Washington papers that a Federal salute was fired at sunrise on the morning of the same day from the military stations in the vicinity of the seat of government; minute guns from 12 until 3; and a national salute at the setting of the sun. The bells of the several churches in Washington, Georgetown and Alexandria were tolled during the progress of the funeral procession.

From our own Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Monday Evening, April 5, 1841.

You will already have been furnished, through the Washington press, with the order of the funeral solemnities of the late President, agreed upon by the Cabinet, after consultation with his relatives and friends. The funeral will take place on Wednesday; and it is expected that an immense assemblage will join in paying the last melancholy homage of respect, by following him to the grave. In the Congressional Burying Ground is a capacious Receiving Tomb, in which the body will be deposited until Congress shall take order for the burial in a proper site, and for the erection of a suitable monument to his memory.

The public had an opportunity of taking a last look of his remains to-day. The body is placed in a coffin of mahogany, lined with lead, of considerable thickness, and prepared for being hermetically sealed. At the head is a plate of glass, so as to show the face distinctly, without exposing it to the air, or to the touch of visitors. The coffin is covered with black silk velvet, with a simple edging of silver cloth, and rests upon a plain centre-table in the Hall. Great numbers of the citizens of the District, and of the neighborhood, and of Baltimore, embraced the occasion to see the features of the departed Hero and Patriot once more; and tears trickled down many a manly as well as many a gentle cheek.

Indeed this sad and calamitous visitation, I am free to say, has merged even party-irritations into one common sensibility, which, to the honor of our natures, is exhibited by persons of all parties in sympathy for the desolated household of the Executive Mansion, and in sincere lamentation of the event for which the widow, and the daughters, and the near relatives are mourning so deeply. During his brief residence among us, GEN. HARRISON had increased the respect of our citizens, and inspired feelings of warm personal regard and attachment. It speaks strongly for his kindness of heart to observe the sincere sorrowing of his domestics, and to hear the expressions of true affection with which they talk of him. The Irish porter left by Mr. Van Buren is retained; and the poor fellow has a moist eye and choking voice whenever he refers to the General. "Oh, sir," said he to-day, "he was too good for this place."

The Secretary of State has addressed to the members of the Diplomatic Corps severally, a letter announcing the death of the President, and inviting their attendance at the funeral. A similar letter was addressed to Ex-President Adams, who is still in the city. You cannot have failed to mark the peculiar simplicity and propriety of Mr. Webster's style in the official declaration. These letters are most finished specimens of the same excellence.

General orders have been issued from the War and the Navy Departments announcing the distressing event, and prescribing the regulations to be followed by both branches of the service. The Major General Commanding in Chief (MACOMB) will superintend, in person, the military arrangements at the funeral. Commodore Morris, who is the oldest Navy Captain now in Washington will have direction of the Naval arrangements.

After some deliberation, the Cabinet concluded that the Executive Department should be closed, and the ordinary business suspended until Thursday.

The Vice President is expected to arrive here to-morrow night. Mr. GRANGER received a letter from him to-day, dated April 2d. He was then in good health. I mention this, because an idle rumor of his illness was spread abroad to-day by some gossiping person. Mr. Fletcher Webster, the Special Messenger deputed by the Cabinet, reached his residence probably this morning.

By the Constitution the powers and duties of President devolve upon the Vice President in virtue of his office. There will be no new inauguration, and it is questionable whether even a new oath will be administered to him—it being the Constitutional duty of the Vice President (which he has already sworn to discharge) to exercise the powers and perform the duties of President when the incumbent of the latter office has been removed by death, or is laboring under any other Constitutional disability.

WASHINGTON, April 6, 1841.

The Hon. JOHN TYLER, Vice-President of the United States, arrived in this city this morning at four o'clock. Mr. Webster, Jun., discharged his duty as Special Messenger from the Cabinet, with an expedition which we would all like to see carried into the transportation of the mails. He arrived in Richmond on Sunday evening—immediately chartered a steamboat—arrived at Mr. Tyler's residence the next morning by daylight,—and very soon after, the Vice President, accompanied by his two sons, set off for Washington, and, by traveling day and night, reached here at the hour I have mentioned. He is in good health, though somewhat fatigued by the journey. He has very wisely and properly suggested to his personal friends a desire to remain retired and quiet to-day and to-morrow; and our citizens therefore have refrained from calling to pay their respects.

At twelve o'clock he received the members of the Cabinet present in the city (the Secretary of the Navy being still absent); and they remained in consultation nearly two hours. The interview was, it is understood, eminently satisfactory to all parties. Mr. Tyler told the Secretaries, the Post Master-General, and Attorney-General, that he regarded them as holding the same relation to him as they did to the late President. The Cabinet will therefore continue, as it was organized by General Harrison; and the course of the Administration will run as if the dispensation over which the country mourns had not occurred. The first office of the Government has only passed from the hands of one Whig into those of another; and how much soever we may lament the recent sad and calamitous visitation, there is not the slightest ground for apprehension as to its political consequences. Indeed, I cannot well conceive how any reflecting man, acquainted with the public life and character of JOHN TYLER, and with the late contest, can entertain any solicitude or misgiving on the subject. He is a truehearted, sound-headed, Republican Whig—opposed to the abuses, and corruptions, and financial experiments of the last Administration—and devoted to the great principles of the party that elected the lamented Harrison and himself to the highest offices of the Republic. He was a member of the Harrisburgh Convention; and at the dinner given to the members in this city, after the nominations had been made, he delivered a most able and eloquent speech, in the course of which he spoke of GEN. HARRISON in the highest terms, and expressed a perfect concurrence in his leading principles and opinions on public questions.

At a later date, in a letter addressed to certain gentlemen of Charleston, S. C., who had propounded several queries to him, he again declared his accordance of sentiment with General Harrison—in his advocacy of popular rights—in opposition to the daring assumptions of power by the Executive under the two last administrations—in resistance to proscription for opinion's sake—in preventing the interference of office-holders in elections—in restoring economy in the public expenditures—in establishing and securing the limitation for all future time of the Presidential term of office to four years—and in his determination "TO RECOMMEND AND URGE UPON CONGRESS THE ADOPTION OF SUCH MEASURES AS WILL RESULT IN COMMITTING THE PUBLIC MONIES TO OTHER HANDS THAN THE PRESIDENT'S, SO AS EFFECTUALLY TO SEPARATE THE PURSE FROM THE SWORD."

Mr. Tyler is entitled to the highest confidence of the American people; and I confidently predict that his administration will prove that he is worthy of the exalted station to which the inscrutable decrees of Providence have so unexpectedly called him.

He has taken lodgings for the present at Brown's Hotel.

The body of the late President was closed up in the coffin to-day. Owing to the ravages of the disease it was thought proper not to exhibit his mortal remains to the public eye after yesterday. But numbers who did not arrive in the city in season for that, had the melancholy satisfaction of seeing the coffin. The cars from Baltimore and the Southern steamboats have brought crowds to join in the funeral solemnities to-morrow. The procession will be increased, besides the various component parts mentioned in the published programme, by the Senate and House of Delegates of Maryland, and several volunteer military companies, and numerous Associations from Baltimore.

The shops and warehouses in this city have been partially closed to-day, and many of them hung with signals of mourning.

I have not yet the heart to write, as I wish, of the bereaved family of the Executive Mansion. There are many touching incidents, some of which I will record in another letter.

The Foreign Ministers, to-day, sent letters of condolence to the Secretary of State; and paid visits of condolence to the family of the deceased.

P. S. Mr. Tyler took the oath of office, to-day, as President of the United States, in presence of the Cabinet, and hereafter that will be his designation.

GEN. HARRISON'S FAMILY.—The connections of General Harrison present in the Executive Mansion, at the time of the decease of their beloved relative, were the following: MRS. WILLIAM HARRISON, (son's widow.) MRS. TAYLOR, of Richmond, (niece.) MR. D. O. COUPELAND, (nephew.) HENRY HARRISON, of Va., (grand-nephew.) FENDLAY HARRISON, of Ohio, (grand-son.)

COMPARATIVE LOSS ON GOLD AND PAPER, AS A CIRCULATION.—Mr. Page, a distinguished English writer, has, from the reports of the English and American mints, ascertained that there is a loss on gold coin by wear and tear of 4.61 per cent. in a century, which is less than 1.20th per cent. per annum, and so that of every £100 coined in any particular year, there would remain over £95 7s. 10d. in real value at the end of 100 years. A comparison is next made of the expense of a paper currency, which, at 2½ per cent., as stated by Mr. Norman, is found to be fifty three times greater than the loss by wear on a gold currency as 2½ per cent. per annum, on a sum of £20,000,000, will amount in 100 years to £50,000,000; while the loss by wear of a gold currency of £20,000,000, during the same period is only £992,000. The difference is therefore £49,008,000.

The Old World.

LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The British Queen arrived at New York at 3 o'clock on Sunday morning. She had a rough and disastrous passage. She left Portsmouth on the 10th of March, and, after having been twenty days at sea, was compelled to put into Halifax on the 30th. There she remained until the first of this month. The news which she brings is more interesting than important. We have various London papers of the 8th and 9th—The Times, Post, Globe, Chronicle, &c. Those of the first mentioned date, contain Mr. Pickens's Report to the House of Representatives touching the affair of the Caroline and the subsequent and continued imprisonment of Mr. McLeod. Our readers will remember that, on the occasion of the first appearance of Mr. Pickens's report, we expressed our reprobation of it in the strongest language—pronouncing it a rash, ill-judged, bullying document, which would be productive of much mischief. It will be seen by the extracts, which are below, what has been thought of it and how it has been received in England. Several persons were disposed to consider it tantamount to a declaration of war; but those, who knew more about the getting up of such documents and party influences in the American Congress, set it down at its true value. By some it was conjectured to be a mere ruse of the Democrats to create confusion and difficulty for the Whig administration. The judicious remarks of Messrs. Adams and Granger, following hard upon the reading of the Report, did much to neutralise its influence. We repeat that the news is unimportant, however interesting; for the Caledonia which sailed the other day doubtless carried out the most pacific dispatches from Mr. Fox, the Minister at Washington. In our opinion, the prospects of war are more remote than ever; and we prophecy that, with Mr. Webster as Secretary of State, all our difficulties with Great Britain—including those of the North Eastern boundary—will be settled before the adjournment of the 27th Congress.

We give a short letter from a correspondent:

LONDON, 8th March, 1841.

The news received to-day by the Westchester caused quite a stir in the commercial circles, and the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations in your House of Representatives is considered almost tantamount to a declaration of war; funds receded about 1 per cent., and the insurance offices, which were taking risks by the Queen to New-York at 15, to day require "a war risk," and demand 30—a great deal of excitement and quite a stir is the consequence.

However, by the well-informed, this report of the committee of Foreign Relations, is viewed somewhat in the light of a political affair, got up by the Van Buren party to embarrass their successors in office with a knotty and perplexing point to settle with this Government. The conduct of your Minister at this Court has been, to say the least, injudicious, and would appear to bear out the conclusion that his party would not be sorry to embroil the succeeding administration in an unpleasant dispute with this country. It is to be hoped the Minister sent here by the new administration will be more respected and less ridiculed than the present representative of the United States. The hopes of all parties engaged in commercial transactions between the two countries are turned to the new administration, for a better regulation of the currency, and a policy that will foster and encourage commerce instead of depressing and warring with it.

The foreign exchanges are and have been rather improving, but the rate of money continues rather high—for long paper, 5½ a 6 is procured. There were a few failures on the 1st in the home trade, though none of any importance or magnitude. Mr. Curtis, of the House of Garry & Curtis, failed some time since. Mr. Garry had long retired from business. Mr. Curtis was Governor of the Bank of England during the period of the warfare against the American houses three or four years, who, as you may remember, were accused of trading beyond their means, &c.; as a commentary to this, it is said that Mr. Curtis's estate will not pay eighteen pence on the pound! and that it is proved that he had been insolvent many years. Yours, J. H.

DISPUTE WITH AMERICA.

The Earl of Mountcashell said, he rose to put a question to the noble Viscount opposite respecting some information which had, it appeared, been just received from America, and which was of great importance to this country. That intelligence, he understood, had created a great sensation in the city, and had caused a fall in the price of the public funds. He alluded to a report from the committee of foreign relations, made on the 13th of last month, to Congress, and he wished to know whether any confirmation as to the document in question being official, had been received by Her Majesty's Ministers? It was not his intention, on the present occasion, to submit to their lordships any motion on the subject, as he was most desirous not to cause a greater division between the two Governments than that which unfortunately now existed. But when a report such as that to which he had referred was promulgated, it was proper that they should receive information as to its authenticity. For his own part, he thought it could not be genuine. He believed that it must be an invention, and there were many persons who would be glad to propagate such a report for stock-jobbing objects. He felt very great doubts as to the authenticity of this report, and why? because, aware of the good understanding of the inhabitants of the United States, he could not think that they would maintain such doctrines.

He was convinced that if the inhabitants of the United States would but consider—if they would look around to the situation of their own finances—if they would recollect that there were 3,000,000 of negro slaves in their country, and a great body of Indians in the back settlements, who might be induced, in consequence of the wrongs they complained of, to take a part in the contest—if they cast their eyes toward Canada, where there was as loyal a set of men as any in the empire, and asked, "Had they not the power of getting into their hands individuals belonging to the United States?"—and, also, if they recollected the very large body of regular troops that we had in Canada, and the efficient naval force which was now at our disposal, in consequence of the Eastern question being settled—they would, if they considered these points, anxiously abstain from hostilities. They were a calculating people, and they would see that they must sustain an immense loss by such an event. For these reasons he was of opinion that the document was not a true one. He, therefore, asked the noble Viscount whether Her Majesty's Ministers had received any official information respecting this report. Under all the circumstances, he felt that he was perfectly justified in putting this question. The report had appeared in the public papers, and it was necessary that some information should be afforded respecting it. At the present moment he did not think it right to make any observations on the subject; but if they were given to understand that the report was to be considered as official, he should feel it to be his duty, at a proper time, to bring the matter before the house; for a document more insulting to this nation could not possibly be conceived.

Viscount Melbourne said, he was unable to give any other answer to the question of the noble earl than by stating, that he was not aware whether any communication had been received that morning from Her Majesty's Minister in the United States relative to the subjects referred to. But he apprehended, from the form in which the document appeared, that there could be no doubt of its authenticity.

The most sensible article which we find on this subject is this from the London Globe. It is likewise entitled to more respect than any other, since the Globe is the Ministerial paper.

Considerable excitement had been occasioned by the publication of the Report presented to the House of Representatives on the 13th of February by the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. This document, which we publish entire, is, we think, anything but creditable to the Committee, in the name of which it was drawn up and presented to the House. The incautious and undignified expressions in which it indulges toward England—the highly-colored, partial, and obviously incorrect statements of the affair of the Caroline, and the manifestly untenable grounds on which the State of New-York is justified in the course it has pursued toward Mr. McLeod for his alleged part in that transaction—all prove that passion actuated the "bare majority" of the committee from which it emanated; who, instead of conducting the investigation with the coolness of statesmen, proceeded in the true spirit of partizanship, and stamped every paragraph of the Report with the prevailing character of their deeply-seated prejudices.

The painful effect which this intemperate "party document" must otherwise produce on the strongly-cherished hopes of the people of this country, of an amicable adjustment of the dispute, will be much relieved by the tone of the principal speakers in the debate which ensued on the question of printing the Report. It appears that the Report was sanctioned by "a bare majority" of the committee from which it emanated; and was denounced both in its spirit and tendency by the rest. The observations of Mr. Granger, one of the dissentients from the Report, and of Mr. Adams, who justly stigmatized the document as of a strictly party character, and who declared that "it fell on the house like a clap of thunder in a summer's day," will find a strong response in a great proportion of the thinking part of the population of both countries. The report was ordered to be printed by a majority of 103 to 68. By the time it was in the hands of the members we have little doubt but the "fiery Tybalt" of the house were materially cooled by the opportunity afforded for reflection. The possibility of an interruption of the pacific relations between England and France being removed, the war party in America will find themselves much more disposed to listen to the suggestions of reason than they would be were the chance of embarrassing the government of this country, by an obstinate refusal to liberate Mr. McLeod, and to make satisfaction for the outrage perpetrated upon his person, still in existence to excite the hopes of a successful refusal to comply with its just requisitions.

We see nothing in this manifesto of empty and unreasonable denunciations, qualified as they are by the strong expressions of dissent and reprobation with which it was received, to shake our belief that peace will be preserved. The violence of the document will go far to neutralize its intended effect. Such vaunting is a strong proof of conscious weakness, and is the usual precursor of an abandonment of the very position which is thus sought to be maintained by force when no longer fortified by reason. We repeat the opinion we expressed on Saturday with unabated confidence, that "we cannot bring ourselves to believe that an enlightened and reasoning nation, like the people of the United States, will precipitate themselves and us into a war, in which wrong and injustice would be entirely on their side, and of which the result could not by any possibility turn to their advantage."

The news of the failure of the United States Bank of course created considerable commotion. The shares were as low as £5 5s, just before the sailing of the British Queen. The Tory papers of course rail loudly against American securities of all kinds and call us a nation of swindlers. The following is a specimen of their exultation over the unfortunate stockholders in England:

"None but an idiot of the first magnitude will ever again trust to the faith or honesty of the "model Republic." We see by the returns that the number of English claimants on the bankrupt United States Bank is 1,390—among whom we are told that there are forty-two belonging to the nobility, and we have no doubt that they will suffer rather heavily. We own that our compassion for the three dozen and a half of noble sufferers is extremely small. What right had they to dirty their fingers in such base concerns, the profits of which could be derived from nothing but direct fraud or grinding usury? We say nothing of their anti-national and anti-aristocratical conduct in supporting the credit and adding to the resources of a gang—for it is an abuse of words to call the people of the United States a nation—of unprincipled democrats, filled with the most venomous hatred against nobility and England; because we know that when a man once begins to trade in money he loses all considerations of caste and country. Nor for the balance remaining after the subduction of the forty-two nobles, is our sadness excessive." The great proportion of them we are tolerably certain well knew what they were about, and "squared it" with their friends across the Atlantic; and those who did not must submit to be punished for their folly, with the reflection that they had due warning beforehand.

The crowded state of our columns to-day does not permit us to give the Continental news. The following is the only item of consequence:

The Austrian Observer of the 26th ult. states, that "Intelligence from Constantinople of the 15th ult. informs us, that the Sultan's firman, granting to Mehemet Ali and his family the Pashalik of Egypt hereditarily, had just been prepared. Davi Naziri, Minister of Justice, and Zadi Muhib Effendi, are appointed to carry this firman to Alexandria. Zadi set out yesterday for that city. The Ottoman Porte had addressed a circular to the Ambassadors, announcing to them that the Egyptian affair being concluded the blockade of the coast of Egypt was raised, and liberty of commerce reestablished. We have been informed that the Turkish ship of the line Mahmoudieh, with Admiral Yager Pasha on board, passed the Dardanelles on the 9th ult. It is thought he will perform quarantine at Lampaco.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

NINE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steam-packet Acadia, Capt. Edward Miller, arrived in Boston yesterday, at about seven o'clock, after a rough and boisterous passage of over eighteen days. The Acadia reached Halifax on Monday morning, after having experienced a great deal of very rough and boisterous weather, and having been in serious danger. When she reached Halifax her supply of coal was exhausted. She carried 73 passengers to that place, 38 of whom she brought to Boston, with 7 additional from Halifax.

The news she brings is not of much importance. The aspect of affairs is rather pacific. The war blast which the British Queen brought seems to have subsided into quite a gentle breeze. Of course the Tory papers magnify the danger, while the Administration papers rely upon the change in our government for a speedy settlement of the difficulties between the two governments. Owing to the nature of the intelligence from this country, the money market was in a very confused and unsettled condition. The Liverpool Cotton market remained the same. Cotton had advanced at Havre. The markets were very much inflated by the war news from this country.

Our private correspondent from Liverpool, March 19th, says: "You will perceive, from the annexed Circular, that our funds are advancing and our Cotton Market declining. All this looks like peace: but until the arrival of the President (28th) it will be an anxious time. However, the change of feeling, since the arrival of the Caledonia, is great: and if our Ministers will meet your present rulers with a corresponding feeling, there will be no war. No price for U. S. Bank Shares. It is said that the Britannia, 19th April, will take freight at £7 per ton."

THE COURT—The annals of the Court do not present much variety. The parties at Buckingham Palace have been few. The Queen and Prince Albert have taken exercise daily, walking, or riding in a barouche; except on Thursday, when the Queen held a Chapter of the Order of the Garter at Buckingham Palace.

At the Chapter, the Duke of Sutherland was elected to the vacant stall in the Royal Chapel of St. George, Windsor.

After the Chapter, the Queen gave audience to Mr. Stevenson, the American Minister, who was the bearer of a letter of congratulation, and to Baron Bjornstjerna, the Swedish Minister.

The Duchess of Kent went to Covent Garden Theatre on Tuesday; the Duke of Cambridge visited the same theatre on Wednesday, and on Friday the Italian Opera.

The Duke of Cambridge gave a dinner party on Wednesday to the Duke of Wellington and other noblemen and gentlemen.

RUMORED WAR WITH AMERICA.—A letter from Havre, dated the 11th instant, states that when the Calpe steamer, from Southampton, arrived this morning, our quay was thronged with merchants anxious for news. A gentleman, well known here, came to the stern of the vessel as she was rounding into her berth, and said war was declared between the United States and England. This was repeated by another passenger, who is a resident merchant here. Coming from known authority, there was no doubt entertained, and every one took to his heels to make the most of his information. The markets for every kind of produce have mounted rapidly. Cottons are quoted higher than they have been in Havre, and, since 1 o'clock, have risen five centimes. The ferment is extraordinary; those who have always laughed at the idea of a war with America now shake their heads and speak doubtfully.—[Morning Post.

STANLEY'S REGISTRATION BILL.—In the House of Commons, on Thursday, Lord Stanley announced that on the faith of the Government measures being proceeded with on the 23d April, he should bring forward his Registration Bill on the 28th of that month.

FAILURES IN LONDON.—Within the last three days we have had as many failures, the aggregate amount of whose liabilities is estimated at no less than £200,000. They are all respectable firms, connected with the produce markets, chiefly tea, and one has helped to pull down the other.—The serious depreciation in the value of most descriptions of produce, amounting to 20s. per cwt. on sugar within a few weeks, and to about 30 per cent. on tea, are causes themselves sufficient to account for these unfortunate reverses; but we must at the same time remark, that the tea trade has been affected, in addition, to a very serious extent, by the extensive, and in many cases wild speculations, entered into; for if houses of old standing and acknowledged wealth do not themselves share in it, their connexions often do, and thus involve them in the common loss.—[Shipping Gazette.]

INDIA.—The overland mail from India reached London on Tuesday night, and brings intelligence from Bombay up to the 1st of February, Bengal 22d January, and Madras 23d of that month. The steamer "Berenice" reached Suez on the morning of the 18th February, with the mail and passengers.

The mail was immediately forwarded to Alexandria, which place it reached on the afternoon of the 22d February; but the "Great Liverpool" having been detained at Alexandria till the 24th, for the purpose of bringing the despatches of Commodore Napier on the subject of recent important changes in the Egyptian question, two days' delay necessarily occurred in the receipt of the mail in London. The news from India by these despatches savors of general tranquillity. The only event of any importance to disturb this unusual repose, is the dissatisfaction of the Duraness at Shah Soojah, who still continues extremely unpopular, and is said to be suffering from ill health. In the commencement of January, an engagement took place between the 2d Bengal N. L., with a couple of field pieces, and about 1,200 of the rebels against the Shah's kingdom. No official paper on the subject of this engagement has yet appeared, but we hear the enemy were defeated, with a loss of sixty men, and the capture of two guns, whilst the loss on our side amounted to eight sepoy and one native officer killed, and two lieutenants, whose names have not transpired, wounded.

In consequence of certain misunderstandings with the Gykwar, Sir J. R. Carnac had proceeded to Baroda for the purpose of a personal interview with that chieftain. It was pretty generally rumored that his Excellency would return home, for the benefit of his health, after the adjustment of those differences. For a similar purpose, Sir Willoughby Cotton is on the point of returning to England after receiving from the supreme government the most handsome acknowledgements of his arduous services while in command of the Bengal branch of the army of the Indus. Major-General W. K. Elphinstone is to succeed Sir Willoughby.

Among the casualties of the month, we deeply regret to find the sudden death of Sir Samuel Ford Whittingham, the Commander-in-Chief of the Madras army, who expired on the evening of the 19th of January, in a fit of apoplexy of very short duration. This lamentable event has occasioned sincere concern to the Madras community, to whom his Excellency was endeared by his kindly feeling and impartiality. In consequence of the absence of Sir Hugh Gough and Major-General Sir R. Dick, it is said that Major-General James Allan, being the senior officer present at the presidency, will temporarily take command of the Madras forces.

WRECK OF AN INDIAMAN.—The Gibraltar Chronicle of the 23d ult. says:—"On the night of Sunday, the 14th inst., the British Indiaman Heroise, from China, bound to London, was totally lost near Azila, not far from Cape Spartel. Out of sixty persons on board, about thirty-four are believed to have perished, principally Lascars. The vessel is a complete wreck; and it is feared that no part of her valuable cargo will be saved, though every measure is taking to effect that desirable object, as well as to afford the necessary protection on the coast."

THE PARIS CORRESPONDENT OF THE COURIER DES ETATS.—Under date of March 7th, holds the following language respecting the War Question:

"The political difficulties existing between England and the United States have attracted great attention in Europe, and especially in France. The rumor is rife, in the best informed circles, that the British Cabinet, with a hope of intimidating these pirates of republicanism, (who, according to John Bull, talk loud only to disguise their fears,) intend to dispatch a squadron to America forthwith and show the minuscules of their guns to the Ministers at Washington, that these functionaries may be more supple and accommodative."

"The hearts of all French patriots thrill at this outpouring of British insolence. We have faith in the patriotism and the bravery of the Americans. We are confident that they will maintain their dignity and honor, and if war should ensue between the American Eagle and the British Serpent, the former may rest assured that she will not long flap her mighty wings over the land and sea before the tri-colored banner of France will float by her side. We are firmly convinced that within one month after war is declared between Great Britain and the United States, our Government will be forced to take part in the contest: for, whatever may be the obstinacy of its predilections for peace, it will be forced into the strife by the power of public opinion."

We are bound, as Americans, to greet most cordially the generous and chivalric spirit that glows in these remarks: at the same time we are well satisfied that no occasion will exist for us to receive the good offices of our trans-Atlantic friends. There will be no War.

UNITED STATES BANK.—A further reduction in the number of clerks employed in this institution, took place on Tuesday last. The number discharged was thirteen.

THE HON. CHAS. F. MITCHELL.—This individual—who was a Representative in the last Congress, from the District of Niagara—has added his name to the host of forging scoundrels, with which our country is infested. The medium through which he practised his rascality, was sundry checks purporting to have been drawn by the Bank of Orleans, at Albion, on the State Bank at Albany, indorsed by the honorable gentleman, and sold by him to brokers in Wall street.

There is nothing particularly striking in the whole transaction—for such acts are matters of every day occurrence—save that the guilty individual has occupied a position rather above the average of criminals; though, at the same time, Mr. Mitchell is by no means the first or only man who has stepped from a post of honor into the degradation of crime.

What especially stirs our bile in the premises, is the letter which Mr. Mitchell has had the impudence to write, and which the Courier had the weakness to publish. It is addressed to Col. Webb personally, and is about the silliest and most disgusting essay that we have ever seen inflicted on the public.

It appears that the gentleman has literally departed for Texas; and he has left this letter behind him as a sort of dying confession at the foot of the social gallows. It is a precious specimen of auto-biography. It has all the requisite clap-traps for a dying speech, and would be a "great card" for the boys to hawk about in a pamphlet, or handbill, if its proportions were a little more ample.

He speaks of his wife and children whom he leaves behind, and of friends and kindred "nearer and dearer than his own heart's blood," &c.; but it may well be doubted whether such recollections really disturb his philosophy now, since they had not force enough to prevent the commission of wanton and unnecessary crime.

BETTING ON ELECTIONS.—A bill has been reported to the Senate of Maine on the subject of betting on elections, which has the following provisions:—

1st. That any person who shall bet upon the election of any man to any office, shall forfeit to the use of the town, city, or plantation in which he resides, a sum equal to the wager.

2d. That the person who shall receive money for any bet, shall be liable to have the amount recovered back in an action of debt by the person losing it.

3d. The third section makes it the duty of Mayors of cities, and Treasurers of towns and plantations to sue for the sums forfeited by the first section.

4th. All goods, chattels, or personal estate so bet, are forfeited to the use of the city, town or plantation; and the persons mentioned in the last section are empowered to sue or the same.

5th. All deeds of real estate, or other conveyances to fulfil any bet, are declared void.

JUDGE GRIDLEY (from the Western District) has just closed the March term of the Circuit Court in our city, and has won golden opinions by the able and impartial, and, above all, rapid manner, in which he has discharged his arduous duties. He has, in fact, despatched as much business during this one term, as our New York city judges are wont to do in four; a fact which reflects great honor upon himself, and no small discredit upon those of his official brethren whom he so greatly excels.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.—The National Gazette of the 5th inst. contains a report on this institution made up to the 31st March: the result of which shows that the stock is now worth forty-six and 91-100 dollars per share. The truth of this result depends, of course, on the accuracy of the estimates of assets—and of this we cannot judge. Nothing is more difficult, in the way of valuation, than to decide on the actual value of sixty-nine millions of miscellaneous bank securities. At any rate, we should be glad to see this vexatious question so far settled that the public may know how to regard the stock, and the operators in Wall street be choked off from this one subject of their legalized and respectable gambling.

KENNEBEC ELECTION.—In the election for the choice of a member of Congress for the Kennebec District in Maine, in place of Mr. Evans, who is chosen to the Senate, Mr. David Bronson was chosen by 3861 votes. John Hubbard, the Democratic candidate, had 1970; Ebenezer Child, Abolitionist, 310, and there were besides 182 scattering. Whig majority, 1509.

THE STEAM SHIP CALEDONIA. Capt. McKellar, sailed from Boston Thursday afternoon, of last week, with 33 passengers for Liverpool, and 13 for Halifax. Among the former was Sir George Arthur, late Lieut. Governor, and deputy Governor of Upper Canada, who arrived here on the preceding day from Montreal. The steamer took out 9800 letters, and 5000 packages of newspapers.

THE GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS has appointed Monday, the 3d day of May, for an election in the 5th Congressional District, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Levi Lincoln.

THE MERCHANT'S WIDOW, AND OTHER TALES, by Mrs. Caroline M. Sawyer.

This is a most interesting and agreeable little book—the production of a lady, for whom the public already entertain a most favorable regard. We have not yet had time to review it. Published by P. Price, 130 Fulton-st.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE COMMON COUNCIL.—The Board of Aldermen met last Tuesday evening. A message was received from the Acting Mayor, announcing the death of the President. Alderman Smith offered certain resolutions expressive of sympathy and condolence. It was resolved that a committee of six be appointed to make arrangements for fitting solemnities on this occasion. It was also directed that the Chambers of both Boards of the Common Council be hung in black.

At the Board of Assistants Mr. President Lee announced the melancholy event which had called them together in a feeling and appropriate manner. The resolutions from the other Board were unanimously adopted.

AGENTS WANTED.—To sell the NEW WORLD in Syracuse, Catskill, Auburn, Geneva, Palmyra, Canandaigua, Batavia, Lockport, Oswego, Cleveland, O., and Detroit. Terms, $4 per hundred copies, in advance. Agents also wanted to sell the NEW WORLD in all the villages in the United States, where none are already established. Applications, post-paid, must be made to the publisher, 30 Ann street, New York.

Agents or other persons who have copies of No. 23 and 28 of the Quarto World, will please return them to the office, for which the regular price will be allowed.

FUNERAL SERMON,

Delivered in the Presbyterian Church in Washington, on the Sabbath after the decease of the late President of the U. States; in presence of President Tyler and members of the Cabinet.

BY THE REV. CORTLANDT VAN RENSSELAER
Of Burlington, N. J., (temporarily residing in Washington.)

1 Peter i. 24, 25. For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away: but the word of the Lord endureth for ever.

The instructions of Heaven are best realized amidst the solemnities of the grave. The ministrations of sorrow reveal with portentous gleams of eternity, how all below is fleeting—how all above endures.

Jesus, by his Spirit and providence, has often traversed the Judea, Samaria and Galilee of our country. Often has he taught in our sanctuaries, cried aloud in our streets, stood upon our mountains, uttered his voice upon our waters, admonished in our councils, and knocked at the door of our humble dwellings. But, lo! he has now entered the habitation of our power. For the first time, he has commissioned his providence to open the mansion of the nation with the keys of death, and to maintain the rights of God and the grave.

Our President is dead! The hero of battles is at rest; and the ruler of councils is silent. The changes of a single moon have reflected the light of heaven upon the vanity of earthly glory. Had our Capitol disappeared in the visions of the night, it would not have had more the appearance of miraculous interposition. As men struck down in amazement, we know not whither to turn, nor what judgment to dread as the next Omnipotent visitation. There is mourning throughout the land, for the first-born of our honor has fallen! The lamentations of a smitten people cry out to God in a united agony, which breaks the peace of the Sabbath, and yet corresponds with its highest purposes of repentance and faith, and of prostration before "the Lord God omnipotent" that reigneth! Emblems of woe are upon us; and within us is affliction itself. Shrouded in black is the nation, the men in power, the sanctuaries of Zion, and the high places of our glory. Yonder deserted mansion, with its proud pillars and halls of festivity, and silent chambers, is darkened, as with the shadow of death; and out of its walls issues a voice, audible in tones of power and mercy, "All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass: the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away. But the word of the Lord endureth for ever."

Mourning people! let God be magnified! His purposes, though mystery on earth, are wisdom in Heaven! Be it ours to attend to the lessons of his Providence, by pondering upon the vanity of our estate, and obeying the precepts of his enduring Word!

I. "All flesh is grass"—"the grass withereth."—Thus does God describe our earthly condition and doom. Faithful to the race, whom his power brought into being, He admonishes us that we are born to die. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," is the sentence of universal condemnation fearfully executed through all generations. The millions who have gone before us—in number unutterable!—is the testimony of death to the sin of Eden, and to our inheritance of woe. The dead of even one generation would encircle the earth with a pathway of coffins! Ye living men, the hollow sound of sepulchres beneath your feet is the assurance of your doom!

We must all depart.—How many die in infancy! Tender blades on creation's soil, they perish in an hour.—How many die in early youth! They have passed the terrific perils of infancy, and hope seems to have bound firmly around their brows the garland of life. But whilst we fondly gaze, they disappear. "They flee as a shadow, and continue not." "They are as the green herb—as the grass on the house-top—as corn blasted before it is grown up."—"In the morning, they flourish; before noon, they are cut down and withered."—In manhood and mature life how many others are brought low! Though strong in human strength, they are but as the grass before the scythe. They abide not when the king of terrors sends forth his mandate. He touches them with the sceptre of the grave, and they fall, submissive subjects at his feet. "There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death." Strength of constitution, vigor of motion, health of limb, power of effort, energy of endurance, are held in derision, even by the very worms which turn us into corruption.—Comparatively few are the victims, white with age, and bowed down with care. Even the old must die. Age, like infancy, of which it is at last the antitype, sinks, without the power of a hopeful struggle. The marks of three score years and ten, identify it as ready prey; and if labor and sorrow hold it up to the confines of four score, yet at last it meets the general doom.

We need, indeed, no evidences to convince us of our mortality; but we need continual warnings to keep us mindful of it. Such is our forgetfulness of the lessons of His providence, that God sends death among us in every variety of form, of method, of period, of circumstance. In almost every death, there is something new and peculiar; something to preserve the sense of our insecurity, and to make us realize, with Job, "I know that thou wilt bring me to death."

What an exhibition of our mortality is the dispensation which has filled a nation with dismay! The venerable form, which so recently was the object of our reverence and patriotic affection, has been carried away into sepulchral darkness. But yesterday, he stood among us in the green vigor of years; alas, he is now decaying in the desolate and kindred earth. His eye will no more open upon us with its benignity, singleness of purpose, and intelligence. His lips will never more speak words of affection and patriotism to his endeared people. His face will never again be brightened with a smile; nor will his frail and oppressed hand ever shrink again from the hearty welcome of the old soldier, and the equal enthusiasm of ten thousands of admiring freemen. No! His form, lifeless, motionless, cold, corrupting, we have carried to the place appointed for all living. "Thou changest his countenance and sendest him away."—"As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it and it is gone: and the place thereof shall know it no more." The people will soon lie side by side with their President. The whole living nation will, in a few short years, be beneath the clouds of the valley. Mortality is the degradation which sin has marked upon our bodies. All must die. Whatever be our rank, or station, or learning, or endowments, or character, or destiny, we must all lie down as in a sleep, and be gathered, as our fathers were, to the all-devouring grave. The dust of Kings, of Presidents, of rulers, soon mingles with the dust of subjects, citizens, and slaves; yea, with the dust of the withered grass—the emblem of man's condition and decay. "All flesh is grass—the grass withereth."

II. "And all the glory of man is as the flower of the grass"—"the flower thereof falleth away." Not only is the body withering grass, but all the glory of man's earthly existence is as the falling flower. Neither body nor spirit have an abiding honor in this world of vanity and degradation.

1. All the glory of man's intellectual endowments—of what avail are they, when God requirerth the soul? Though "we understood all mystery and all knowledge," yet in these alone we are "nothing." In the hour of death, the mightiest mind parts for ever from all its pride of attainments. Though we may pass, in the visions of intellect and science, from star to star, and glory amidst distant worlds, in the discovery of new laws and facts in the government of infinite creation, our knowledge vanisheth away like the shadowy thoughts of an infant's only dream! Where is the wise man whose wisdom is available against the terrors of the grave? How vain becomes the learning of a race, which "perishes from morning to evening!" The acquisitions of science, the noblest aspirations of jurisprudence, the knowledge of choicest antiquity, the aims and measures of political sagacity—all the profoundest study of life—is to a dying man like the folly of fools. "Deth not the excellency, which is in them, go away! They die, even without wisdom." Though "the well-spring of wisdom be as a flowing brook," it is lost in the waters of the swelling Jordan.

2. The glory of rank and elevation likewise disappears at death. It is as perishing as the power which gave it being, or as the pomp which is the emblem of its duration. "On the eyelids" of kings, there is the "shadow of death;" in the hearts of rulers is "veiation of spirit." The corruption, which belongs to our bodies is transferred to the glory of our best estate. "Man in his best estate is altogether vanity." The possession of rank and station tends indeed to gratify ambition, by securing homage and multiplying the resources of power. But the honors to the brow are without peace to the heart. Their enjoyments are the temptations of worldliness to depravity, and are inferior to the comforts of poverty, integrity, and toil. The royal preacher declares, "I was great and increased more than all they that were before me in Jerusalem," and "I withheld not my heart from any joy." "And behold all was vanity and vexation of spirit; and there was no profit under the sun." All the glory of Solomon has fallen like the cedars of Lebanon. His palaces and temples, and all the insignia of his reign have no abiding place on the earth; are unknown even in the memory of man. If such glory thus passeth away, like the flower of the field, (which it equalled not,) what glory of man can hope to survive in the visions of most presumptuous ambition! How brief and uncertain, too, is the period of present enjoyment! We have been taught by impressive Providence the end of all human distinction. Our President has been suddenly taken from the honors of a grateful people, to be placed beneath the soil on which they tread. The distant echoes of his inauguration triumphs are reverberated beyond the mountains, to mingle with the mournings of his funeral solemnities. Yonder mansion, which he lately entered in glory, has seen him carried out of it in dust. Though "the glory of his house be increased" yet "when he dieth he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him." "All the glory of man is as the flower of the grass, the flower thereof falleth away."

3. The glory of riches is of the same fleeting character. Strange that man should set his heart so firmly upon that which perishes, and then cleave to it as though it were to endure! Yet there is hardly any possession, which more engages the aim and pursuit of our race, than wealth. It is sought for with an avidity that scorns oceans, and mountains, and deserts and climates. Stoop down for the flower which your feet have trodden from its stem of grass, and learn, from its decay, the vanity of your anxious toil. "They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave." The wealth of the Esterhazys, treasured up as a glorious inheritance, is of no use to those who assisted in its accumulation, nor will long serve the vanity of its present possessors. "For, we brought nothing into this world; and it is certain that we can carry nothing out." Yet, our race is bent on evil, on the evil of the glory of wealth. If Canova were awaiting directions for a man, who would fitly represent the race, we would say to him (especially for this generation,) "Chisel him in the attitude of grasping!" And when he had completed the statue, we would add, "Make another in the attitude of death!" The two together—the one representing the spirit, and the other the end of riches—would fitly describe the nature of its glory.

4. The glory of arms is similar in its shadowy end. Many mighty warriors have been conspicuous in their generation, receiving, when living, the applause of armies and nations, and when dead, the highest honors. But their glory went not with them beyond the darkness of the grave. Unsatisfied Alexander could weep in want of an unconquered world; and Napoleon, trembling at Moscow amidst the flames, and at St. Helena amidst the waves, was at last insensible to the honors of his faithful France. Our own country, separated from contending nations, has yet had its share in the peril of conflicts, and in the strife of battles. How few survive to enjoy the rewards of our war of Revolution! "How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!" That generation of heroes has already almost vanished from the scenes of its glory! And of the leaders in our second war, how many are gone! Beyond the promotions of army or navy, they will never more serve that country, whose honor was dearer than life! The last of the dead was the hero of many conflicts. He often heard the war cry of the Indian, and the roar of cannon, and guided to victory the armies of his country. Methinks I see him, near the sources of the Wabash, preparing for the exigencies of an eventful morning. Before the twilight his sleep is broken by sentinel-guns. Battle rages. He is in the midst of the conflict. The voice we lately heard so clear and loud at the Capitol, is sounding above the noise of battle in its tones of high command. Yes, I see him, with his country's sword in his hand, and the fire of battle in his eye, charging upon the savage foe with the enthusiasm of victory. But hark! The din of war is hushed!—And see! The conqueror sleeps in the grave with the prophet!

Such is the glory of man, of whatever kind; fleeting as the shadows of his body, or the dust of his grave. "Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" "All flesh is grass: and all the glory of man as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, the flower thereof falleth away. But the word of the Lord endureth forever."

III. It is profitable to turn from the vanities of earth to the enduring "WORD OF THE LORD;" from vain glory to truth, and heaven, and immortality! Great is the transition! which may the Spirit assist us to understand and to realize!

1. "The word of the Lord endures for ever" in the majesty of Him it represents. God's revelation, the image of his own glory, is unchanging as his own existence. Like Jehovah himself, it is beyond the reach of the vanities and changes of man's estate, the revolutions of empires, and the final convulsions of nature. "The heavens and the earth shall pass away, but his word shall not pass away." "For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven!" The stability of the throne is its truth; the praises of universal dominion are its testimonies; and the holiness, justice and goodness of God, its everlasting and sure foundations. "In the beginning was the Word; and the Word was with God, and the Word was God."

2. This word also endures forever in the principles of salvation, which it establishes. "The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth." Coming to "seek and to save that which was lost," Jesus lived a life of holiness, benevolence and atonement. He procured salvation for our race, by reconciling Justice and Mercy through the cross. He cried "IT IS FINISHED!" Oh cry, unknown in creation! Rocks quaking, sun darkened, vail rent, dead rising, sinners trembling, witnessed the triumphs of everlasting truth in the sacrifice of eternal love. "The word of the Lord endureth forever; and this is the word which by the Gospel is preached unto you." "Without the shedding of blood, there is no remission of sins." "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" but "by grace are ye saved through faith." "In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sin." "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." These principles of our salvation, which, in a word, embrace the acknowledgment of sin, faith in the atonement of Jesus Christ, regeneration by the Holy Spirit, and obedience of life, are everlasting principles. They endure whilst the world endures; yea, beyond all earthly destinies, in results for which eternity has no bounds of degree or measure of duration.

3. This Word of the Lord endures forever in the rule of life, which is our glorious guide. Love to God and love to man are the fulfilling of the commandments. They are the sum of our duty, the source of our happiness, the measure of our sanctification, and the abiding standard of our preparation for heaven. The precepts of the Gospel, which are of equally permanent obligation, enjoin self denial, the regulation of the heart, the crucifixion of the lusts of the flesh, victory over the world, and, in short, the exhibition of the graces of the Spirit, and the imitation of the life of Christ. How different a life, regulated by the enduring rule, from one of worldliness, pleasure, and unchastened ambition! It is a life which possesses the spirit and the principles of immortality. Jesus, who was both "life and immortality," overcame the world in every form of temptation; he rejected the kingdoms of the world with all their glory, and lived above its honors to the glory of God the Father. His disciples, regulating their lives by the same precepts and motives, subject themselves to the authority of the same government, which is "from everlasting to everlasting."

4. And this suggests the eternal sanctions by which "the Lord's word endureth for ever."

Brethren! does the destiny of man perish, like the withered grass of his body, and the fallen flower of his glory? No! children of immortality! No! Ye are of the life and the resurrection! They that are in the graves shall hear the voice "of the Son of God," "and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Wonders, passing the awe of a single providence, shall fill the firmament with mightiest miracles. The tramp of the archangel, the glorious appearing of Christ, the shining of the angelic host, the resurrection of the dead, the fire-consuming scroll of these heavens and this earth, the solemnities of the general judgment, will reveal in the light of glorious Omnipotence, Justice and Mercy, the eternal destiny of all the race of Adam. Woe will be the doom of those who sought the acquisitions of knowledge, the exaltation of station, the accumulation of wealth, and the honor of arms, to the neglect of the spirit, "created in the image of God," and adorned with his immortality! Yes, the worldliness and vanity of a life spent in despising the cross of Christ, shall suffer all the threatenings of Divine Justice. "The word of the Lord endureth for ever." But who can describe the triumphs of those, who, by a life of faith on earth, were preparing for the glory, honor and immortality of the skies! Knowledge indeed will be theirs; the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, the knowledge of perfections, of Redemption, of Providence, of expanding creations, of angels' state, and Heaven's service. Exaltation will be theirs: the exaltation of kings and priests—of diadems and thrones—of glorious society—of the new nature and the new song. Wealth will be theirs; the wealth of spiritual blessedness, of God's love, of unstained righteousness, of promises fulfilled, of realities possessed. Victory will be theirs; the victory over the world, over principalities of the air, over the depravity within—victory, in the possession of Canaan, in the prospects of peace, in the enjoyments of God's abiding glory! Sweet will it be to exchange the cares and sorrows and degradation of this life, for the high praises and possessions of that which is to come! Sweet to lie down in the dust, and "awake in Thy likeness!" Sweet to wash the last pollution of our feet in the Jordan, and to enter with hallelujahs the gate of Heaven!

"All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away. But the word of the Lord endureth forever."

Even so, our Father! The grass and its flower are our withered inheritance here, but may the promises of thy Word be our eternal reward!

These meditations afford an appropriate introduction to a brief notice of the life and character of one, who was lately numbered among the great of the earth.

William Henry Harrison, the late President of the United States, was born in Charles City county, Va., in 1773. Having received a liberal education at Hampden Sydney College, he commenced the study of medicine; but his thoughts were soon turned to the preservation of his countrymen, through the profession of arms. With the blood of the Revolution in his veins, he determined to assist in repelling the Indian atrocities on our frontier. In '92, at the age of 19, he received the commission of Ensign from Gen. Washington; and thus he entered the public service by holding in his hands the flag of his country—a banner never tarnished by any act of his long and eventful life. He was soon promoted, and was the aid of General Wayne in the great battle fought in '94, which procured for the West a temporary emancipation from Indian cruelties. At the age of 26, he was chosen delegate in Congress for the Northwestern Territory. The next year he was appointed, by President Adams, Governor of Indiana, which at that time embraced all the West, except Ohio; and a short time afterward a Commissioner to form treaties with the Indians. He continued to act as Governor under Jefferson and Madison for many years, and led our troops to victory at the battle of Tippecanoe, in 1811, and as General in the regular army, at the victory of the Thames in 1813.

The four prominent events, which will ever associate the name of Harrison with the West, are—1st. His fidelity and success in making treaties with the Indian tribes, by which he was the means of causing the title to immense tracts of country to vest in the United States. By one treaty alone he secured to the United States "fifty-one millions of acres of the richest country in the West, and the most valuable mineral region in the Union."

2d. His agency, when Delegate in Congress, and when only twenty-six years old, in laying the foundation of the pad system, under which the West has increased until Ohio outnumbers even Virginia. He was chairman of the Committee which proposed the reform by which the size of Government tracts was reduced from 4000 acres to alternate sections of 640 acres and 320 acres. Thus the public lands were in a measure taken out of the hands of speculators and large purchasers, and brought within the reach of the yeoman of the country.

3d. His military services in defending the West from Indian and British aggression. The country, presenting an immense extent of frontier, was easily accessible to savage foes. From the time of Wayne's victory near the rapids of the Miami in '94, to his own victories at the Wabash and Thames, including many active engagements, William Henry Harrison was a ruling mind in directing the American forces. He was the terror of the Indian foe, who made several attempts to assassinate him, and who regarded him at last as under the especial favor of the Great Spirit.

4th. His services as Governor of the North West Territory from 1800 to 1813. This whole Territory was under his administration. Besides disbursing the public moneys, to him belonged, for some time, the duty of legislating for its prosperity, of appointing its officers, of confirming grants of land, of arranging its counties and townships, of superintending its various interests, in short, of forming and directing its new systems of institutions. His sagacity, his energy, his honesty, were never brought into suspicion; and history, with grateful devotion, will record in the archives of the mighty West, the name of Harrison as its greatest benefactor.

In 1814 he was again appointed Indian Commissioner, in connection with Governor Shelby and Governor Cass. In 1816 he was elected to the House of Representatives, and served three years. He afterward served in the Ohio Senate two years; and in 1824 was chosen to the Senate of the United States. In 1828 he was appointed by John Quincy Adams Minister to Columbia.

These various and numerous public services, in connection with his excellent sense, his inflexible integrity, his republican habits and his well-known political principles, commended him to the people as President of the United States. And the more the people knew him the more they felt the wisdom of their choice. On his way to this city, from the Miami to the Potomac, he was received with the most cordial and enthusiastic congratulations; and he entered upon his Presidential service with the highest hopes and confidence of a rejoicing people. The brief month of his administration pronounces a noble eulogy upon his memory. His inaugural address is justly considered the most republican document that has ever emanated from the source of power; and the circular to public officers instinctively reminds us of the good old days of George Washington. But we cannot tread upon political ground. We retire from it mourning that he, who so well understood the principles of the government, has been prevented by death from carrying them out.

General Harrison's mind was of a good order. He possessed excellent natural powers, and they well disciplined, well furnished, and well directed. Few men had the advantage of a better judgment; few had more sagacity and penetration. He was well versed in general history, and had the most minute knowledge of all the public characters and battles of ancient and modern times. His writings indicate facility of composition, grace of diction and good sound sense, (which the people want more than anything else.) His public and private integrity his friends delight to admire. Though he formed many treaties about the public lands, disbursed three millions of the public money, and possessed immense power, as Governor of Indiana, he left office with a purity of character hardly to be appreciated in these degenerate times. So sensitive were his feelings of honor that, (with the exception of private Secretary,) he never appointed a relative to office, and never intended to do so.

In his private feelings, he was a kind and benevolent man. Tender-hearted, compassionate, and sympathizing, he has relieved the wants of many an old soldier, and shared his frugal means with many a widow and friend. In personal address and manners, he was the very man to be popular in a republican government. He was no aristocrat in democratic disguise; but, a people's man, he went among the people in the people's dress and with the people's manners. Though President of the United States, any one could see him, even from sunrise in the morning. He had a native courteousness and condescension, united with the ease and dignity of a Virginian republican. His countenance was goodness, honesty, frankness and disinterestedness. His eye was emphatically "the light of his body;" a soft, sparkling eye—dark, but gentle; and though gentle, full of fire. Mildness and energy were hardly ever more beautifully blended.

His friends all indulge the belief that he was a man of religious principle. He was "trained up in the way he should go," by the example and instructions of maternal love. His mother (of the Bassett family,) was a woman of piety and prayer. During the General's last visit to Virginia, he occupied his mother's apartment—the one in which he was born—and he took great interest in pointing out the closet to which she retired for private devotion, and the corner of the room where she sat by the table to read her Bible, and where she taught him on his knees to pray, "Our Father which art in heaven!" These habits were continued by the late President, especially in the closing years of his life. His "Manual of Devotion" and his Bible were his morning and evening companions. His regard for the Sabbath was increasing, with his other outward testimonies of the importance of religion. The first Sabbath after his inauguration, he was very much annoyed by some persons, who had been admitted into his house, contrary to his orders; and he remarked to one of the family, "We must break up at once this Sunday visiting."

The next Sabbath some of the Foreign Ambassadors called, and were refused admittance, as being contrary to the President's habits; but in the evening, some gentlemen, under the plea of being particular friends, thoughtlessly intruded upon the quiet of his mansion. He sat with them a few minutes in evident uneasiness; and after rising and walking about the room a little, he turned and said to them with great kindness, "Gentlemen, I shall be happy to see you any evening but Sunday evening;" and he retired to his room, leaving them with some other members of his family. His general respect for religion was familiar to all, particularly in his attendance on the House of God, both in the morning and afternoon; part of the day in the Episcopal, and the other part in the Presbyterian church. The two last sermons he heard in Presbyterian churches, were from the texts "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation;" and "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." The preacher who addresses you, happened to be in the bookstore when he came in to purchase a Bible—"the best in the store;" and the President expressed his great surprise that there was no Bible in the President's mansion. He remarked that "the Bible ought to be a part of the furniture of the house; and," he added, "I intend to buy, out of the Congressional appropriation, the best copy I can find, and to write in it, 'The President of the United States, from the People of the United States.'" On another occasion, he expressed his deep sense of his religious obligation, and his determination to unite with the church; which, he said, he would have done four years ago, if it had not been for the turmoil and suspicions of the political contest. The same thing he repeatedly said to many of his relatives and friends during this long period; and, for the last time, on his death-bed. When we consider that the President had been instructed from his youth in religion, that his constant attendance on public worship, and the reading of his Bible, made him well acquainted with the true terms of communion, and that he was a man of uncommon frankness and honesty of speech, we have a strong assurance that his oft-expressed determination came from the desires of a renewed heart. Especially, when we remember the great purity and integrity of his character, and the even tenor and religious habits of his well-ordered life. He had doubtless his infirmities—for he was a man; but many traits of true Christian discipleship shall be pondered upon in the spirit of charity and in the consolations of hope.

But the time drew near for him to stand in the presence of Him, who "knoweth our frame" and whose "mercy is from everlasting to everlasting."

Having been unremittingly engaged in attention to public business, and in arranging the measures of his new administration, his frame suffered much from his cares and toil. On Thursday, the 25th of March, he caught a slight cold, from having his hair cut, and from undue exposure. On the day following, he was overtaken in a shower, which increased the symptoms. On Saturday, according to custom, he took a walk early in the morning, visited the market, and stopped to converse with a number of friends. On his return, he was unable to eat any breakfast; but still went into the public room, and saw a number of persons on private and public business. Continuing unwell, he was prevailed upon to send for a physician, who prescribed some medicine. On Sunday, his fever increased, accompanied with pain in the breast, and general symptoms of pneumonia. Cupping was resorted to, which, however, had no beneficial effect. The disease was not arrested; and it may be remarked that, during its progress, he suffered, at times, very acute pain, but in patience. It was thought best to keep him so quiet that it was not deemed advisable to admit the ministers of the Gospel; and even his own family had very little intercourse with him, except to attend constantly to his wants. He frequently remarked that he was very sick, "more sick than they think I am." On Tuesday, he reiterated, to the Governor of Iowa, his convictions of the truth of religion, and his purpose to unite with the church of Christ, if he was restored to health. But his restoration was not the will of God. Hopes and fears alternately prevailed, in the midst of general anxiety. On Thursday, he passed a very restless night; and on Friday evening, for the first time, there was great alarm felt throughout the whole city; but on Saturday morning, he revived, and not a little. Some of his physicians thought they discerned favorable symptoms. He himself felt much better. All this time the 103d Psalm was read to him by a faithful female friend.

In the presence of several of his family, he thanked the Lord, with a loud voice, for His goodness, and seemed overpowered with deep emotion. He also expressed satisfaction at the prospect of being raised up, to resume the prosecution of his public measures, which he had much at heart. Great was the joy which now spread throughout the city with the rapidity of self-diffusing sympathy; but, like all earthly joy, a brief hour doomed it to sorrow.

At 3 o'clock, the most dangerous symptoms foretold the speedy termination of the disease; and at 6, his faithful physicians pronounced him beyond their skill. His family, and the members of his cabinet (for the first time admitted,) surrounded his bed-side, without hope. His pastor made a prayer, from his breathing more softly, he seemed to hear. But his eyes were shut, and death was preparing to finish its work. At 9 o'clock, he again revived; and, perhaps knowing that his cabinet were near him, he uttered words for them, for his country, and for his successor: "Sir, I wish you to understand the true principles of government. I wish them carried out. I ask nothing more." The last struggles had already commenced, but they were not violent. Only once after this did he seem to suffer pain; and he attempted, for the last time, to raise his arm. His breathings now became softer and more gentle, until his slumbers, peaceful as those of a little child, were interrupted by the God of the living and of the dead. He expired half an hour after midnight, on Sunday morning, April 4th.

As I stood, on that Sabbath, by the side of his venerable form, dressed for the grave, and with awe-struck sensibility placed my hand on his cold and death-smitten brow, and smoothed his silvery hairs, I understood "The dust shall return to the earth, as it was; and the spirit shall return to God, who gave it!"

And has he gone? Is earth so full of wonders! Yes, our President, the good and great, has gone for ever from the theatre of fame—from inauguration triumphs and funeral honors—gone into the land of spirits—to Washington, and Adams, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe,—to rest till the morning of the resurrection!

Farewell, old soldier; thy warfare is accomplished! Farewell, humble cultivator of our earthly soil; there is a better harvest in a better land!

Farewell, wise, and pure, and upright statesman; thy last words and wishes for the Constitution are welcomed by the people as their legacy, and shall be transmitted to their children to the latest generation!

Farewell, farewell, our President, venerable with the crown of years and of honor;—in our joy, we almost forgot that thou wert mortal; in our sorrow, we will remember and be glad in thy immortality!

Turning from the dead, (for the last look must be given, though long we linger,) might I, with propriety, address our new President, I would say, in behalf of the church,

SIR—The salutations of a free and Christian people welcome you to your station. Called into authority by Providence, and under the Constitution, may you fulfil the just purposes of both! The end of all greatness is seen in your elevation. The temptations which crowd around power are many; but there is a Bible in the people's mansion, which will afford divine guidance. We will pray that the King of Kings may enable our President to conform to all the outward observances of religion, and to possess in his own soul its sweet and sure rewards. Long and useful may your life be, and peaceful your dying hour!

To the members of the Cabinet, I would say, COUNCILLORS, true and tried!—A heavy affliction has come upon you in the early morning of an auspicious day. Through life remember the life and death of your departed chief. God has warned you with a warning that summons you to the meditations of eternity. No wisdom, nor glory, nor device, will save you from the grave. The terms of the Gospel are rich in mercy and hope. Live lives of usefulness to your country; "quit ye like men," and be prepared for the high service of your God in Heaven!

To the people of the United States, this Providence appeals as with the power of miracles. It says, "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils," and know that the Lord is God! Of late there has been too great a tendency to man-worship, which is idolatry. Many other crying sins are abroad in the land, which might justly incur the divine displeasure. Though we may not specify the particular sins, which may have caused this great visitation to descend upon us, there is evil enough in the North, and South, and East, and West, to justify any measures of retributive infliction. God has already punished our nation by terrific fires, by awful disasters on our rivers and ocean, by frightful disease, by the almost universal prostration of commerce, and of the various branches of business, by individual losses, and State embarrassments; in short, by private and public judgments of various admonitory kinds. And lo! what manner of punishment hath He meted out to us now! If we repent not, nor humble ourselves before Him, He has other visitations in store for us. Signs of war are already flashing across our horizon; and God has at His command innumerable methods of omnipotent retribution. May we stand in awe and sin not. May we be instructed in the season of His Providential warning; lest, at last, He "rule us with a rod of iron, and dash us in pieces like a potter's vessel!"

But this, our individual and our national calamity, would fail of one of its most direct purposes, did it not solemnize us all into preparations for our own death. Let this dispensation never be forgotten! Let it chasten us in the midst of mirth; haunt away unlawful pleasures; correct the delusions and vain aspirations of this life; remind us of our mortality, and guide us to an "inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more." No more enjoyment of Gospel privileges, of sweet Sabbath light, of pleading conscience, and of the Spirit's call, shall bring back hope from the gloom of the sepulchre! How soon, alas! may the "silver cord be loosed," and the "golden bowl," or "pitcher," or "wheel," be broken into meanness dust! Mortals, attend to the earnest entreaties of Jehovah's power! He, who can do such works as He hath done, can surely deal with you as He will. Soon must you say to corruption, "thou art my father;" to the worm, "thou art my mother and my sister." Oh, before that hour of desolation cometh, learn to say to God, Thou art my portion; and to Christ, Thou art my hope!

Beings, who witness, as we do, so many demonstrations of love, and truth, and goodness, and justice, and might, and mercy—all passing before us with the glory of the Lord—ought to remember that such high privileges involve high responsibilities. "The kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them" shall depart; but your soul—your immortal soul—outliving the vanities of life and the degradation of the grave, shall receive eternal blessedness in Heaven, or eternal misery in Hell. Our days are as grass, and our glory as its flower; but the word of the Lord endureth for ever.

Our bodies, which are soon to be dust, will, if Christ be in us, arise to the glories of celestial existence. No more shall the yew and cypress be twined for our tomb; but the brow of the Christian shall have a diadem of beauty brighter than the light of the morning, and incorruptible as immortality! In the great day, when nations and rulers shall be summoned by the trump of the archangel, may our President be seen in robes of righteousness, at God's right hand; and may we all be there to swell the praise!

A SERMON,

Preached on Easter Sunday, in the Unitarian Church, Washington City; the interment of President Harrison having taken place during the preceding week.

BY THE REV. S. G. BULFINCH.

John xi. 25, 26. I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.

In the discourse of last Sabbath morning, my friends, I noticed briefly the sad event which had just been made known to us. Since then, we have witnessed, and borne our part in, those last honors, which a mourning nation has rendered to the remains of its Chief. We have looked for the last time on the venerable and placid features of the departed; we have seen the ensigns of mourning hung out alike from the halls of state, and the dwellings of the people; we have joined the slow-moving train, which accompanied the corpse to its resting place;—that train so strangely resembling, yet so sadly unlike, the proud array of the preceding month. It passed over the same ground; but where before, shouts of congratulation had welcomed him who was to guide the destinies of his country, now the silence was only broken by the music of the funeral march, the tolling of the funeral bell, or the peal of artillery that told of the nation's loss. We have left the body of our Chief Magistrate in the dark and silent tomb, "alone, with his glory." Our sympathy has been given to his bereaved family. It remains for us to attend to those lessons which Providence designs to teach us by this solemn event.

The first of these lessons is, of the uncertainty of life—the necessity of continual preparation for that event which must at some time take place, and which, in so many instances, comes unexpectedly. Who thought, when, on the fourth of the last month, the President addressed that immense throng with a voice that was heard to its extremity, and with a manner partaking of the energy of youth—who then thought, that the day of his departure was so nigh? As little, probably, did it enter his own mind. He was stating those principles which were intended to be pursued in an administration of the government for years: but one short month commenced and ended the course to which he could apply them. He is gone. His plans of life, his domestic arrangements, his public measures, all interrupted, ere they had been fully entered upon. He is gone. May we, who are left, receive and heed the lesson of Providence, "Be ye also ready."

Another admonition which we receive from what has recently taken place, is of the supreme control exercised by the Almighty of the destinies of men—alike of individuals and of nations. Often are we reminded by the sudden occurrence of the event of death, that the designs of individuals are liable at any moment to be frustrated by a higher power; but, in the present instance, we perceive that the same uncertainty attends the destiny of nations, where thousands and tens of thousands have united to honor one of their brethren, to sustain his policy, to bear him forward as their chosen leader—where a mighty people, through its constituted organs, has solemnly recognised in him its chief—what is all this—the ardent wishes of strong and numerous partisans—the majestic will of a united people—what is it all before the dispensation of the overruling Providence—before the hand of God? It was said in ancient times, and proved in many an impressive instance, that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will;" nor is it less true with us, wisely as our plan of government has been arranged—guarded as it has been to secure to the people themselves the attainment of their desires. In vain do they deliberate, if Almighty Wisdom determine otherwise. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain who build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

This consideration should impress upon us, as a people, a lesson of practical application. It should teach us to look less to individuals and more to the Ruler of all—to check that spirit of personal partisanship, of man-worship, which has been gaining such ascendancy among us of late years. It becomes the minister of the Gospel to be cautious in his allusions to subjects so remote from the scene of his professional employments, and of so exciting a nature, as popular elections. But the wise and good among those who supported the late lamented President when a candidate for the high office he attained, will, I think, generally agree with me, that the enthusiasm which bore him onward in triumph, was, with thousands, more for the man than for his principles—that it was manifested and encouraged in modes scarcely consistent with the dignity of a mighty nation. The evils to which I refer have been seen and felt to be such by many who yet admitted them to be necessary. Such things, it may be, cannot entirely be prevented; and it is better, probably, that a free people should be too excitable in the exercise of the great elective franchise, than too indifferent. Yet it may not be in vain to use the solemn occasion of our recent affliction, in order to call to mind the fact, that the interests of our country are not in theory, and should not be in practice, linked to the triumphal car of an individual ruler. He to whom these honors were offered, was himself distinct in his avowal, that he received them not as due to himself personally; and long may the American people remember the language of that concluding portion of his Inaugural Address, in which he warned his countrymen against the evils of partisanship, when based on nothing better than a preference for individual candidates.

Another solemn lesson which the decease of the President imparts, is of the exclusive reality and importance of religion and virtue. A few months since, and how vehemently was the question discussed, of the candidate's abilities as a statesman and as a soldier;—a few weeks since, and how were the minds of the people dazzled at the thought of the power with which they had invested him, and more than that power, the overwhelming popularity, which brought so many thousands hither to witness and to adorn the spectacle of his induction into office. Now, what remains of these things? On what thoughts do a mourning people love to dwell? On that pageantry, so soon to be succeeded by the more impressive pageantry of his interment! On that power, which so soon yielded to the stern conqueror of all!—On those talents as a commander, which had distinguished his past years, or those abilities as a statesman, from which so much was fondly anticipated? No. It is on the virtues of the deceased that we look with the long, lingering gaze of filial veneration;—it is on his last words, uttered for his country, that the mind loves to dwell;—it is on his distinct declarations of reverence for religion, and the proof given us by those who knew him, that this reverence was not only expressed, but felt. These things remain, when all else has passed away; these are in their nature permanent—all else is fleeting. These enable us, with the glance of faith, to follow the spirit of our country's friend to another world, and to trust that there, not as a leader of warriors—not as the ruler of a nation—but as a good man and a Christian, he has met with acceptance from the Father of us all. And what qualities are those which now engage the feelings of his mourning relatives, and of those who knew him in the retirement of his home? Is he lamented among them as the soldier and the statesman? The honors that he won, the plans of government which he had formed, do these call forth the tears of conjugal and filial affection? No. It is for a husband and a father that they flow. It is for the hospitable neighbor, the courteous companion, the kind friend, the judicious adviser, the honest man. And though it is from his exalted station that we, and thousands of others, have been led to feel an interest in him, it is because that station has placed him within our view, and enabled us to know something which we should not otherwise have known, of the character of the individual. It is not for the mere occupant of an exalted office that the country laments. It is for the pure patriot, and the good man.

Station, then, my friends, is not that which is most worthy of our aspirations. Be our station high or low, it is by our individual characters that we shall be judged, in the sight of our fellow men, and of our God. Would that this great truth were more generally felt—that men more commonly realized that the degree in which an individual is honored and beloved in society depends far less on what office he fills, than on what he is; and that where real dignity exists, it is given by the man to the office, not by the office to the man. Such is the case everywhere, to a far greater extent than is imagined. Such in our own country, notwithstanding all the distinctions of society that exist, is peculiarly the case. Let those, then, whose imaginations are kindled, and whose ambition excited by the honors which have been rendered, in life and in death, to the illustrious departed, remember that all which is most valuable in those honors is the result, not of exalted station, but of individual worth; and that even that exalted station itself, through which the personal worth of its occupant became more generally known, was but the result of that worth—the gift of a grateful people to one whom they believed honest and faithful, even more than great. And let them remember too, that while all earthly honors fade, and all earthly greatness, even intellectual, seems comparatively worthless, the treasures of virtue and of faith survive the tomb, in the remembrance of tearful friends, and in the judgment of that Being in whose awful sight human distinctions are as nothing.

And thanks be to that blessed Saviour, whose religion enables us to look beyond the tomb. Sad, sad indeed would the dispensations of Providence be, did not light from on high penetrate their darkness. Yes, to that happier world may we look forward, now that Christ has risen, the first-born from the dead. This day, my friends, which circumstances have thus marked out for meditation on the afflictive dispensations of Providence, is distinguished also, by the well-founded custom of the Church from its earliest age, as reminding us in a peculiar manner of the Christian's hope. This is the anniversary of the resurrection of our Lord. And, not like the day which commemorates his birth—a day elected arbitrarily, and sanctioned only by general consent—this season, coinciding with the Jewish festival of the Passover, at which it is known that our Saviour suffered, is thus established as the true period of that great event, and of the resurrection which succeeded it. Yes, Christ is risen. Such, throughout the ancient Greek church, is the salutation of friends to each other on this hallowed morning. Christ is risen. The victory over death has been gained. The grave is no more the last home of man. As He hath risen, even so, those that sleep in Jesus shall God bring with him. Our remaining time will be devoted to some of the thoughts thus suggested, in connection with those which have thus far occupied us.

It is, I conceive, difficult for us to realize how much the event of death has been deprived of its terrors, by the assurance which Christianity gives of another life. There is still so much sadness connected with it, so fearfully is it anticipated by those to whom it draws near,—so deeply is it mourned by the survivors, that it seems to us as though the King of Terrors was yet unconquered, and as if even Christians did not realize that there is a home for them and for their departed friends beyond the grave. But when we turn to the records of ancient times, and learn from them to what extremes the customs of mourning were then carried, when we read of the shrieks that rent the air, of the complete prostration, the desolation of spirit that was manifested in every look and every action of the bereaved, we shall realize that the general feeling on the subject of death, sad as it yet is, has been softened by the cheering influences of the religion of Jesus.

And it is that religion alone which could thus soften it, which could give to the bereaved heart any thing properly to be called an assurance of a future existence. Much have the wise and the pious discoursed of the teachings of nature with regard to another life. But their reasonings have only established the fact, that nature, if her teachings are correctly interpreted, does not contradict the doctrine of a resurrection, or, at most, that the balance of argument is in its favor. And yet, when we see the lifeless remains of a friend before us, when we consign those remains to their silent resting place, even these conclusions seem overpowered by the sadly present fact that the vital principle has fled, and that the body is, we know, to be again blended with the elements from which it was formed. We want an assurance stronger than nature gives us,—stronger, and of a different kind. We want not the result of a train of reasoning, which other specious reasoning may overthrow; we want the warrant of authority, the declaration of our God. We want, if it may be so, an instance of a resurrection taking place, to establish our belief in the possibility of a resurrection.

And this assurance, and this instance of a resurrection, has our God bestowed on us in the Gospel and in the person of our Saviour. Jesus spake as having authority,—not as Socrates, who reasoned from the supposed preexistence of man, that he would exist hereafter,—a true conclusion from false premises. Jesus spake, not as his own disciples in later days, from the indistinct teachings of nature, but by the authority of that declaration from above, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye him." And our Saviour declared the truth, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." And not only did he declare this truth. In his own resurrection he gave the proof of it; and "as by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead."

"He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." No: death is not now what it was before that Saviour appeared by whom these words were uttered. Now, it is but the event which connects, rather than separates, the two great periods of the same endless existence. Earthly employments indeed must end—earthly cares no longer oppress—earthly honors fade; but if the will of God hath been done on earth in humility and fervency of spirit, there remains a glorious future to the anticipation of the dying believer. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

My brethren, let us take heed to the warnings addressed to us by the Providence of God. We have seen how fleeting are the hopes, how fading the honors of this world;—that nought is permanent in its nature, except the sacred treasures of virtue and religion. Let us take hold on these. Let us faithfully discharge every trust which may be committed to us, whether of public or of private life; for thus God requires us to serve him, in usefulness to our fellow men, and the regular performance of the duties of our stations. But in them all, let us feel that all these things are to pass away, and look for our best reward, not in the applause of our fellow-mortals, but in the approbation of our own consciences, and in the favor of God.

And ever let us bless our Heavenly Father for the gift of that religion, which, as we have seen, sheds the only clear light upon the darkness of the grave. An hour will come, when all that is now most eagerly desired, will fail to satisfy, will cease to engage; when, in the immediate approach of death, we shall feel the worthlessness of riches and of earthly honors. Then may the religion of Jesus sustain the parting spirit! "May we die the death of the righteous, and may our last end be like his!" Would you obtain the fulfilment of this prayer, choose, then, while it is yet time, those treasures which alone possess real and permanent value.

Moore's New Poems.

FIFTEEN SONGS,

(HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED IN AMERICA.)

BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.,

Author of "Lalla Rookh."

[From the 8th volume of his collected Works, just published in London.]

NOT FROM THEE.

Not from thee the wound should come,
No, not from thee.
I care not what or whence my doom,
So not from thee!
Cold triumph! first to make Thy heart thy own;
And then the mirror break
Where fix'd thou shin'st alone.
Not from thee the wound should come,
Oh, not from thee.
I care not what or whence my doom,
So not from thee.

Yet no—my lips that wish recall;
From thee, from thee—
If ruin o'er this head must fall,
"T will welcome be.
Here to the blade I bare
This faithful heart;
Wound deep—thou 'lt find that there,
In every pulse thou art.
Yes, from thee I'll bear it all:
If ruin be
The doom that o'er this heart must fall,
"T were sweet from thee.

"LONG YEARS HAVE PASS'D."

Long years have pass'd, old friend, since we
First met in life's young day;
And friends long loved by thee and me,
Since then have dropp'd away;—
But enough remain to cheer us on,
And sweeten, when thus we're met,
The glass we fill to the many gone,
And the few who're left as yet.

Our locks, old friend, now thinly grow,
And some hang white and chill;
While some, like flow'rs 'mid Autumn's snow,
Retain youth's color still.
And so, in our hearts, though one by one,
Youth's sunny hopes have set,
Thank heaven, not all their light is gone,—
We've some to cheer us yet.

Then here's to thee, old friend, and long
May thou and I thus meet,
To brighten still with wine and song
This short life, ere it fleet.
And still, as death comes stealing on,
Let's never, old friend, forget,
Ev'n while we sigh o'er blessings gone,
How many are left as yet.

THERE'S SOMETHING STRANGE.

A BUFFO SONG.

There's something strange, I know not what,
Come o'er me,
Some phantom I've for ever got Before me.
I look on high, and in the sky
"T is shining;
On earth, its light with all things bright
Seems twining.
In vain I try this goblin's spells
To sever;
Go where I will, it round me dwells
For ever.

And then what tricks by day and night
It plays me;
In every shape the wicked sprite
Waylays me.
Sometimes like two bright eyes of blue
"T is glancing;
Sometimes like feet, in slippers neat,
Comes dancing.
By whispers round of every sort
I'm taunted.
Never was mortal man, in short,
So haunted.

WHEN LOVE, WHO RULED.

When Love, who ruled as Admiral o'er
His rosy mother's isles of light,
Was cruising off the Paphian shore,
A sail at sunset hove in sight.
"A chase, a chase! my Cupids all,"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

Aloft the winged sailors sprung,
And, swarming up the mast like bees,
The snow-white sails expanding flung,
Like broad magnolias, to the breeze.
"Yo ho, yo ho, my Cupids all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

The chase was o'er—the bark was caught—
The winged crew her freight explored;
And found 't was just as Love had thought,
For all was contraband aboard.
"A prize, a prize, my Cupids all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

Safe stow'd in many a package there,
And label'd aly o'er as "Glass,"
Were lots of all th' illegal ware,
Love's Custom-House forbids to pass.
"O'erhaul, o'erhaul, my Cupids all,"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

False curls they found, of every hue,
With rosy blushes, ready made;
And teeth of ivory, good as new,
For veterans in the smiling trade.
"Ho ho, ho ho, my Cupids all,"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

Mock sighs, too,—kept in bags for use,
Like breezes bought of Lapland seers,—
Lay ready here to be let loose,
When wanted, in young spinsters' ears.
"Ha ha, ha ha, my Cupids all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

False papers next on board were found,
Sham invoices of flames and darts,
Professedly for Paphos bound,
But meant for Hymen's golden marts.
"For shame, for shame, my Cupids all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

Nay, still to every fraud awake,
Those pirates all Love's signals knew,
And hoisted off his flag, to make Rich wards and heiresses bring-to.*
"A foe, a foe, my Cupid's all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

"This must not be," the boy exclaims—
"In vain I rule the Paphian seas,
"If Love's and Beauty's sovereign names
"Are lent to cover frauds like these.
"Prepare, prepare, my Cupids all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

Each Cupid stood with lighted match—
A broadside struck the smuggling foe,
And swept the whole unhallowed batch
Of falsehood to the depths below.
"Huzza, huzza! my Cupids all!"
Said Love, the little Admiral.

* "To BRING-TO, to check the course of a ship."—Falcomer.

THE RUSSIAN LOVER.

Fleetly o'er the moonlight snows
Speed me to my lady's bow'r;
Swift our sledge as lightning goes,
Nor shall step till morning's hour.
Bright, my steed, the northern star
Lights us from yon jewell'd skies;
But, to greet us, brighter far,
Morn shall bring my lady's eyes.

Lovers, lull'd in sunny bow'rs,
Sleeping out their dream of time,
Know not half the bliss that's ours,
In this snowy, icy clime.
Like yon star that livelier gleams
From the frosty heavens around,
Love himself the keener beams
When with snows of coyness crown'd.

Fleet then on, my merry steed,
Bound, my sledge, o'er hill and dale;—
What can match a lover's speed?
See, 't is daylight, breaking pale!
Brightly hath the northern star
Lit us from yon radiant skies;
But, behold, how brighter far
Yonder shine my lady's eyes!

GUESS, GUESS.

I love a maid, a mystic maid,
Whose form no eyes but mine can see;
She comes in light, she comes in shade,
And beautiful in both is she.
Her shape in dreams I oft behold,
And oft she whispers in my ear
Such words as when to others told,
Awake the sigh or wring the tear;—
Then guess, guess, who she,
The lady of my love, may be.

I find the lustre of her brow,
Come o'er me in my darkest ways;
And feel as if her voice, ev'n now,
Were echoing far off my lays.
There is no scene of joy or woe
But she doth gild with influence bright;
And shed o'er all so rich a glow
As makes ev'n tears seem full of light:
Then guess, guess, who she,
The lady of my love, may be.

THOUGH LIGHTLY SOUNDS THE SONG I SING.

A SONG OF THE ALPS.

Though lightly sounds the song I sing to thee,
Though like the lark's its soaring music be,
Thou 'lt find ev'n here some mournful note that tells How near such April joy to weeping dwells.
'T is 'mong the gayest scenes that oft'nest steal
Those saddening thoughts we fear, yet love to feel;
And music never half so sweet appears,
As when her mirth forgets itself in tears.

Then say not thou this Alpine song is gay—
It comes from hearts that, like their mountain-lay,
Mix joy with pain, and oft when pleasure's breath
Most warms the surface, feel most sad beneath.
The very beam in which the snow-wreath wears
Its gayest smile is that which wins its tears—
And passion's power can never lend the glow
Which wakens bliss, without some touch of woe.

DEAR! YES.

Dear! Yes, though mine no more,
E'en this but makes thee dearer;
And love, since hope is o'er,
But draws thee nearer.

Change as thou wilt to me,
The same thy charm must be;
New loves may come to weave
Their witchery o'er thee,
Yet still, though false, believe
That I adore thee, yes, still adore thee.
Think'st thou that aught but death could end
A tie not falsehood's self can rend?
No, when alone, far off I die,
No more to see, no more careen thee,
E'en thee, my life's last sigh
Shall be to bless thee, yes, still to bless thee.

ASK NOT IF STILL I LOVE.

Ask not if still I love,
Too plain these eyes have told thee;
Too well their tears must prove
How near and dear I hold thee.
If, where the brightest shine,
I see no form but thine,
To feel that earth can show
No bliss above thee,—
If this be love, then know
That thus, that thus, I love thee.

'Tis not in pleasure's idle hour
That thou canst know affection's power.
No, try its strength in grief or pain;
Attempt, as now, its bonds to sever,
Thou 'lt find true love's a chain
That binds for ever!

THEN FIRST FROM LOVE.

Then first from Love, in Nature's bow'rs,
Did Painting learn her fairy flow'rs,
And call the hues of loveliest flow'rs,
To picture woman lovelier still.
For vain was ev'ry radiant hue,
Till Passion lent a soul to art,
And taught the painter, ere he drew,
To fix the model in his heart.

Thus smooth his toil awhile went on,
Till, lo! one touch his art defies;
The brow, the lip, the blushes shone,
But who could dare to paint those eyes?
'T was all in vain the painter strove;
So turning to that boy divine,
"Here, take," he said, "the pencil, Love,
"No hand should paint such eyes, but thine."

STILL THOU FLIEST.

Still thou fliest, and still I woo thee,
Lovely phantom—all in vain;
Restless ever, my thoughts pursue thee,
Fleeting ever, thou mock'st their pain.
Such doom, of old, that youth besided,
Who wooed, he thought, some angel's charms,
But found a cloud that from him glided—
As though dost from these out-stretched arms.

Scarce I've said, "How fair thou shinest," Ere thy light hath vanished by;
And 't is when thou look'st divinest
Thou art still most sure to fly.
Ev'n as the lightning, that, dividing
The cloud of night, saith "Look on me,"
Then flits again, its splendor hiding—
Ev'n such the glimpse I catch of thee.

DREAMING FOR EVER.

Dreaming for ever, vainly dreaming,
Life to the last pursues its light;
Day hath its visions fairly beaming,
But false as those of night.
The one illusion, the other real,
But both the same brief dreams at last;
And where we grasp the bliss ideal,
Soon as it shines, 'tis past.

Here, then, by this dim lake reposing,
Calmly I'll watch, while light and gloom
Flit o'er its face till night is closing—
Emblem of life's short doom!
But though, by turns, thus dark and shining,
'T is still unlike man's changeful day,
Whose light returns not, once declining,
Whose cloud, once come, will stay.

HUSH, SWEET LUTE.

Hush, sweet Lute, thy songs remind me
Of past joys, now turned to pain;
Of ties that long have ceased to bind me,
But whose burning marks remain.
In each tone, some echo falleth
On my ears of joy gone by;
Ev'ry note some dream recallecth
Of bright hopes but born to die.

Yes, sweet Lute, though pain it bring me,
Once more let thy numbers thrill;
Though death were in the strain they sing me,
I must woo its anguish still.
Since no time can e'er recover
Love's sweet light when once 't is set,—
Better to weep such pleasures ever,
Than smile o'er any left us yet.

UNBIND THEE, LOVE.

Unbind thee, love, unbind thee, love,
From those dark ties unbind thee;
Though fairest hand the chain hath wove,
Too long its links have twined thee.
Away from earth! thy wings were made;
In yon mid-air to hover,
With earth beneath their dove-like shade,
And heav'n all radiant over.

Awake thee, boy, awake thee, boy,
Too long thy soul is sleeping;
And thou may'st from this minute's joy
Wake to eternal weeping.
Oh, think, this world is not for thee;
Though hard its links to sever;
Though sweet and bright and dear they be,
Break, or thou 'rt lost forever.

BRIGHT MOON.

Bright moon, that high in heav'n art shining,
All smiles, as if within thy bower to-night
Thy own Endymion lay reclining,
And thou would'st wake him with a kiss of light!—
By all the bliss thy beam discovers,
By all those visions far too bright for day,
Which dreaming bards and waking lovers
Behold, this night, beneath thy ling'ring ray,—

I pray thee, queen of that bright heaven,
Quench not to-night thy love-lamp in the sea,
Till Anthe, in this bower, hath given,
Beneath thy beam, her long-vowed kiss to me.
Guide hither, guide her steps benighted,
Ere thou, sweet moon, thy bashful crescent hide;
Let Love but in this bower be lighted,
Then shroud in darkness all the world beside.

LECTURE I.—THE HERO AS DIVINITY.

Nor was it altogether nothing, even that wild sea-roving and battling, through so many generations. It needed to be ascertained which was the strongest kind of men; who were to be ruler over whom. Among the Northland Sovereigns, too, I find some who got the title Wood-cutter; Forest-felling Kings. Much lies in that. I suppose at bottom many of them were forest-fellers as well as fighters, though the Skalds talk mainly of the latter,—misleading certain critics not a little; for no nation of men could ever live by fighting alone; there could not produce enough come out of that! I suppose the right good fighter was of course also the right good forest-feller,—the right good improver, discernor, doer, and worker in every kind; for true valor, different enough from ferocity, is the basis of all. A more legitimate kind of valor that; shewing itself against the untamed Forests and dark brute Powers of Nature, to conquer Nature for us. In the same direction have not we, their descendants, since carried it far? May such valor last forever with us!

That the man Odin, speaking with a Hero's voice and heart, as with an impressiveness out of Heaven, told his People the infinite importance of Valor, how man thereby became a god; and that his People, feeling a response to it in their own hearts, believed this message of his, and thought it a message out of Heaven, and him a Divinity for telling it them: this seems to me the primary seed-grain of the Norse Religion, from which all manner of mythologies, symbolic practices, speculations, allegories, songs and sagas would naturally grow. Grow,—how strangely! I called it a small light, shining and shaping in the huge vortex of Norse darkness. Yet the darkness itself was alive; consider that. It was the eager, inarticulate un instructed Mind of the whole Norse People, longing only to become articulate, to go on articulating ever farther! The living doctrine grows, grows,—like a Banyan-tree; the first seed is the essential thing: any branch strikes itself down into the earth, becomes a new root; and so, in endless complexity, we have a whole wood, a whole jungle, one seed the parent of it all. Was not the whole Norse Religion, accordingly, in some sense, what we called "the enormous shadow of this man's likeness?" Critics trace some affinity in some Norse mythoses, of the Creation and such like, with those of the Hindoos. The Cow Adumbla, "licking the rime from the rocks," has a kind of Hindoo look. A Hindoo Cow, transported into frosty countries. Probably enough; indeed we may say undoubtedly, these things will have a kindred with remotest lands, with the earliest times. Thought does die, but only is changed. The first man that began to think in this Planet of ours, he was the beginner of all. And then the second man, and the third man;—nay every true Thinker to this hour is a kind of Odin, teaches men his way of thought, spreads a shadow of his own likeness over sections of the History of the World.

Of the distinctive poetic character or merit of this Norse Mythology I have not room to speak; nor does it concern us much. Some wild Prophecies we have, as the Havamal in the Elder Edda; of a rapt, earnest, sibylline sort. But they were comparatively an idle adjunct of the matter, men who as it were but toyed with the matter, these latter Skalds; and it is their songs chiefly that survive. In later centuries, I suppose, they would go on singing, poetically symbolizing, as our modern Painters paint, when it was no longer from the innermost heart, or not from the heart at all. This is everywhere to be well kept in mind.

Gray's fragments of Norse Lore, at any rate, will give one no notion of it;—any more than Pope will of Homer. It is no square-built, gloomy palace of black ashlar marble, shrouded in awe and horror, as Gray gives it us: no; rough as the North rocks, as the Iceland deserts, it is; with a heartiness, homeliness, even a tint of good humor and robust mirth in the middle of these fearful things. The strong, old Norse heart did not go upon theatrical sublimities; they had not time to tremble. I like much their robust simplicity: their veracity, directness of conception. Thor "draws down his brows" in a veritable Norse rage; "grasps his hammer till the knuckles grow white." Beautiful traits of pity too, an honest pity. Balder "the white God" dies; the beautiful, benignant; he is the Sungod. They try all Nature for a remedy; but he is dead. Frigga, his mother, sends Hermode to seek or see him: nine days and nine nights he rides, through gloomy deep valleys, a labyrinth of gloom; arrives at the Bridge with its gold roof: the Keeper says, "Yes, Balder did pass here; but the Kingdom of the Dead is down yonder, far toward the North." Hermode rides on; leaps Hell-gate, Hela's gate; does see Balder, and speak with him: Balder cannot be delivered. Inexorable! Hela will not, for Odin or any God, give him up. The beautiful and gentle has to remain there. His Wife had volunteered to go with him, to die with him. They shall forever remain there. He sends his ring to Odin; Nanna his wife sends her thimble to Frigga, as a remembrance.—Ah me!—

For indeed Valor is the fountain of pity too;—of Truth, and all that is great and good in man. The robust, homely vigor of the Norse heart attaches one much, in these delineations. Is it not a trait of right honest strength, says Uhland, who has written a fine Essay on Thor, that the old Norse heart finds its friend in the Thunder-god? That it is not frightened away by his thunder; but finds that Summer-heat, the beautiful noble summer, must and will have thunder withal! The Norse heart loves this Thor and his hammer-bolt; sports with him. Thor is Summer-heat; the god of Peaceable Industry as well as Thunder. He is the Peasant's friend; his true henchman and attendant is Thialfi, Manual Labor. Thor himself engages in all manner of rough manual work, scorns no business for its plebeianism; is ever and anon travelling to the country of the Jötuns, harrying those chaotic Frost-monster, subduing them, at least straitening and damaging them. There is a great, broad humor in some of these things.

Thor, as we saw above, goes to Jötun-land, to seek Hymir's Cauldron, that the Gods may brew beer. Hymir the huge Giant enters, his grey beard all full of hoar-frost; splits pillars with the very glance of his eye; Thor, after much rough tumult, matches the Pot, claps it on his head; the "handles of it reach down to his heels." The Norse Skald has a kind of loving sport with Thor. This is the Hymir whose cattle, the critics have discovered, are Icebergs. Huge, untutored, Broddignag genius—needing only to be tamed down, into Shakespeares, Dantes, Goethes! It is all gone now, that old Norse work—Thor the Thunder-god changed into Jack the Giant-killer; but the mind that made it is here yet. How strangely things grow, and die, and do not die! There are twigs of that great world-tree of Norse Belief, still curiously traceable. This poor Jack of the Nursery, with his miraculous shoes of swiftness, coat of darkness, sword of sharpness, he is one. Child Elin in the Scotch Ballads is a Norse mythus; Elin was a Jötun. Nay, Shakespeare's Hamlet is a twig too of this same world-tree; there seems no doubt of that. Hamlet, Amleth, I find, is really a mythic personage; and his Tragedy, of the poisoned Father, poisoned asleep by drops in his ear, and the rest, is a Norse mythus! Old Saxo, as his wont was, made it a Danish history; Shakespeare, out of Saxo, made it what we see. That is a twig of the world-tree that has grown, I think; by nature or accident that one has grown!

In fact, these old Norse songs have a truth in them, an inward perennial truth and greatness—as, indeed, all must have that can very long preserve itself by tradition alone. It is a greatness not of mere body and gigantic bulk, but a rude greatness of soul. There is a sublime, uncomplaining melancholy traceable in these old hearts. A great, free glance into the very depths of thought. They seem to have seen, these brave old Northmen, what Meditation has taught all men in all ages, That this world is after all but a show—a phenomenon or appearance, no real thing. All deep souls see into that—the Hindoo Mythologist, the German Philosopher—the Shakespeare, the earnest Thinker wherever he may be:

"We are such stuff as dreams are made of."

One of Thor's expeditions to Utgard (the Outer Garden, central seat of Jötun-land,) is remarkable in this respect. Thialfi was with him, and Loke. After various adventures, they entered upon Giant-land; wandered over plains, wild uncultivated places, among stones and trees. At nightfall they noticed a house; and as the door, which indeed formed one whole side of the house, was open, they entered. It was a simple habitation; one large hall, altogether empty. They staid there. Suddenly, in the dead of the night, loud noises alarmed them. Thor grasped his hammer; stood in the door, prepared for fight. His companions within ran hither and thither in their terror, seeking some outlet in that rude hall; they found a little closet at last, and took refuge there. Neither had Thor any battle: for, lo, in the morning it turned out that the noise had been only the snoring of a certain enormous but peaceable Giant, the Giant Skrymir, who lay peaceably sleeping near by; and this that they took for a house was merely his glove, thrown aside there; the door was the glove-wrist; the little closet they had fled into was the thumb! Such a glove!—I remark, too, that it had not fingers as ours have, but only a thumb, and the rest undivided: a most ancient, rustic glove!

Skrymir now carried their portmanteau all day; Thor, however, had his own suspicions, did not like the ways of Skrymir; determined at night to put an end to him as he slept. Raising his hammer, he struck down into the Giant's face a right thunderbolt blow, of force to rend rocks. The Giant merely awoke, rubbed his cheek, and said, Did a leaf fall? Again Thor struck, as soon as Skrymir again slept, a better blow than before; but the Giant merely murmured, Was that a grain of sand? Thor's third stroke was with both his hands, (the "knuckles white," I suppose,) and seemed to dint deep into Skrymir's visage; but he merely checked his snore, and remarked, There must be sparrows roosting in this tree, I think; what is that they have dropt?—At the gate of Utgard, a place so high that you had to "strain your neck bending back to see the top of it," Skrymir went his ways. Thor and his companions were admitted; invited to take share in the games going on. To Thor, for his part, they handed a drinking-horn; it was a common feat, they told him, to drink this dry at one draught. Long and fiercely, three times over, Thor drank; but made hardly any impression. He was a weak child, they told him: could he lift that cat he saw there? Small as the feat seemed, Thor with his whole godlike strength could not; he bent up the creature's back, could not raise its feet off the ground, could at the utmost raise one foot. Why, you are no man, said the Utgard people: there is an Old Woman that will wrestle you! Thor, heartily ashamed, seized this haggard Old Woman, but could not throw her.

And now on their quitting Utgard, the chief Jötun, escorting them politely a little way, said to Thor: "You are beaten then:—yet be not so much ashamed; there was deception of appearance in it. That Horn you tried to drink was the Sea; you did make it ebb; but who could drink that, the bottomless! The Cat you would have lifted—why, that is the Midgard-snake, the Great World-serpent, which, tail in mouth, girds and keeps up the whole created world; had you torn that up, the world must have rushed to ruin. As for the Old Woman, she was Time, Old Age, Duration: with her what can you wrestle? No man nor no god with her; gods or men, she prevails over all! And then those three strokes you struck,—look at these three valleys; your three strokes made these!" Thor looked at his attendant Jötun: it was, say Norse critics, the old, chaotic, rocky Earth in person, and that glove-house was some Earth-cavern! But Skrymir had vanished; Utgard with its skyhigh gates, when Thor grasped his hammer to smite them, had gone to air; only the Giant's voice was heard mocking: "Better come no more to Jötunheim!"

This is of the allegoric period, as we see, and half play, not of the prophetic and entirely devout: but as a mythus, is there not real, antique, Norse gold in it? More true metal, rough from the Mimer-stitch, than in many a famed Greek mythus shaped far better! A great, broad, Broddignag grin of true humor is in this Skrymir; mirth resting on earnestness and sadness, as the rainbow on black tempest: only a right valiant heart is capable of that. It is the grim humor of our own Ben Jonson, rare old Ben; runs in the blood of us, I fancy; for one catches tones of it, under a still other shape, out of the American backwoods.

That is also a very striking conception that of the Ragnarok, Consummation, or Twilight of the Gods. It is in the Havamal song; seemingly a very old, prophetic idea. The Gods and Jötuns, the divine Powers and the chaotic brute ones, after long contest and partial victory by the former, meet at last in universal, world-embracing wrestle and duel; World-serpent against Thor, strength against strength; mutually extinctive; and ruin, "twilight" sinking into darkness, swallows the created Universe. The old Universe with its Gods is sunk; but it is not final death: there is to be a new Heaven and a new Earth; a higher supreme God, and Justice to reign among men. Curious: this law of mutation, which also is a law written in man's inmost thought, had been deciphered by these old, earnest Thinkers in their rude style; and how, though all dies, and even gods die, yet all death is but a Phoenix fire-death, and new-birth into the Greater and the Better! It is the fundamental Law of Being for a creature made of Time, living in this Place of Hope. All earnest men have seen into it; may still see into it.

And now, connected with this, let us glance at the last mythus of the appearance of Thor; and end there. I fancy it to be the latest in date of all these fables; a sorrowing protest against the advance of Christianity,—set forth reproachfully by some Conservative Pagan. King Olaf has been harshly blamed for his over-zeal in introducing Christianity; surely I should have blamed him far more for an under-zeal in that! He paid dear enough for it; he died by the revolt of his Pagan people, in battle, in the year 1033, at Sticklestad, near that Drontheim, where the chief Cathedral of the North has now stood for many centuries, dedicated gratefully to his memory as Saint Olaf. The mythus about Thor is to this effect. King Olaf, the Christian Reform King, is sailing with fit escort along the shore of Norway, from haven to haven; dispensing justice, or doing other royal work: on leaving a certain haven, it is found that a stranger, of grave eyes and aspect, red beard, of stately, robust figure, has stepped in. The courtiers address him; his answers surprise by their pertinence and depth: at length he is brought to the King. The stranger's conversation here is not less remarkable, as they sail along the beautiful shore; but after some time, he addresses King Olaf thus: "Yes, King Olaf, it is all beautiful, with the sun shining on it there; green, fruitful, a right fair home for you; and many a sore day had Thor, many a wild fight with the rock Jötuns, before he could make it so. And now you seem minded to put away Thor. King Olaf, have a care!" said the stranger, drawing down his brows; and when they looked again, he was nowhere to be found. This is the last appearance of Thor on the stage of this world!

Do we not see well enough how the Fable might arise, without unvaracity on the part of any one: it is the way most Gods have come to appear among men: thus if in Pindar's time "Neptune was seen once at the Nemean Games," what was this Neptune too but a "stranger of noble, ~~the~~ aspect"—fit to be "seen!" There is something pathetic, tragic for me, in this last voice of Paganism. Thor is vanished, the whole Norse world has vanished; and will not return ever again. In like fashion to that, pass away the highest things. All things that have been in this world, all things that are or will be in it, have to vanish: we have our sad farewell to give them.

That Norse Religion, a rude but earnest, sternly impressive Consecration of Valor (so we may define it,) sufficed for these old valiant Northmen. Consecration of Valor is not a bad thing! We will take it for good, so far as it goes. Neither is there no use in knowing something about this old Paganism of our Fathers. Unconsciously, and combines with higher things, it is in us yet, that old Faith withal! To know it consciously, brings us into closer and clearer relation with the Past—with our own possessions in the Past. For the whole Past, as I keep repeating, is the possession of the Present; the Past had always something true, and is a precious possession. In a different time, in a different place, it is always some other side of our common Human Nature that has been developing itself. The actual True is the sum of all these; not any one of them by itself constitutes what of Human Nature is hitherto developed. Better to know them all than mislead them. "To which of these Three Religions do you specially adhere?" inquires Meister of his Teacher. "To all the Three!" answers the other: "To all the three; for they by their union first constitute the True Religion."

Behold now, patient and reflecting reader—for in your eyes it is anxiously desired that this history (however imperfectly given,) may find favor—the dreadful—the desperate reverse in Mr. Aubrey's circumstances. He has suddenly fallen from a commanding position in society; from that of a high-born English gentleman, possessed of a fine unencumbered income, and all of luxury and splendor, and of opportunity for gratifying a disposition of noble munificence, that it can secure—and whose qualifications and prospects qualified him in aspiring to the highest senatorial distinction: behold him, I say, with his beloved and helpless family, sunk—lower than into straitened circumstances—beneath even poverty—into debt—and that of a hopeless description!—seeing that no one can be so secure, but that all this, or something of the like kind, may one day or other happen to him, 'tis hoped that it will be found neither uninteresting nor unimportant to watch carefully and closely the present condition and conduct of the Aubreys.

Bound hand and foot—so to speak—as Mr. Aubrey felt himself, and entirely at the mercy of Mr. Titmouse and his solicitors, Messrs Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, what could he but submit to almost any terms on which they chose to insist? It will be recollected that Mr. Gammon's proposal was, that Mr. Aubrey should forthwith discharge, without scrutiny, their bill of £3948, 14s. 6d.; give sufficient security for the payment of the sum of £10,000 to Mr. Titmouse, within twelve or eighteen months' time, and two promissory notes for the sum of £5,000 each, payable at some future period, as to which he had to rely solely on the sincerity and forbearance of Mr. Gammon, and the ratification of his acts by Mr. Titmouse. This proposal was duly communicated by the unfortunate Aubrey to Messrs. Runnington, who obtained a fortnight's time in which to deliberate upon it; at the end of which period, he was advised by them to accept the proposed terms as unquestionably fair, and, under circumstances, much more lenient than could have been expected. This might be so; but yet how dismaying and hopeless to him the idea of carrying it into effect! How, indeed, was it to be done? First of all, how were Messrs. Runnington's and Mr. Parkinson's bills to be got rid of—the former amounting to £1670, 12s., the latter to £756 1 And how were Mr. Aubrey and his family to live in the meanwhile, and how, moreover, were to be met the expenses of his legal education? As was intimated in a former part of this history, all that Mr. Aubrey had, on settling in London, was £3000 stock (equal to £2640 of money) and £423 in his banker's hands;—so that all his cash in hand was £3063; and if he were to devote the whole of it to the discharge of the three attorneys' bills which he owed, he would still leave a gross balance unpaid of £3310, 6s. 6d. And yet for him to talk of giving security for the payment of £10,000 within eighteen months, and his own notes of hand for £10,000 more! It was really almost maddening to sit down and contemplate all this. But he could not fold his arms in impotence and despair—he must look his difficulties straight in the face, and do the best that was in his power. He resolved to devote every farthing he had, except £200, to the liquidation of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's account, and (in smaller proportion) of those also of Messrs. Runnington and Mr. Parkinson; if necessary he resolved, though his heart thrilled with anguish at the thought, to sell his books, and the remnant of old family plate that he had preserved. Then he would strain every nerve to contribute toward the support of himself and of his family—poor oppressed soul!—by his literary exertions, in every moment that he could spare from his legal studies; and practise the severest economy that was consistent with health and the preservation of a respectable exterior. He resolved also, though with a shudder, to commit himself to Gammon and Titmouse's mercy, by handing to them (though a fearful farce it seemed) his two notes of hand for £10,000—payable on demand—for such Gammon intimated was usual in such a case, and would be required in the present one. But whether was he to look for security for payment of £10,000 within eighteen months' time? This was a matter that indeed staggered him, and almost prostrated his energies whenever he directed them to the subject; it occasioned him inexpressible agitation and anguish. Individuals there were, he believed—he knew—who would cheerfully enter into the desired security on his behalf; but what a mockery—cruel and insulting! For them to be asked to "secure his payment of the sum at the time mentioned, was, in effect, palpably asking them to pay the money for him, and in that light they could not but view such an application.

The reader will easily understand the potency of such considerations upon so sensitive and high-minded a person as Aubrey. While revolving these distracting and harassing topics in his mind, the name of Lord de la Zouch always presented itself to him. Had he not solemnly—repeatedly—pledged himself to communicate with that kind and wealthy and generous nobleman, in such an emergency as the present? His lordship's income was at least eighty or a hundred thousand pounds a year; his habits were simple and unostentatious, though he was of a truly munificent disposition; and he had not a large and expensive family—his only child being Mr. Delamere. He had ever professed, and, as far as he had hitherto had an opportunity, proved himself to be a devoted, a most affectionate friend to Mr. Aubrey—did not Providence, then, seem to point him out distinctly as one who should be applied to, to rescue from destruction a fallen friend? And why should Aubrey conjure up an array of imaginary obstacles, arising out of excessive and morbid fastidiousness? And whom were such scruples reducing to destitution along with him?—his wife, his children, his devoted and noble-minded sister! But, alas! the thought of sweet Kate suggested another source of exquisite pain and embarrassment to Aubrey, who well knew the ardent and inextinguishable passion for her entertained by young Delamere. 'Twas true that to pacify his father, and also not to grieve or harass Miss Aubrey by the constant attentions with which he would have otherwise followed her, he had consented to devote himself with great assiduity and ardor to his last year's studies at Oxford; yet was he by no means an infrequent visitor at Vivian Street, resolutely regardless of the earnest entreaties of Miss Aubrey, and even of her brother. Not that there was ever any thing indelicate or obtrusive in his attentions;—how could it be? Alas! Kate really loved him, and it required no very great acuteness in Delamere to discover it.

He was as fine, handsome a young fellow as you could see any where; frank, high-spirited, accomplished, with an exceedingly elegant deportment, and simple, winning manners—and could she but be touched with a lively sense of the noble disinterestedness of his attachment to her! I declare that Kate wrote him several letters in disavowal of his addresses, that wore such a genuine and determined air of repulsion as would have staggered most men; but young Delamere cared not one straw for any of them: let Kate vary her tone as she pleased, he simply told her that he had sent them to his mother, who said they were very good letters indeed; so he would make a point of reading all she would send him, and so forth. When Kate, with too solemn an emphasis to be mistaken or encountered with railery, assured him that nothing upon earth should prevail upon her to quit her present station in her brother's family, at all events until he had completely surmounted all his troubles, Delamere, with looks of fond admiration, would reply that it signified nothing, as he was prepared to wait her pleasure, and submit to any caprice or unkindness which her heart would let her exhibit. I must own that poor Kate was, on more than one occasion of his exhibiting traits of delicate generosity toward her brother, so moved and melted toward her lover, that she could—ah! I say it?—have sunk into his arms in silent and passionate acquiescence; for her heart had, indeed, long been really his. Now, I say, when Mr. Aubrey adverted for a moment to this state of things, was it not calculated a thousand-fold to enhance the difficulty of his applying to the father of Delamere? So indeed it was; and, torn with conflicting emotions and considerations of this kind, nearly the whole of the fortnight granted to him for deliberation had elapsed, before he could make up his mind to apply to Lord de la Zouch. At length, however, he determined to do so; and when he had dropped into the post-office his letter—one in every line of which the noble and generous person to whom it was addressed might easily detect the writhings of its writer's wounded spirit and broken heart—he looked indeed a melancholy object. The instant that, by dropping his letter into the box, he had irretrievably parted with all control over it, and to Lord de la Zouch it must go, Aubrey felt as if he would have given the world to recall it. Never had he heaved so many profound sighs, and felt so utterly miserable and destitute as during his walk homeward that afternoon. There they did not know the step he had intended to take, nor did he tell them that he had taken it. When he saw his sister he felt sick at heart; and during the whole of the evening was so oppressed and subdued, that the faint, anxious railery of Mrs. Aubrey and Kate, and the unconscious sportiveness of his children, served only to deepen the gloom that was around his spirit. He had requested Lord de la Zouch to address his answer to him at the Temple; and sure enough, by return of post, Mr. Aubrey found lying on his desk, on reaching the Temple in the morning, a letter addressed, "Charles Aubrey, Esq., at — Weasel's, Esq., No. 3, Pomegranate Court, Temple, London;" and franked, "DE LA ZOUCH."

"I shall return presently," said Mr. Aubrey to the clerk, with as much calmness as he could assume, having put the letter into his pocket, resolving to go into the Temple gardens and there read it, where any emotion which it might excite would be unobserved. Having at length seated himself on a bench, under one of the old trees near the river, with a somewhat tremulous hand he took out and opened the letter, and read as follows:

"FOTHERINGHAM CASTLE, July 18, 18—.

"MY VERY DEAR AUBREY: If you really value my friendship, never pain my feelings again by expressions of distrust as to the issue of any application of yours to me, such as are contained in your letter now lying before me. Has any thing that has ever hitherto passed between us justified them? For Heaven's sake tell your attorneys not to lose a moment in procuring the necessary instruments, and forwarding them to me through Messrs. Framlingham, my lawyers; I will then execute them immediately, and return them to you by the next post or mail. If you will but at once set about this in a business-like way, I will forgive and forget all the absurd and unkind scruples with which your letter abounds. Since you would probably make a mighty stir about it, I shall not at present dwell upon the inexpressible pleasure it would give me to be allowed to exonerate you at once from the vulgar and grasping wretches who are now harassing you, my very dear Aubrey, and to constitute myself your creditor instead of them. But, on further consideration, I suppose you would distress yourself on the ground of my restricted means rendering it so much more difficult for me than for them to give you time for the payment of your debt!! Or will you play the man, and act at once in the way in which, I assure you, upon my honor, I would act by you, on a similar solicitation, were our situations reversed? By the way, I intend to insist on being your sole surety; unless, indeed, your creditors doubt my solvency, in which case I hope we shall be able, amongst our common friends, to find a sufficient co surety.

"And now, dear Aubrey, how get you on with law? Does she smile or scowl upon you? I wonder why you did not go to the fountain-head, and become at once a pupil to your friend, the Attorney-General. Who is the gentleman whom you are reading with? He certainly has rather a curious name! Well, my dear Aubrey, Heaven in its own good time crown your virtuous efforts—your unconquerable resolution—with success! Won't it be odd if, when I am dead and gone, and my son is occupying my present place on the benches, you should be sitting on the wool-sack? More unlikely things than this have come to pass: look at —! How are dear Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey, and your little ones? Though we are going in a fortnight's time to fill this old place, (the —s, the —s, and the —s, and others, are coming,) we shall be till then quite deserted, and so after they are gone. Would that we could insist on all of you taking up your abode with us! Have you seen Geoffrey lately? He tells me that he is working very hard indeed at Oxford; and so says his tutor. It is more than ever I did. Pray write by return. I am ever, my dear Aubrey, yours, faithfully and affectionately,

DE LA ZOUCH.

"CHARLES AUBREY, Esq.

"P. S. On further consideration, let your people send the deeds, &c., at once on to me, direct from themselves; 'tis a private matter, which is of no consequence to any one but ourselves. No one, indeed, except ourselves, your own solicitors, and your opponents, need know any thing about it. Neither Lady de la Zouch nor my son will have the least inkling of the matter."

No language of mine can do justice to the feelings with which Mr. Aubrey, after many pauses, occasioned by irrepressible emotion, perused the foregoing letter. Its generosity was infinitely enhanced by its delicacy; and both were most exquisitely appreciated by a man of his susceptibility, and in his circumstances. His eyes—his heart overflowed with unutterable gratitude to the Almighty, and the noble instrument of his mercy. He would have flown on the wings of the wind to the dear beings in Vivian Street, with joyous face and light, elastic step to make them participators in his joy. He rose and walked to and fro by the river side with most exhilarated spirits. The sky was cloudless; the sun shone brilliantly; and innumerable briar and busy craft were moving to and fro upon the swelling bosom of the magnificent Thames. Gladness was in his soul. The light without was typical of that within. Several times he was on the point of starting off to Vivian street; but, on consideration, he resolved to go to Messrs. Runnington, and set them into instant communication with Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap; and matters having been set in train for the speediest possible settlement, Mr. Aubrey returned to chambers, but quitted them an hour earlier than usual, to brighten the countenances of those he loved by the joyous intelligence he bore. But he found that they also had cheering news to communicate; so that this was indeed a memorable day to them.

Lady Stratton, an early and bosom friend of the late Mrs. Aubrey, had, it may easily be believed, never ceased to take a lively interest in the fortunes of the unhappy Aubreys. She was now far advanced in years; and though she enjoyed an ample income, derived from the liberality of her husband, Sir Beryl Stratton, Baronet, who had died some twenty or thirty years before; yet, having no children, and seeing no necessity for saving money, she had followed the noble example of her deceased friend Mrs. Aubrey, and bestowed annually all her surplus income in the most liberal and systematic charity. Many years before, however, she had resolved upon making a provision for Miss Aubrey, whom she loved as if she had been her mother; and the expedient she had resorted to (quite unknown to the Aubreys,) was to insure her life for the sum of £15,000, the whole of which sum she had intended to bequeath to Miss Aubrey. The premiums on so large an insurance at this were heavy annual drains upon her purse; and, together with her long-continued charities, and the expenditure necessary to support her station, left her but stunted means for contributing to the relief of the ruined Aubreys. With some difficulty, however, the old lady, in one way or another, principally by effecting a loan from the insurance company upon her policy, had contrived to raise a sum of £2000; and Miss Aubrey had that morning received a letter from her, full of tenderness, begging her to present the sum in question (for which Lady Stratton had lodged a credit with her bankers in London,) to her brother, Mr. Aubrey, to dispose of as he pleased—trusting that it might be effectual in relieving him from the difficulties which were more immediately pressing upon him. Never had they spent so happy an evening together since they had quitted Yatton. In the excitement of the hour, even Aubrey felt for a while as if they now saw their way through all their embarrassments and dangers. Can the reader imagine what must have been the feelings of Miss Aubrey when she first heard of, and afterward reflected upon, the princely munificence of Lord de la Zouch? If he can, it is well—it is more than I am equal to describing. They kept her awake more than half the night; and when she appeared at breakfast, her brother's quick eye detected in her countenance the traces of a severe conflict of feelings. With him also much of the excitement occasioned by the two occurrences above mentioned, had disappeared by the time that he took his seat in his little study at his usual early hour. First of all, he felt very uneasy in receiving so large a sum from Lady Stratton, whom he knew not to be rich—at all events, not rich enough to part with so considerable a sum without inconvenience; and he resolved not to accept of her proffered kindness, unless she would allow him to transmit to her his bond for the amount, together with interest. Surely this was an unnecessary step; yet where is the man who, on all occasions, acts precisely as a calm and reflecting observer of his conduct, long afterward, could have wished him to act? One must make allowance for the feelings which prompted him—those of a highly honorable and independent and over-sensitive man, who felt himself oppressed already by the weight of pecuniary obligation which he had incurred, and sought for the semblance of relief to his feelings by receiving that as a loan only which had been nobly proffered as a gift; and thus, as it were, in point of fact destroying all the grace and courtesy of the benefaction; but it is useless discussing the matter. I regret that Mr. Aubrey should have allowed himself to be influenced by such considerations: but so it was—and poor old Lady Stratton was informed by him in a letter certainly abounding in expressions of heartfelt gratitude and affection, that he had availed himself of her generous assistance, but only on the terms of his being allowed to deposit his bond for the repayment of it, with interest, with her solicitors; earnestly trusting that, ere long, he should be enabled to fulfil his engagements to all who had assisted him.

This seasonable assistance enabled him to make the following arrangement for liquidating the sums due on account of the tremendous attorneys' bills:

Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's bill was,	£3946	14	6
Messrs. Runningtons',	1870	12	0
	£6373	6	6

These were his liabilities. Then his assets were:
Money in the funds,	£2640
Money at his banker's,	423
Advanced by Lady Stratton,	2000
	£5063

As soon as he had made the foregoing statement on a slip of paper early in the morning in his study, he averted his eye from it for a moment with a sort of cold shudder. Were he to devote every farthing of assets that he had, he still could not come within £1310 odd of his mere attorneys' bills. What was he to do? The result of a long and anxious morning's calculation and scheming was to appropriate £4000 of his assets thus—(if he could prevail upon his creditors to be for the present content with it:)

To Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap,	£2500
Messrs. Runningtons,	1000
Mr. Parkinson,	500
	£4000

If this arrangement could be effected, then he would be able to reserve in his own hands £1063, and retain liabilities as under:

Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's (balance,)	£1446	14	6
Messrs. Runningtons' (ditto,)	670	12	0
Mr. Parkinson's (ditto,)	256	0	0

Heavy was his heart at beholding this result of even the most favorable mode of putting his case: but he placed the memoranda in his pocket-book, and repaired to his dressing-room: and having completed his toilet, appeared at breakfast with as cheerful a countenance as he could assume. Each of the three assembled, perceived, however, that the others were striving to appear gay and happy. Suffice it to say, that within a week's time, Messrs. Runningtons received the necessary security from Lord de la Zouch, who had thereby bound himself in the penal sum of £30,000 that Mr. Aubrey should, on or before the 24th day of January 18—, (that is, in eighteen months' time from the date of the bond,) pay the principal sum of £10,000, with interest at 5 per cent; and this instrument, together with Mr. Aubrey's two promissory-notes for £5000 each, and also cash to the amount of £2500 in part payment of their bill, having been delivered to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap—who, after a great deal of reluctance on the part of Mr. Quirk, finally consented to allow the balance of £1446, 14s. 6d. to stand over—they delivered to him, first a receipt for so much on account of their own bill; and secondly, an instrument by which Titlebat Titmouse, for the considerations therein expressed, did remise, release, and for ever quit claim, unto Charles Aubrey, his heirs, executors, and administrators, all other demands whatever, [i. e. other than the said sum of £20,000.] By this arrangement, Mr. Aubrey was absolutely exonerated from the sum of £40,000, in which he stood indubitably indebted to Mr. Titmouse, and so far he had just cause for congratulation. But was not his situation still one calculated to depress and alarm him more and more every time that he contemplated it? Where was he to find the sum requisite to release Lord de la Zouch from any part of his dreadful liability? For with such a surety in their power as that great and opulent peer, was it likely that Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap would be otherwise than peremptory and inflexible when the day of payment arrived? And if so, with what feelings must Mr. Aubrey see his noble and generous friend called upon to pay down nearly £11,000 for him? And were they not likely to insist speedily on the discharge of their own serious balance of £1446 odds? How likely that persons such as they and their client were represented to be, would, as soon as they decently could, proceed to extremities with him, in the confidence that the sight and the sound of his agonies would call in powerful and affluent friends to his assistance?

Still pressed, as indeed he was, his spirit had by no means lost its elasticity, supported as he was by a powerful, an unconquerable will—and also by a devout reliance upon the protection of Providence. Though law is indeed an exhausting and absorbing study, and it was pursued by Mr. Aubrey with unflagging energy, yet he found time (those who choose may find time enough for every thing,) to contribute sensibly to the support of himself and his family by literary labors, expended principally upon compositions of an historical and political character, and which were forwarded from time to time to the distinguished Review which has been already mentioned.

To produce, as he produced, articles of this description—of considerable length and frequency—requiring ready, extensive, and accurate knowledge, and careful composition; original and vigorous in their conception and their execution, and by their intrinsic merit arresting, immediately on their appearance, the attention of the public; I say, to do all this, and only in those precious intervals which ought to have been given to the relaxation of his strained faculties and physical powers—and under the pressure too of such overpowering anxieties as were his—argued surely the possession of first-rate energies—of a perfectly indomitable resolution. All this while, moreover, he contrived to preserve an unruffled temper—which, with a man of such sensibilities as his, afforded indeed a signal instance of self-control; and, in short, on all these grounds, Mr. Aubrey appears entitled to the sympathy and respect of all reflecting persons. I spoke of his anxieties. Suppose, thought he, health should fail him, what was to become of him, and of those absolutely dependent upon him? Suppose illness should invade the dear members of his family, what was in prospect but destitution—or surrendering them up—bitter and heart-breaking contingency!—to the precarious charity of others? What would avail all his exhausting labors in the acquisition of professional knowledge, while his liberty was entirely at the command of Mr. Titmouse, and Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, who might, at any moment, actuated by mercenary motives or impelled by caprice, blight all his prospects, and incarcerate him in a prison! Yet, under this burden—to adopt the language of Sir Henry Spelman on an analogous occasion, "non, ingentem solum, sed perpetuis humeris sustinendum"—Mr. Aubrey stood firmly. He felt that he was called upon to endure it; a blessed spirit ever, as it were, beside him, whispering the consolatory assurance, that all this was ordered and designed by the Supreme Disposer of events, as a trial of constancy and of his faith, and that the issue was with him. It is mercifully ordained, that "hope springs eternal in the human breast," and that, too, in every turn and variety of mortal misery. It was so with Aubrey. So long as he felt his health unimpaired, and his mental energies in full vigor, he looked on these blessings as a sort of guarantee from Heaven that he should be able to carry on a successful, though it might be a long and wearisome struggle with adverse circumstances. Still it cost him a very painful effort to assume and preserve that exterior of tranquillity which should calm and assure the beloved beings associated with him in the hour of peril and suffering; and oftener than they chose to let him know of it, did the keen eyes of a wife's and sister's love detect the gloom and oppression which darkened his countenance and saddened his manner. There was, after all, with all that I have said, a happy little home. He was almost always punctual to his dinner-hour, to a minute, knowing how a thousand fears on his account would otherwise assail the fond beings who were counting the minutes till his arrival. When they had once thus met, they never separated till bed-time. Sometimes Miss Aubrey would sit down to her piano, and accompany herself in some song or air, which equally, whether merry or mournful, revived innumerable touching and tender recollections of former days, and often ceased, tremulously and in tears, in which she was not unfrequently joined by both of those who had been listening to her. Then he would betake himself to his labors for the rest of the evening, (not quitting the room,) either assisting him—fair and eager amanuenses! or themselves reading, or engaged at needle-work. Oh! it was ecstasy, too, to that poor oppressed father to enter into the wild sports and gambols of his light-hearted little ones, Charles and Agnes, who always made their appearance for about a couple of hours after dinner, to tell them "stories," to listen to theirs, to show them pictures, to hear Charles read, and to join heartily in their frolics, rolling about even on the floor with them. But when he paused for a moment, and his wife and Kate succeeded him as their playmates, for a short interval, when his eye followed their movements, what sudden and sharp pangs would pass through his heart, as he thought of the future and what was to become of them!—And when their maid arrived at the appointed hour, causing all fun instantly to cease, and longing looks to be directed to papa and mamma, saying as plainly as could be said, "only a few minutes more," how fondly would he fold them in his arms! and when he felt their little arms clasping his neck and caressing him, and their kisses "all over" his face, feelings were excited within him, which were too deep for utterance—which defy description. "Tis said, I believe, of Robespierre, or some other tyrant, as an instance of his fearful refinement in cruelty, that a person of distinction who had become obnoxious to him he formally condemned to death, but allowed to remain in the torturing, the excruciating presence of his lovely family; he and they aware, all the while, that his doom was irrevocable, inevitable; and he momentarily liable to the summons to the guillotine, and which in fact came at length, when they were all seated together one day, at the breakfast table! Oh, the feelings with which that unfortunate person must have daily regarded the countenances of those around him! How applicable to his condition the heart-breaking strains of Medea—

Φῆ, φῆ, τί προσδίδωμι δὲ μοι ἑμᾶσιν, τέκνα;
Τί προσγὰρ ἐτι νῦν παύσασθαι γέλωιν;
Αἰ, αἰ, τί ὀρέσσω; Καρδία γὰρ οἴχεται,
Γυνάϊκες, ἔμψα φαιδρὸν ὡς εἶδον τέκνων.*

The above passage was one that very frequently, on the occasion I have alluded to, occurred to the mind of Mr. Aubrey; for he felt himself indeed every moment at the mercy of those to whom he owed such tremendous sums of money, and for which he was liable to be, at any moment that might be selected by malice or rapacity, plucked from his little home, and cast into prison!

Oh, happy ye, now reading these pages, penned by one who has seen much trouble in his time,—oh, happy ye, "unto whom the lines are fallen in pleasant places, ye, who have a goodly heritage;" who live, as it were, in a "land flowing with milk and honey;" with whom life glides away like a tranquil and pleasant dream; who are not sternly bidden "to eat your bread with quaking, and drink your water with trembling and with carefulness," nor "in vain to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrow;" who have, indeed, "no thought for the morrow;"—oh, ye who have leisure and ample means to pursue the objects of an honorable ambition, undisturbed by daily fears for daily bread—by terror, lest implacable creditors should at length frustrate all your efforts, drive you from your position in society, and precipitate you and yours into ruin;—I say, oh ye! do I appeal to you in vain? Do you turn from this painful portion of my narrative with indifference, or contempt, or wearisomeness? If the mere description, brief though it may be, of the sufferings of the Aubreys be trying and disagreeable to you, what must have been to them the actual endurance? Poor Aubrey! as he walked along the crowded thoroughfares, morning and evening, between the Temple and Vivian Street, what a disheartening consciousness he felt of his personal insignificance! Which of the passengers, patrician or plebeian, that met or passed him, cared one straw for him, or would have cared a straw for him, had they even known the load of misery and misfortune under which he staggered past them. Every time that he thus passed between the scene of his absorbing labors at the Temple, and that green spot—his house in Vivian Street—in the world's wide desert, where only his heart was refreshed by the never-failing spring of domestic love and tenderness, he felt, as it were, but a prisoner out upon parole! It is easy to understand that when a man walks alone the streets of London, depressed in spirit, and alarmed by the consciousness of increasing pecuniary embarrassment, his temper is likely to become irritable, his deportment forbidding, his spirit stern and soured, particularly against those who appeal to his charity, which then, indeed, he feels bitterly—to begin at home. It was not so, however, with Aubrey, whose constant feeling was—Haud ignarus mali, miseri succurrere disco; and though it may appear a small thing to mention, I feel gratification in recording of him, that, desperate as were his circumstances, infinitely enhanced to him as was the value of money, he went seldom unprovided with the means of relieving the humble applicants for charity whom he passed in the streets—of dropping some small token of his love and pity into the trembling and feeble hand of want—of those whose necessities he felt to be greater even than his own. Never, indeed, did the timid eye of the most tattered, starved, and emaciated object that is suffered to crawl along the streets catch that of Mr. Aubrey, without making his heart acknowledge the secret bond of misery which bound them together—that he beheld a brother in bondage, and on whom he cheerfully bestowed the humble pittance which he believed that Providence had yet left at his disposal. Prosperity and adversity have equally the effect upon an inferior mind and heart, of generating selfishness. The one encourages, the other forces it. Misery is apt to think its own sufferings greater than those of any one else—and naturally. The eye, as it were, is filled with the object; distress and danger—that is nearest—that is in such fearful contiguity, obscuring from view all remoter objects, at once scaring away presence of mind, and centering its hopes and fears upon self. Not so, however, is it when a noble nature is the sufferer—and more especially when that nature is strengthened and brightened by the support and consolation derived from philosophy—and, above all, religion. To many a strong spirit, destitute of such assistance, alas! how often under similar circumstances, have come—ghastly visitants!—Despair and Madness, with their hideous attendant Suicide, to do their bidding! But a Christian will pass through the most fearful storms, with an unexpected calmness and sense of security. What would have become of the three youths cast into the burning fiery furnace, but for the presence of that fourth awful Being, the sight of whom confounded and affrighted Nebuchadnezzar, but, accompanied by whom, his intended victims walked unhurt and undismayed amidst the furnace heated one seven times more than it was wont to be heated? Though a spectacle so terrible and sublime is not now vouchsafed to mankind, the memorial of it is designed to have the like effect. The endearing and inspiring lessons of Christianity may be learned by all who will. One who has this faith, hears, amidst perplexity and danger, a voice before him, bidding him to run with patience the race that is set before him, and he knows that in due time he will reach the goal. Animated by thoughts such as these, he needs not have resort to such secondary sources of consolation, as the comparison of his own with the greater sufferings of others; it is enough for him that his Master wills him to endure—and unto the end—and, while thinking thus, he feels fresh vigor infused into his fainting frame.

To Mr. Aubrey the Sabbath was indeed not only a day for performing the public services of religion, but also a day of real rest from the labors of life. It was not one to him of puritanical gloom or excitement, but of sincere, cheerful, fervent, enlightened devotion. It would have been to the reader, I think, not an uninteresting sight to behold this unfortunate and harassed family at church. They took almost the only pew that was vacant in the gallery—in a church not far distant from Vivian Street—a pew just holding themselves and little Charles, who, since their arrival in town, had begun to accompany them to the morning service. There was something in their appearance—punctual as they were to morning and evening service—that could hardly fail to interest any one who observed them. Two very elegant and lovely women, dressed in simple half-mourning,—he of calm, gentlemanly manners, an intellectual countenance, but overshadowed with deep seriousness, if not melancholy—as, indeed, was the case with the whole of the little group, except the beautiful child, Charles. If their mere appearance was thus calculated to interest those around, who beheld them so punctual in their attendance, how much would that interest have been increased had the beholder possessed an inkling of their singular and melancholy history! Here were individuals, whose condition was testing the reality of the consolations of religion, exhibiting humility, resignation, faith, a deep delight in attending the house of Him who had permitted such dreadful disasters to befall them, and whose will it yet seemed to be that they should pass through deeper sufferings than they had yet experienced. His temple seemed, indeed, to them a refuge and shelter from the storm. To Mr. Aubrey every portion of the church service was precious, for its purity, its simplicity, its solemnity, its fervor, its truly scriptural character, its adoption to every imaginable condition of feeling and of circumstance, indeed "to all sorts and conditions of men." There was a little circumstance, fraught with much interest, which occurred to them shortly after they had commenced their attendance at the church. An occasional sermon was preached one evening by a stranger, from the words, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," on behalf of a neighboring dispensary. Mr. Aubrey was soon struck by the unusual strength and beauty of the ser-men in point of composition. Its language was at once chaste, pointed, and forcible; its illustration apt and vivid; its pathos genuine. As he went on, Mr. Aubrey became more and more convinced that he had seen or heard the preacher before; and on inquiring afterward his name, his impressions proved to be correct—the preacher had been at Oxford, at the very same college with him, and this was the first time that they had since come within sight of each other. Mr. Aubrey at once introduced himself, and was recognised, and they renewed their early friendship. Mr. Neville, poor soul, had nothing upon earth to support himself with but an afternoon lectureship in one of the city churches, from which he derived about £.75 a-year; and on this sum alone he had contrived, for the last six or eight years, to support both himself and his wife,—a very amiable and fond woman. Fortunately they had no children; but they had seen much affliction, each of them being in but middling health, and a great part of his little income was, consequently, devoted to doctors' bills. He was an admirable scholar; a man of very powerful understanding, and deeply read in metaphysics and divinity. Yet this was all he could procure for his support; and very pinching work for them, poor souls, it was to "make ends meet." They lived in very small but creditable lodgings; and amid all their privations, and with all the gloom of the future before them, they were as cheerful a little couple as the world ever saw. They dearly loved, and would have sacrificed every thing for each other; and so long as they could but keep their chins above water, they cared not for their exclusion from most of the comforts of life. They were, both of them, entirely resigned to the will of Heaven as to their position—nay, in all things. She generally accompanied him whithersoever he went; but on the present occasion the little creature was lying at home in bed, enduring great suffering: and the thought of it made the preacher's heart very heavy, and his voice to falter a little, several times, during his sermon. He was perfectly delighted when Mr. Aubrey introduced himself; and when the latter had heard all his friend's little history—for he had indeed a child-like simplicity and frankness, and told Mr. Aubrey every thing he knew about himself—he wrung his hand with great emotion—almost too great for expression. It seemed that a bishop, before whom poor Neville had accidentally preached seven years before, had sent for him, and expressed such a very high opinion of his sermon, as led him reasonably to look for some little preferment at his lordship's hands, but in vain. Poor Neville had no powerful friends, and the bishop was overwhelmed with applicants for every thing he had to give away; so it is not much to be wondered at that in time he totally lost sight of Mr. Neville, and of the hopes which had blossomed but to be blighted. What touched Mr. Aubrey to the soul, was the unfeigned cheerfulness with which poor Mr. Neville—now in his fortieth year—reconciled himself to his unpromising circumstances, the calmness with which he witnessed the door of preferment evidently shut upon him for ever. Mr. Aubrey obtained from him his address; and resolved that, though for reasons long ago mentioned he had withdrawn from almost every one of his former friends and associates, yet with this poor, this neglected but happy clergyman, he would endeavor to renew and cement firmly their early-formed but long-suspended friendship. And when on his return to Vivian Street, (whither Mrs. and Miss Aubrey had proceeded alone, at his request, while he walked on with Mr. Neville,) he told them the little history which I have above indicated to the reader, how the hearts of all of them went toward one who was in many respects a fellow-sufferer with themselves, and, practising what he preached, was really a pattern of resignation to the will of God; of humble but hearty faith in His mercy and loving-kindness!

Mr. Aubrey was not long in paying his promised visit to Mr. Neville, accompanied by Mrs. Aubrey. "T was a long and not very agreeable walk for them, toward St. George's in the East; and on reaching a small row of neat houses, only one story high, and being shown into Mr. Neville's very little sitting-room, they found Mrs. Neville lying on a sofa near the fire, looking very ill, and Mr. Neville sitting before her, with a number of books on the table, and pen, ink, and paper, with which he was occupied preparing his next Sunday's sermon; but there was also a slip of paper on the table of a different description, and which had occasioned both of them great distress; viz. a rather peremptory note from their medical man, touching the payment of his "trifling account" of £14 odds. Where poor Neville was to obtain such a sum, neither he nor his wife knew: they had already deprived themselves of necessary food and clothing, to enable them to discharge another account, and this new demand of an old claim had indeed grievously disquieted them. They said nothing about it to Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey, who soon made themselves at home, and by their unaffected simplicity and cordiality of manner, relieved their humble hosts from all anxiety. They partook of tea, in a sufficiently homely and frugal style; and before they rose to go they exacted a promise, that, as soon as Mrs. Neville should have recovered, they would both come and spend a long day in Vivian street. They soon became very intimate; and Mrs. Neville's health at length being such as to preclude her from attending at all to her needle, the reader will probably think none the less of Miss Aubrey and Mrs. Aubrey, when he hears that they insisted on taking that task upon themselves; (a matter in which they were becoming somewhat expert;) and many and many an hour did these two charming women spend, both in Vivian street and at Mrs. Neville's, in relieving her from her labors—particularly in preparing their winter clothing. And now that I am on this point, I may as well mention another not less amiable trait in Kate; that, bearing of a girl's school about to be founded in connexion with the church which they attended, and in support of which several ladies had undertaken to prepare various little matters, such as embroidery, lace, pictures, and articles of fancy and ornament, Kate also set to work with her pencil and brushes. She was a very tasteful draughtswoman, and produced four or five such delicate and beautiful sketches, in water color, of scenes in and about Yatton, as made her a very distinguished contributor to the undertaking; each of her sketches producing upwards of two guineas. She also drew a remarkably spirited crayon sketch of the pretty little head of Charles—who accompanied her to the place where her contributions were deposited, and delivered it in with his own hand. Thus were this sweet and amiable family rapidly reconciling themselves to their altered circumstances—taking real pleasure in the new scenes which surrounded them, and the novel duties devolving upon them; and as their feelings became calmer, they felt how true it is that happiness in this world depends not upon mere external circumstances, but upon THE MIND—which, contented and well regulated, can turn every thing around it into a source of enjoyment and thankfulness—making indeed the wilderness to bloom and blossom as the rose.

They kept up—especially Kate—a constant correspondence with good old Doctor Tatham; who, judging from the frequency and the length of his letters, which were written with a truly old-fashioned distinctness and uniformity of character, must have found infinite pleasure in his task. So also was it with Kate, who if she had even been writing to her lover—nay, between ourselves, what would Delamere have given to have had addressed to himself one of the long letters, crossed down to the very postscript, full of sparkling delicacy, good nature, and good sense, which so often found their way to the "Rev. Dr. Tatham, Yatton Vicarage, Yorkshire?" They were thus apprised of every thing of moment that transpired at Yatton, to which their feelings clung with unalienable affection. Dr. Tatham's letters had indeed almost always a painful degree of interest attached to them. From his frequent mention of Mr. Gammon's name—and almost equally favorable as frequent—it appeared that he possessed a vast ascendancy over Mr. Titmouse, and was, whenever he was at Yatton, in a manner its moving spirit. The Doctor represented Titmouse as a truly wretched creature, with no more sense of religion than a monkey; equally silly, selfish, and vulgar—unfeeling and tyrannical wherever he had an opportunity of exhibiting his real character.

It exquisitely pained them, moreover, to find pretty distinct indications of a sterner and stricter rule being apparent at Yatton, than had ever been known there before, so far as the tenants and villagers were concerned. Rents were now required to be paid with the utmost punctuality; many of them were raised, and harsher terms introduced into their leases and agreements. In Mr. Aubrey's time a distress or an action for rent was literally a thing unheard of in any part of the estate; but nearly a dozen had occurred since the accession of Mr. Titmouse. If this was at the instance of the ruling spirit, Mr. Gammon, he certainly got none of the odium of the proceeding, every letter announcing a resort to those extreme proceedings being expressly authorized by Mr. Titmouse personally; Mr. Gammon, on most of such occasions, putting in a faint word or two in favor of the tenant, but ineffectually. The legal proceedings were always conducted in the name of "Blood-suck and Son," whose town agents were, "Quirk, Gammon, and Snap;" but their names never came under the eye of the defendants! No longer could the poor villagers, and poorer tenants, reckon on their former assistance from the hall in the hour of sickness and distress: cowlip wine, currant wine, elderberry wine, if made, were consumed in the hall. In short, there was a discontinuance of all those innumerable little endearing courtesies, and charities, and hospitalities, which render a good old country mansion the very heart of the neighborhood. The doctor, in one of his letters, intimated, with a sort of agony, that he had heard it mentioned by the people at the hall, as probable that Mr. Titmouse—the little Goth—would pull down that noble old relic, the east turreted gateway; but that Mr. Gammon was vehemently opposed to such a measure; and that if it were preserved after all, it would be entirely owing to the taste and the influence of that gentleman. Had Dr. Tatham chosen, he could have added a fact that would indeed have saddened his friends—viz., that the old sycamore, which had been preserved at the fond entreaties of Kate, and which was hallowed by so many sad and tender associations, had been long ago removed as a sort of eyesore; Mr. Gammon had, in fact, directed it to be done; but he repeatedly expressed to Dr. Tatham, confidentially, his regret at such an act on the part of Titmouse. He could also have told them that there had been a dog-fight in the village, at which Mr. Titmouse was present! Persons were beginning to make their appearance in the village, of a very different description from any that had been seen there in the time of the Aubreys—persons, now and then, of loose, and wild, and reckless characters. Mr. Titmouse would often get up a fight in the village, and reward the victor with five or ten shillings! Then the snug and quiet little "Aubrey Arms" was metamorphosed into the "Titmouse Arms;" and another set up in opposition to it, and called "The Toper's Arms;" and it was really painful to see the increasing trade driven by each of them. They were both full every night, and often during the day also; and the vigilant, and affectionate, and grieved eye of the good vicar noticed several seats in the church, which had formerly been occupied every Sunday morning and afternoon, to be empty! In his letters, he considerably sunk the grosser features of Titmouse's conduct, which would have only uselessly grieved and disgusted his beloved correspondents. He informed them, however, from time to time, of the different visitors at the hall, particularly of the arrival and movements of their magnificent kinsfolk, the Earl of Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia, the Marquis Ganta Jaunes de Millefleurs and Mr. Tuft—the novel state and ceremony which had been suddenly introduced there—at which they all ceased reading for a moment, and laughed, well knowing the character of Lord Dreddlington. At length, some considerable time after Mr. Titmouse's grand visitors had been at the hall, there came a letter from Dr. Tatham, sent by a private hand, and not reaching Vivian Street till the evening, when they were sitting together, after dinner, as usual, and which contained intelligence that was received in sudden silence, and with looks of astonishment, viz. that Mr. Titmouse had become the acknowledged suitor of the Lady Cecilia!! Mr. Aubrey, after a moment's pause, laughed more heartily than they had heard him laugh for many months—getting up, at the same time, and walking once or twice across the room—Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey gazed at each other for a few moments, without speaking a word; and you could not have told whether their fair countenances showed more of amusement or of disgust at the intelligence. "Well! it is as I have often told you, Kate," commenced Mr. Aubrey, after a while, resuming his seat, and addressing his sister with an air of good-humored raillery; "You've lost your chance—you've held your head so high. Ah, 'tis all over now—and our fair cousin is mistress of Yatton!"

"Indeed, Charles," quoth Kate, earnestly, "I do think it's too painful a subject for a joke."

"Why, Kate!—You must bear it as well!"

"Pho, pho—nonsense, Charles! To be serious—did you ever hear anything so shocking as pe?"

"Do you mean to tell me, Kate," commenced her brother, assuming suddenly such a serious air as for a moment imposed on his sister, "that to become mistress of dear old Yatton—which was offered to you, you know—you would not have consented, when it came to the point, to become—Mrs. Titmouse?" For an instant, Kate looked as if she would have made, in the eye of the statuary, an exquisite model of beautiful disdain—provoked by the bare idea, even, and put forward, as she knew, in raillery only. "You know, Charles," said she at length, calmly, her features relaxing into a smile, "that if such a wretch had ten thousand Yattons, I would, rather than marry him—oh!"—she shuddered—"spring from Dover cliff into the sea!"

"Ah, Kate, Kate!" exclaimed her brother, with a look of infinite pride and fondness. "Even supposing for a moment that you had no prev!"

"Come, Charles, no more nonsense," said Kate, patting his cheek, and slightly coloring.

"I say, that even if!"

"Only fancy," interrupted Kate, "Lady Cecilia—Titmouse! I see her before me now. Well, I protest it is positively insufferable; I could not have thought that there was a woman in the whole world—why?"—she paused, and added laughingly, "how I should like to see their correspondence!"

"What!" said Mrs. Aubrey, with a sly smile, first at her husband, and then at Kate, "as a model for a certain other correspondence that I can imagine—eh, Kate?"

"Nonsense, nonsense, Agnes!"—what a provoking humor you are both in this evening," interrupted Kate, with a slight petteishness; "what we've heard makes me melancholy enough, I assure you!"

"I suppose that about the same time that Lady Cecilia Titmouse goes to court," said her brother, "so will the Honorable Mrs. Dela."

"If you choose to tease me, Charles, of course I cannot help it," quoth Kate, coloring still more; but it required no very great acuteness to detect that the topic was not excessively offensive.

"Mrs. De!"

"Have done, Charles!" said she, rising; and putting her arm round his neck, she pressed her fair hand on his mouth; but he pushed it aside laughingly.

"Mrs. De—Dela—Delamere," he continued.

"I will finish it for you, Charles," said Mrs. Aubrey, "the Honorable Mr. and Mrs. Delamere."

"What! do you turn against me too?" inquired Kate, laughing very good-humoredly.

"I wonder what her stately ladyship's feelings were," said Aubrey, after a pause, "the first time that her elegant and accomplished lover saluted her!"

"Eugh!" exclaimed both Kate and Mrs. Aubrey, in a breath, and with a simultaneous shudder of disgust.

"I dare say, poor old Lord Dreddlington's notion is, that this will be a fine opportunity for bringing about his favorite scheme of re-uniting the families—Heaven save the mark!" said Mr. Aubrey, just as the twopenny postman's knock at the door was heard; and within a few moments' time the servant brought up stairs a letter addressed to Mr. Aubrey. The very first glance at its contents expelled the smile from his countenance, and the color from his cheek: he turned, in fact, so pale, that Mrs. Aubrey and Kate also changed color—and came and stood with beating hearts, and suddenly suspended breath, one on each side of him, looking over the letter while he was reading it. As I intend presently to lay a copy of it before the reader, I shall first state a few circumstances, which will make it appear that this letter may be compared to a shell thrown into a peaceful little citadel, by a skillful, though distant and unseen engineer—in short, I mean Mr. Gammon.

This astute and determined person had long been bent upon securing one object—namely, access to Mr. Aubrey's family circle, for reasons which have been already communicated to the reader. That Mr. Aubrey was, at all events, by no means anxious for such a favor, had been long before abundantly manifest to Gammon, and yet not in a way to give him any legitimate or excusable grounds of offence. The Aubreys had, he acknowledged, and especially in their present circumstances, an unquestionable right to receive or reject, as they thought fit, any overtures to acquaintance. Nothing, he felt, could be more unexceptionably courteous than Mr. Aubrey's demeanor; yet had it been such as to satisfy him, that, unless he resorted to some means of unusual efficacy, he never could get upon visiting terms with the Aubreys. The impression which Miss Aubrey had originally produced in his mind, remained as distinct and vivid as ever. Her beauty, her grace, her elevated character, (of which he had heard much on all hands,) her accomplishments, her high birth—all were exquisitely appreciated by him, and conspired to constitute a prize, for the gaining of which he deemed no exertion too great, no enterprise too hazardous. He had, moreover, other most important objects in view, to which a union with Miss Aubrey was in fact essential. She was, again, the only person, the sight of whom had in any measure given vitality to his marble heart, exciting totally new thoughts and desires, such as stimulated him to a fierce and inflexible determination to succeed in his purposes. He was, in short, prepared to make almost any sacrifice, to wait any length of time, to do or suffer any thing that man could do or suffer, whether derogatory to his personal honor or not—in order either to secure the affections of Miss Aubrey, or, at all events, her consent to a union with him. Having early discovered the spot where Mr. Aubrey had fixed his residence, Mr. Gammon had made a point of lying in wait on a Sunday morning, for the purpose of discovering the church to which they went: and having succeeded, he became a constant, an impassioned, though an unseen observer of Miss Aubrey; from whom he seldom removed his eyes during the service. But this was to him a highly unsatisfactory state of things; he seemed, in fact, not to have made, nor to be likely to make, the least progress toward the accomplishment of his wishes, though much time had already passed away. He was so deeply engrossed with the affairs of Titmouse—which required his presence very frequently at Yatton, and a great deal of his attention in town—as to prevent his taking any decisive steps for some time in the matter nearest his heart. At length, not having seen or heard any thing of Mr. Aubrey for some weeks, during which he—Gammon—had been in town, he resolved on a new stroke of policy.

"Mr. Quirk," said he one day to his excellent senior partner, "I fancy you will say that I am come to flatter you; but, Heaven knows!—if there is a man on the earth with whom I lay aside disguise, that man is my friend Mr. Quirk. Really, it does seem, and mortifying enough it is to own it, as if events invariably showed that you are right—and I wrong"—(Here Mr. Quirk's appearance might have suggested the idea of a great old tom-eat who is rubbed down the right way of the fur, and does everything he can to testify the delight it gives him, by preening against the person who affords him such gratification,)—"especially in financial matters!"

"Ah, Gammon, Gammon! you're really past finding out! Sometimes, now, I declare I fancy you the very keenest dog going in such matters, and at other times, eh?—not particularly brilliant. When you've seen so much of this world's villany, Gammon, as I have, you'll find it as necessary as I have found it, to lay aside one's—one's—I say, to lay aside all scrup—that is—I mean—one's fine feelings, and so forth: you understand, Gammon?"

"Perfectly, Mr. Quirk."

"Well; and may I ask, Gammon, what is the particular occasion of that screwed-up forehead of yours? Something in the wind?"

"Only this, Mr. Quirk—I begin to suspect that I did very wrong in recommending you to give an indefinite time to that Mr. Aubrey for payment of the heavy balance he owes us—by Heavens!—see how coolly he treats us!"

"Indeed, Gammon, I think so! Besides; 'tis an uncommon heavy balance to owe so long, eh? Fifteen hundred pounds, or thereabouts? 'Gad! it's that, at least!'" Gammon shrugged his shoulders, and bowed, as resigned to any step which Mr. Quirk might think proper to take.

"He's a villainous proud fellow, that Aubrey, eh? Your swell debtors generally are, though—when they've got a bit of a hardship to harp upon!"

"Certainly we ought, when we had him in our power!"

"Ah! D'ye recollect, Gammon? the thunderbolts? eh? whose fault was it that it was n't put on? eh? Tell me that, friend Gammon! Are you coming round to old Caleb Quirk's matter-of-fact way of doing business? Depend on it, the old boy has got a trick or two left in him yet, gray as his hair's grown."

"I bow, my dear sir; I own myself worsted—and all through that absurd weakness I have, which some choose to call!"

"Oh Lord, Gammon! Bubble, bubble and botheration, ah, ha! Come, there's nobody here but you and me—and—eh! old Bogy perhaps—so why that little bit of blarney?"

"Oh, my dear Mr. Quirk, spare me that cutting irony of yours. Surely when I have made the sincere and humiliating submission to which you have been listening: but to return to business. I assure you that I think we ought to lose not a moment in getting in our balance, or at least coming to some satisfactory and definite arrangement concerning it. Only pinch him, and he'll bleed freely, depend on it."

"Ah, ha! Pinch him, and he'll bleed! That's my thunder, Gammon, ah, ha, ha! By Jove! that's it to a T! I always thought the fellow had blood enough in him if we only squeezed him a little—so let Snap be off and have a writ out against Master Aubrey."

"Forgive me, my dear Mr. Quirk," interrupted Gammon, blandly; "we must go very cautiously to work, or we shall only injure ourselves, and prejudice our most important—and permanent interests. We must take care not to drive him desperate, poor devil, or he may take the benefit of the act, and!"

"What a cursed scamp he would be to!"

"Certainly; but we should suffer more than he!"

"Surely, Gammon, they'd remand him! Eighteen months at the very least."

"Not an hour—not a minute, Mr. Quirk," said Gammon, very earnestly.

"The deuce they would n't? Well! Law's come to a pretty point! And so lenient as we've been!"

"What occurs to me as the best method of procedure," said Gammon, after musing for a moment, "is, for you to write a letter to him immediately—civil but peremptory—just one of those letters of yours, my dear sir, in which no man living can excel you—suaviter in modo, fortiter in re, Mr. Quirk."

"Gammon, you're a gentleman, every inch of you—you are, upon my soul! If there is one thing in which I—but you're a hand at a letter of that sort, too! And you have managed these people hitherto; why not go on to the end of the chapter?"

"Mr. Quirk, I look upon this letter as rather an important one—it ought to come from the head of the firm, and to be decisively and skillfully expressed, so as at once to—eh? but you know exactly what ought to be done."

"Well—leave it to me—leave it to me, Gammon: I think I do know how to draw up a teaser—egad! You can just cast your eye over it as soon as!"

"If I return in time from Clerkenwell, I will, Mr. Quirk," replied Gammon, who had, however, determined not to disabuse himself from saying with literal truth that he had not seen one line of the letter which might be sent! and, moreover, resolving to make his appearance at Mr. Aubrey's almost immediately after he should, in the course of the post, have received Mr. Quirk's letter—with every appearance and expression of distress, agitation, and even disgust; indignantly assuring Mr. Aubrey that the letter had been sent without Mr. Gammon's knowledge—against his will—and was entirely repudiated by him; and that he would take care, at all hazards to himself, to frustrate any designs on the part of his coarse and hard-hearted senior partner to harass or oppress Mr. Aubrey. With this explanation of precedent circumstances, I proceed to lay before the reader an exact copy of that old cat's-paw, Mr. Quirk's letter to Mr. Aubrey, the arrival of which had produced the sensation I have already intimated.

"Saffron Hill, Sept. 30, 18—"

"SIR: We trust you will excuse our reminding you of the very large balance (£1446 14s. 6d.) still remaining due upon our account—and which we understood, at the time when the very favorable arrangement to you, with respect to Mr. Titmouse, was made, was to have been long before this liquidated. Whatever allowances we might have felt disposed, on account of your peculiar situation, to have made, (and which we have made,) we cannot but feel a little surprised at your having allowed several months to elapse without making any allusion thereto. We are satisfied, however, that you require only to be reminded thereof, to have your immediate attention directed thereto, and to act in that way that will conduce to liquidate our very heavy balance against you. We are sorry to have to press you; but being much pressed ourselves with serious outlays, we are obliged to throw ourselves (however reluctantly) upon our resources; and it gives us pleasure to anticipate that you must by this time have made those arrangements that will admit of your immediate attention to our over-due account, and that will render unnecessary our resorting to hostile and compulsory proceedings of that extremely painful description that we have always felt extremely reluctant to, particularly with those gentlemen that would feel it very disagreeable. We trust that in a week's time we shall hear from you to that effect that will render unnecessary our proceeding to extremities against you, which would be extremely painful to us. I remain, sir, yours most obediently,

CALEB QUIRK.

"CHARLES AUBREY, Esq.

"P. S. We should have no objection, if it would materially relieve you, to take your note of hand for the aforesaid balance (£1446 14s. 6d.) at two months, with interest, and good security. Or say, £800 down in two months, and a warrant of attorney for the remainder, at two months more."

As soon as all three of them had finished reading the above letter, in the way I have described, Mrs. Aubrey threw her arms round her silent and oppressed husband's neck, and Kate, her bosom heaving with agitation, returned to her seat, without uttering a word.

"My darling Charles!" faltered Mrs. Aubrey, and wept. "Never mind, Charles—let us hope that we shall get through even this," commenced Kate; when her emotion prevented her proceeding. Mr. Aubrey appeared to cast his eye again, but mechanically only, over the dry, civil, heart-breaking letter.

"Do n't distress yourself, my Agnes," said he, tenderly, placing her beside him, with his arm around her—"it is only reasonable that these people should ask for what is their own; and if their manner is a little coarse!"

"Oh, I've no patience, Charles! It's the letter of a vulgar, hard-hearted fellow," sobbed Mrs. Aubrey.

"Yes—they are wretches!—cruel harpies!" quoth Kate, passionately, wiping her eyes—"they know that you have almost begged yourself to pay off by far the greater part of their abominable bill; and that you are slaving day and night to enable you to"—here her agitation was so excessive as to prevent her uttering another word.

"I must write and tell them," said Aubrey calmly, but with a countenance laden with gloom—"it is all I can do—but if they will have patience with me, I will pay them all."

"Oh, they'll put you in prison, Charles, directly,"—said Kate passionately; and rising, she threw herself into his arms, and kissed him with a sort of frantic energy. "We're very miserable, Charles—are not we? It's very hard to bear indeed,"—she continued, gazing with agonizing intensity on his troubled features. Mrs. Aubrey wept in silence.

"Are you giving way, my brave Kate, with this sudden and momentary gust on the midnight sea of our trouble?" inquired her brother, proudly but kindly gazing at her, and with his hand gently pushing from her pale cheeks her disordered hair.

"Human nature, Charles, must not be tried too far,—look at Agnes, the darling little loves!"

"I am not likely to consult their interests, Kate, by yielding to unmanly emotion—am I, sweet Agnes?" She made him no reply, but shook her head, sobbing bitterly.

"Pray what do you think, Charles, of your friend Mr. Gammon, now?" inquired Kate, suddenly and scornfully. "Oh, the smooth-tongued villain! I've always hated him!"

"I must say there's something about his eye that is any thing but pleasing," said Mrs. Aubrey; "and so I thought when I saw him at York for a moment."

"He's a hypocrite, Charles—depend upon it; and in this letter he has thrown off the mask!"—interrupted Kate.

"Is it his letter? How do we know that he has had any thing to do with it?" inquired her brother, calmly. "It is much more probable that it is the production of old Mr. Quirk alone, for whom Mr. Gammon has, I know, a profound contempt. The handwriting is Mr. Quirk's; the style is assuredly not Mr. Gammon's, and the whole tone of the letter is such as makes me confident that neither was the composition of the letter, nor the idea of sending it, his; besides, he has really shown on every occasion a straight-forward and disinterested!"

"Oh, Charles, it is very weak of you to be so taken with such a man; he's a horrid fellow—I can't bear to think of him! One of these days, Charles, you'll be of my opinion!"—whilst she thus spoke, and whilst Mrs. Aubrey was, with a trembling hand, preparing tea, a double knock was heard at the street door.

"Gracious, Charles! who can that possibly be, and at this time of night?" exclaimed Kate, with alarmed energy.

"I really cannot conjecture,"—replied Mr. Aubrey, with no little agitation of manner, which he found it impossible to conceal—"we've certainly but very few visitors, and so late." The servant in a few minutes terminated their suspense, and occasioned them nearly equal alarm and amazement, by laying down on the table a card bearing the name of MR. GAMMON.

"Mr. Gammon!" exclaimed all three in a breath, looking apprehensively at each other—"Is he alone?" inquired Mr. Aubrey, with forced calmness.

"Yes, sir."

"Show him into the parlor, then," replied Mr. Aubrey, "and say I will be with him in a few minutes' time."

"Dear Charles, don't, dearest, think of going down," said his wife and sister, with excessive alarm and agitation; "desire him to send up his message."

"No, I shall go and see him, and at once," replied Mr. Aubrey, taking one of the candles.

"For heaven's sake, Charles, mind what you say to the man; he will watch every word you utter. And, dearest, don't stay long; consider what tortures we shall be in!" said poor Mrs. Aubrey, accompanying him to the door.

"Rely on my prudence, and also that I shall not stop long," he replied; and descending the stairs, he entered the study. In a chair near the little book-strewn table sat his dreaded visitor, who instantly, on seeing Mr. Aubrey, rose, with distress and agitation visible in his countenance and deportment. Mr. Aubrey, with calmness and dignity, begged him to resume his seat; and when he had done so, sat down opposite to him, with a sterner inquisitive look, awaiting his visitor's errand, who did not keep him long in suspense. For—"Oh, Mr. Aubrey!" commenced Mr. Gammon, with a somewhat tremulous voice, "I perceive, from your manner, that my fears are justified, and that I am an intruder—a dishonorable and hypocritical one I must indeed appear; but, as one gentleman with another, I request you to hear me. This visit appears indeed unreasonable; but, late this afternoon, I made a discovery which has shocked me severely, nay, I may say, disgusted me beyond expression. Am I right, Mr. Aubrey, in supposing that this evening you have received a letter from Mr. Quirk, and about the balance due on our account?"

"Yes, sir," replied Mr. Aubrey, coldly.

"I thought as much," muttered Gammon, with suppressed vehemence—"execrable, heartless, sordid old—And he knew," continued Gammon, addressing Mr. Aubrey, in an indignant tone, "that my word was pledged to you that it should be long before you were troubled about the business."

"I have nothing to complain of, sir," said Mr. Aubrey, eyeing his agitated companion (who felt that he was) searchingly.

"But I have, Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, haughtily. "My senior partner has broken faith with me. Sir, you have already paid more than will cover what is justly due to us; and I recommend you, after this, to have the bill taxed. I do, sir, and thereby you will get rid of every farthing of the balance now demanded." Notwithstanding the air of sincerity with which this was uttered, a cold thrill of apprehension and suspicion passed through Mr. Aubrey's heart, and he felt confident that some subtle and dangerous manoeuvre was being practised upon him—some hostile step urged upon him, for instance—which would be unsuccessful, and yet afford a pretext to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap to treat him as one guilty of a breach of faith, and warrant them in proceeding to extremities.

"I have no intention, sir, to do any thing of the kind," said he—"the original agreement between us was, that your bill should not be taxed. I adhere to it; and whatever course you may feel disposed to take, I shall take no steps whatever of the kind you mention. At the same time, it is utterly impossible for me to pay."

"Mr. Aubrey!" interrupted Gammon, imploringly.

"And what you intend to do, for Heaven's sake, sir, do quickly, and do not keep me in suspense."

"I perceive, Mr. Aubrey, that I am distrusted," said Gammon, with a somewhat proud and peremptory tone and manner. "I excuse it; you are justly irritated, and have been insulted: so have I, too, sir; and I choose to tell you, upon my sacred word of honor as a gentleman, that I entirely disown and scout this whole procedure; that I never knew any thing about it till, accidentally, I discovered lying on Mr. Quirk's desk, after his departure this evening from the office, a rough draft of a letter which I presumed you had received, especially as, on a strict inquiry of the clerks, I found that a letter had been put into the post, addressed to you. Nay, more; Mr. Quirk, whose rapacity increases—I am shocked to own—inversely with his years—has been for many weeks harassing me about this detestable business, and urging me to consent, but in vain, to such an application as he has now meanly made behind my back, regardless of the injury it was calculated to do my feelings, and, indeed, the doubt it must throw over my sincerity and honor. Only a fortnight ago, he solemnly pledged himself never to mention the matter to either me or you again, for at least a couple of years, unless something extraordinary should intervene. If the letter you have received is a transcript of the rough draft which I have read, it is a vulgar, unfeeling letter, and contains two or three wilfully false statements. I therefore feel it due to myself to disavow all participation in this truly unworthy affair; and if you still distrust me, I can only regret it, but shall not presume to find fault with you for it. I am half disposed, on account of this, and one or two other things which have happened, to close my connexion with Mr. Quirk from this day—for ever. He and I have nothing in common; and the kind of business which he prefers is perfectly odious to me. But if I should continue in the firm, I will undertake to supply you with one pretty conclusive evidence of my sincerity and truth in what I have been saying to you—namely, that on the faith and honor of a gentleman, you may depend upon hearing no more on this matter from any member of our firm. Let the coast, Mr. Aubrey, speak for itself."—While Gammon was speaking, with great earnestness and fervor, he had felt Mr. Aubrey's eye fixed on him with an expression of stern incredulity—which, however, he at length perceived, with infinite inward relief and pleasure, to be giving way as he went on.

"Certainly, Mr. Gammon," said Mr. Aubrey, when Gammon had ceased—"the letter you have mentioned, has occasioned me—and my family—very great distress; for it is utterly out of my power to comply with its requisitions: and if it be intended to be really acted on, and followed up!"—he paused, and successfully concealed his emotion, "all my little plans are for ever frustrated—and I am at your mercy to go to prison, if you choose, and there, end my days." He paused—his lip trembled, and his eyes were for a moment obscured with starting tears. So also was it with Mr. Gammon. "But,"—resumed Mr. Aubrey,—"after the explicit and voluntary assurance which you have given me, I feel it impossible not to believe you entirely. I can imagine no motive for what would be otherwise such elaborate deception."

"Motive, Mr. Aubrey? The only motive I am conscious of is, one resting on profound sympathy for your misfortune—admiration of your character—and aiming at your speedy extrication from your very serious embarrassment. I am in the habit Mr. Aubrey," he continued, in a lower tone, "of concealing and checking my feelings—but there are occasions"—he paused, and added with a somewhat faltering voice—"Mr. Aubrey, it pains me inexpressibly to observe that your anxieties—your severe exertions—I trust in God I may not rightly add, your privations—are telling on your appearance. You are certainly much thinner." It was impossible any longer to distrust the sincerity of Mr. Gammon—to withstand the arts of this consummate actor. Mr. Aubrey held out long, but at length surrendered entirely, and yielded implicit credence to all that Gammon had said—entertaining, moreover, commensurate feelings of gratitude toward one who had done so much to protect him from rapacious avarice, and the ruin into which it would have precipitated him; and of respect for one who had evinced such an anxious, scrupulous, and sensitive jealousy for his own honor and reputation, and resolute determination to vindicate it against suspicion. Subsequent conversation served to strengthen his favorable disposition toward Gammon, and the same effect was also produced when he adverted to his previous and unwarrantable distrust and disbelief of that gentleman. He looked fatigued and harassed; it was growing late; he had come on his errand of courtesy and kindness, a great distance; why should not Mr. Aubrey ask him up stairs, to join them at tea? To be sure, Mr. Aubrey had hitherto felt a disinclination—he scarce knew why—to have any more than mere business intercourse with Mr. Gammon, a member of such a firm as Quirk, Gammon and Snap—and, moreover, Mr. Runnington had more than once let fall expressions indicative of vehement distrust of Mr. Gammon; so had the Attorney-General; but what had Gammon's conduct been? Had it not practically given the lie to such insinuations and distrust, unless Mr. Aubrey was to own himself incapable of forming a judgment on a man's line of conduct which had been so closely watched as that of Gammon by himself, Aubrey? Then Miss Aubrey had ever, and especially that very evening—expressed a vehement dislike of Mr. Gammon—avowed, also, her early and uniform distrust—it would be extremely embarrassing to her suddenly to introduce into her presence such an individual as Gammon; again, he had promised to return quickly, in order to relieve their anxiety; why should he not have the inexpressible gratification of letting Mr. Gammon himself, in his own pointed and impressive manner, dispel all their fears? He would, probably, not stay long.

"Mr. Gammon," said he, having balanced for some minutes these conflicting considerations in his mind—"there are only Mrs. Aubrey and my sister up stairs. I am sure they will be happy to see me return to them in time for tea, accompanied by the bearer of such agreeable tidings as yours. For Mr. Quirk's letter, to be frank, reached me when in their presence, and we all read it together, and were dreadfully disturbed at its contents." After a faint show of reluctance to trespass on the ladies so suddenly, and at so late an hour, Mr. Gammon slipped off his great-coat, and, with secret but suppressed feelings of exultation at the success of his scheme, followed Mr. Aubrey up stairs. He felt not a little fluttered on entering the room and catching a first glimpse of the two lovely women—and one of them Miss Aubrey—sitting in it, their faces turned with eager interest and anxiety toward the door as he made his appearance. He observed that both of them started, and turned excessively pale.

"Let me introduce to you," said Mr. Aubrey, quickly, and with a bright assuring smile, "a gentleman who has kindly called to relieve us all from great anxiety—Mr. Gammon. Mr. Gammon, Mrs. Aubrey—Miss Aubrey." He bowed with an air of deep deference, but easy self-possession; his soul thrilling within him at the sight of her whose image had never been from before his eyes since they had first seen her.

"I shall trespass on you for only a few minutes, ladies," said he, approaching the chair toward which he was motioned. "I could not resist the opportunity so politely afforded me by Mr. Aubrey of paying my compliments here, and personally assuring you of my utter abhorrence of the mercenary and oppressive conduct of a gentleman with whom, alas! I am closely connected in business, and whose letter to you of this evening I only casually became acquainted with a few moments before starting off hither. Forget it ladies; I pledge my honor that it shall never be acted upon!" This he said with a fervor of manner that could not but make an impression on those whom he addressed.

"I'm sure we're happy to see you, Mr. Gammon, and very much obliged to you, indeed," said Mrs. Aubrey, with a sweet smile, and a face from which alarm was vanishing fast. Miss Aubrey said nothing: her brilliant eyes glanced with piercing anxiety, now at her brother, then at his companion. Gammon felt that he was distrusted. Nothing could be more prepossessing—more bland and insinuating, without a trace of fulsome, than Mr. Gammon's manner and address, as he took his seat between Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey, whose paleness rather suddenly gave way to a vivid and beautiful flush; and her eyes presently sparkled with delighted surprise on perceiving the relieved air of her brother, and the apparent cordiality and sincerity of Mr. Gammon. When she reflected, moreover, on her expressions of harshness and severity concerning him that very evening, and of which he now appeared so undeserving, it threw into her manner toward him a sort of delicate and charming embarrassment. Her ear drank in eagerly every word he uttered—so pointed, so significant, so full of earnest good-will toward her brother. His manner was that of a gentleman, his countenance and conversation that of a man of intellect; was this the keen and cruel pettifogger whom she had learned at once to dread and to despise? They and he were, in a word, completely at their ease with one another, within a few minutes after he had taken his seat at the tea-table. Miss Aubrey's beauty shone that evening with even unwonted lustre, and appeared as if it had not been in the least impaired by the anguish of mind which she had so long suffered. "It is quite impossible for me to do justice to the expression of her full beaming blue eyes—an expression of mingled passion and intellect—of blended softness and spirit, that, especially in conjunction with the rich tones of her voice, shed something like madness into the breast of Gammon. She, as well as her lovely sister-in-law, was dressed in mourning, which infinitely set off her dazzling complexion, and, simple and elegant in its drapery, displayed her exquisite proportions to the greatest possible advantage. "Oh, my God!" thought Gammon, with a momentary thrill of disgust and horror; "and this is the transcendent creature of whom that little miscreant, Titmouse, spoke to me in terms of such presumptuous and revolting license!" What would he not have given to kiss the fair and delicate white hand that passed to him his tea-cup! Then Gammon's thoughts turned for a moment inward—why, what a scoundrel was he! At that instant he was, as it were, reeking with his recent lie.

He was there on cruel, false pretences, which alone had secured him access into that little drawing-room, and brought him into contiguity with the dazzling beauty beside him—pure and innocent as beautiful;—he was a fiend beside an angel. What an execrable hypocrite was he! He caught, on that memorable occasion, a sudden glimpse even of his own infernal selfishness—a sight that gave him a cold shudder. Then, was he not in the presence of his victims? of those whom he was fast pressing on to the verge of destruction—to whom he was, at that moment, meditating profound and subtle schemes of mischief! At length they all got into animated conversation. He was infinitely struck and charmed by the unaffected simplicity and frankness of their manners, yet he felt a sad and painful consciousness of not having made the least way with them; though physically near to them, he seemed yet really as an unapproachable distance from them, and particularly from Miss Aubrey. He felt that the courtesy bestowed upon him was accidental, the result merely of his present position, and of the intelligence which he had come to communicate; it was not personal—it was nothing to Gammon himself; it would never be renewed, unless he should renew his device. There was not the faintest semblance of sympathy between them and him. Fallen as they were into a lower sphere, they had yet about them, so to speak, a certain atmosphere of conscious personal consequence, derived from high birth and breeding—from superior feelings and associations—from a native frankness and dignity of character, which was indestructible and inalienable, which chilled and checked undue advances of any sort. They were still the Aubreys of Yatton, and he, in their presence, still Mr. Gammon, of the firm of Quirk, Gammon and Snap, of Saffron Hill—and all this on the part of the Aubreys without the least effort, the least intention, or consciousness. No, there had not been exhibited toward him the faintest indication of hauteur. On the contrary, he had been treated with perfect cordiality and frankness. Yet, dissatisfaction and vexation were, he scarce knew at the moment why, completely flooding him. Had he accurately analysed his own feelings, he would have discovered the real cause to have been—his own unreasonable, unjustifiable wishes and intentions. They talked of Titmouse, and his mode of life and conduct—of his expected alliance with the Lady Cecilia, at the mention of which Gammon's quick eye detected a passing smile of scorn on Miss Aubrey's countenance, that was death to all his own fond and ambitious hopes. After he had been sitting with them for scarcely an hour, he detected Miss Aubrey stealthily glancing at her watch, and at once arose to take his departure, with a very easy and graceful air, expressing an apprehension that he had trespassed upon their kindness. He was cordially assured to the contrary, but invited neither to prolong his stay, nor renew his visit. Miss Aubrey made him, he thought, as he inclined toward her, rather a formal curtsy; and the tone of voice—soft and silvery—in which she said "good-night, Mr. Gammon," fell on his eager ear, and sunk into his vexed heart, like music.

MAGNIFICENT PUBLIC WORK IN THE ISLAND OF MADEIRA.

[The following interesting paper has been communicated to the London Athenæum by Doctor James Macaulay, Foreign Secretary of the Botanical Society, Edinburgh.]

In the Island of Madeira the Portuguese Government is at present carrying on a great work, such as would do honor to any age and to any nation. During great part of the year that island is entirely free from rain. Even then, however, among the mountains, the clouds and mists furnish a perpetual supply of moisture, so that the river-courses are never wholly dry. This water, as it descends from the mountains, is collected and conveyed by means of Levedas, or artificial channels, through the cultivated grounds. The country is everywhere intersected by these rivulets, and the most perfect system of irrigation is thereby maintained. Some of these Levedas were formed by the first settlers in the island, in the beginning of the fifteenth century. The slaves of the early colonists were Moors and Eastern captives, and it may be that from them was derived a greater attention to irrigation, and a greater skill in its applications than is generally observed in European agriculture. Many of the works connected with the irrigation of the island display remarkable enterprise and skill on the part of the natives, and of these the most conspicuous is that of the Rock of Rabacal. At the head of a deep and narrow ravine which forms the commencement of the valley of the Ribeiro (river) de Janella, there rises a perpendicular rock not less than 1000 feet in height. An abundant supply of water flows from this cliff; partly in one large cascade sweeping over from the summit, and partly in the form of innumerable streams issuing from fissures in the face of the rock, and dripping down through the mountain shrubs by which the cliff is clothed.

This water used to fall into an abyss at the bottom, whence it flowed along unemployed and useless through the ravine and valley of the Janella to the Atlantic. It was observed, that if the water could be intercepted in its descent, and conducted by art from the course in which nature directed it, it might be turned to infinite utility for the purposes of irrigation. Who had the boldness first to conceive the actual execution of the project, is not recorded.

It appears to have been attempted at an early period of the history of the island, as there are at one place remains of some work of which no tradition has come down to us. In 1823, the Governor brought under consideration the importance of making use of these waters; but it was only in 1836 that the work was commenced. Of the extraordinary ability of the engineer under whose direction the work was planned, Captain Vicente de Paula Teixeira, a native of the island, even those who have not seen the place must form the highest opinion from a simple description of the work. The height of the cliff I have stated is 1000 feet. About 600 feet from the base, a horizontal channel has been cut in the face of the rock, sloping downward and inward, so that part of the water from above is intercepted in its descent, and falls into this hollow. The excavation extends round the face of the cliff for about 600 feet, presenting the appearance of a vaulted gallery, the roof of which is supported at intervals by pillars of the rock. The water flows along this channel, and is then to be conducted by an open aqueduct or Leveda for the distance of six miles. Here another great part of the undertaking is in progress. A tunnel, which will be 150 fathoms long, is to be cut through the crest of a mountain ridge, by which means the waters of the rock of Rabacal will be conveyed from the north to the south side of the island, and will spread cultivation and fertility over extensive districts hitherto either entirely waste, or yielding a poor and precarious produce from the absence of irrigation.

The channel on the face of the rock is now nearly completed, and the tunnel has been commenced at both extremities. In commencing the work, the operations were of an extremely difficult and dangerous character. It was impossible to reach that part of the cliff where the channel was projected by any means except by ropes suspended from above. Down this dreadful depth, with 300 feet of the precipice below them, the workmen were lowered; fastened to a little frame of wood at the end of the rope, and bearing instruments for boring and blasting the rock. When a mass of rock had been loosened by the handspike, or a train had been laid for blasting, it was necessary for the operator to get out of the reach of danger by pushing himself off from the cliff with his feet, and making for some tree or projecting point, where he secured himself till the explosion was over, and then returned to his labor. The workmen were moreover continually drenched by the streams of icy cold water falling upon them, so that they had to be frequently relieved on account of their becoming benumbed with cold. It is gratifying to add, that notwithstanding the extreme danger of these operations, (compared with which the samphire-gathering of Shakespeare's Chiff, or the bird-hunting of St. Kilda, might be described as occupations of little danger,) only one fatal accident has occurred in the whole undertaking. And when we consider the extraordinary boldness of conception displayed in the design, the genius and ability with which it has been hitherto been carried into execution, the difficulties and perils that have attended the operations, and the noble purpose of the undertaking, being not for mere ornament or fame, but for the permanent well-being and improvement of the country, we cannot but regard it as one of the grandest efforts of modern art.

REMARKS ON ORNAMENTAL GARDENING,

WITH A PLAN OF A FRUIT, FLOWER & VEGETABLE GARDEN.

Horticulture, after all that has been said and written, deservedly, in its commendation, is but an embraced department of the more enlarged science of Agriculture. It is the great, on a reduced scale: to a certain extent, it is the practical cyclopædia, as well as the model-farm of the agriculturist.

Alas, how few properly study, how few in our country through want of merited reflection, duly appreciate the value of the kitchen garden. It has not been so in all places or times; though necessarily imperfect, because, like mathematics, its utmost point of excellence seems forbidden to human attainment. Our great proto-father enjoyed in his first garden a satisfaction denied to the most fortunate of his descendants, a happiness unattainable by his children; for the garden of Eden was made, not by human hands—it was the work of God. When Adam was driven from his first home of indescribable bliss, he, by the labor of his hands and the sweat of his brow, made his little garden in other and less fruitful soil. In all times, and by all generations since, the hardy husbandman has had his garden. It is a matter of surprise, that while sciences of later birth have advanced almost to perfection, horticulture, perhaps the most necessary to man, has been comparatively so neglected and unimproved, and to our shame, especially in this land of freedom. "Sat prata biberant," said the Mantuan bard, in allusion to the practice of irrigating land, which prevailed in Italy, near two thousand years ago, as a means of fertilizing the soil; yet how little is it at this day pursued, even in the land of Cincinnatus.

The inhabitants of Holland, proverbially industrious, have indeed almost made their country a garden; and to the application of irrigation, above all other causes, they owe that great abundance which is the almost invariable reward of great assiduity. The Hollanders have brought their industry to the land of their adoption, but they have left much of their skill at home.

In Britain, the attention of the people is, by the peculiarity of the general policy of that nation, much diverted from the cultivation of the soil; yet agriculture has not been much neglected there; and, so far as attended to, it has been honorable to the nation. Industry has been greatly aided by the application of scientific principles. In the application of these principles to horticulture, the Englishman has, in very many instances, approached a perfection worthy of the imitation, and still more of the rivalry, of the American.

How happens it, that so little attention is given to horticulture in the United States? The people are industrious; they are intelligent; and much is done for the promotion of science in its various departments; but it must be confessed, although it may cause a blush, that horticulture is shamefully neglected. True, every farm-house has, as its adjunct, a kitchen garden; but what a garden? Would you walk through it? There is no walk there; or if there be, it is hidden by the crops, perhaps of vegetables, perhaps of weeds, or more probably, an unseemly commixture of both. Would you partake of some desired portion of its fruits, the chance is, you cannot reach it without trampling on some other fruit which you do not need. Over beds of earth carelessly piled up, seeds of various kinds are frequently thrown, as if the entire crop, like that of the field, were to be reaped during a single gathering time. Neither ornament nor convenience, nor even actual profit, seems to enter into this garden without a plan. The farmer acts as if he would not waste on the "little patch," the labor which would be more profitably employed in the wide, extended meadow, or the large corn-field. Here rests the error. There is no other acre on the farm which produces so large a return as that of the kitchen garden, nor is there any other acre on the farm which will produce so large a return of profit in proportion to the labor and capital expended. The farmer instead of saying, "I am expending too much on this spot," might better say, "I am expending too little." The kitchen garden, in truth, is the proper school of the agriculturist. There he will learn the great value of properly prepared compost, without which his garden will produce a scanty crop; he will there learn that manure, in order to secure its utmost benefit, must be buried beneath the surface, and not thrown loosely on the surface; he will there learn the great value of irrigation. The principles of the kitchen garden, are in many instances applicable to the farm generally, and may often be adopted with great advantage.

A well furnished garden embraces the choice specimens of both nature and art, carefully selected and judiciously and harmoniously blended together—assisting nature to improve her own productions.

The amateur will not only collect from every quarter the beauties of nature, and arrange them to the best advantage; but, calling to his aid the ornamental arts, he will heighten their effect by suitable displays of rural architecture—he will embellish his gardens with jets and fountains,* and with appropriate specimens of sculpture; and the pencil of the artist will give delight to his evening walks with pleasing transparencies. He will also avail himself of the treasures of Conchology—"perhaps none, but the department of Flora, can vie with this in variety, symmetry of form, and in richness of coloring."

The head of a family, if he cherishes the social virtues, will prefer his home to any other place. It is like a center of gravity to all his pleasures and attachments to life. If you see a good vegetable, flower and fruit garden, attached even to an otherwise humble cottage, there can scarcely be a doubt but that that cottage is the abode of happiness—that home is the most pleasing place to its occupant.

The God of nature paints the flowers of the field most exquisitely, and gives us power to discover and admire their inimitable beauty. "Do you know," said the amiable Wiberforce, as he was sinking under the infirmities of old age, opening on some flowers shut up in book, "Do you know that I am very fond of flowers?—the corn, and things of that kind, I look upon as the bounties of Providence—the flowers I look upon as his smile."

"Your voiceless lips, oh flowers! are living preachers,
Each cup a pulpit, and each leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers
From loneliest nook!"

To conclude: In gardening, as in all other subjects, a plan is necessary to success, and having been frequently solicited by Messrs. Cultivator, and by other friends in this and the adjacent counties for something of the kind, and considering this the proper season to commence preparatory operations, I herewith present a diagram and description of a garden, which, if it answers no other good purpose, may be the means of procuring a better from some other source.

Little has been published in our country on the subject of gardening as an art of design and taste; and the publications of Europe not being suitable to our wants, it is proper to make a beginning, and devise that which may suit ourselves, our country, and our climate.

ALEXANDER WALSH.

LANSINGBURGH, February 1, 1841.

(Plan of a Garden—Fig. 8.)

DESCRIPTION.

The garden and pleasure ground I would describe, is of an oblong form, 165 feet by 120 feet, with one end next the north side of the house, (fig. 8.) A walk 5 feet in width,

* The subject of hydraulics in domestic economy, is but recently beginning to be developed in our country; but it is to be hoped that the great interest which every one must feel in possessing a supply of water, both for use and ornament, will awaken the attention of the public more extensively to the subject.

A. A. of a semi-elliptical form, passes from the north hall door to the principal rear building on the west, extending in its course to the north 60 feet; a walk of 5 feet in width extends through the center from south to north, 159 ft. A. A. and is crossed at right angles by another of the same width 47 feet from the north edge of the ellipsis; walks of 4 feet width C. C. C. surround the four squares. The walks gravelled; formed rising at the centre to the height of the beds, with a descent each side, of an inch and a half to the border, which border is composed of bricks laid edgewise, the outer side flush with the soil, the inner side an inch and a half above the lowest part of the walk. H. and I. two mounds 12 feet diameter, 3 feet 6 inches high, enclosed by octagons, leaving a walk 4 feet in the narrowest part, with openings of 6 feet to the centre walk and ellipsis; the mounds enclosed with brick, placed edgewise, including to the centre, and sunk 3 inches in the ground; the enclosure filled with soil; each mound has growing in its centre, an evergreen tree. H. covered with evergreen periwinkle, Vicia minor; and I. covered with variegated periwinkle, Vicia minor fl. alba.

At the proper season, green-house plants, and also shells, will be prettily accommodated around the mounds; of the latter, I would recommend, Strombus gigas, Triton variegatus, and Halotis asina. The more rare and beautiful shells may be appropriately assigned to the summer-house.

(Fig. 10.)

X. X. two seats, each occupying two feet—J. and K. passages leading to summer-house and green-house—L. summer-house—M. green-house. (Designs for summer-house and green-house, as also plans for ornamental gates, &c., in a future number.) N. N. N. four Grecian pedestals for urns, statues, and heavy mineral specimens—R. R. R. four small columns, 9 feet high, connected in the centre at the top, with a hook under the centre (fig. 9,) for suspending a lamp or bird-cage—grapes trained over the frame—S. S. two fixtures for transparencies—T. T. two seats (fig. 11,) surrounded by an arched arbor 10 ft. high, thrown over the walk, ornamented on one side with honeysuckle, on the other by climbing Boursant rose—U. U. two ornamental frames, the square 4 ft. 6 in., by 4 ft. 6 in. (fig. 10,) may be covered with a variety of our native clematis—V. V. two structures 9 feet high, and 3 feet six inches wide, (fig. 12,) 4 feet from east fence, covered with American Bitter-sweet, Celastrus scandens.

The ground on the outside of the elliptical walk, east, a grass lawn, diversified with fruit and ornamental trees, commencing next the walk with the lowest shrub, and rising to the east in gradation to the largest tree. Many of our beautiful native flowers and shrubs are found to thrive under the shade and drip of lofty trees, and may here be planted in occasional groups.

The ground on the west side of the elliptical walk, grass lawn, shrubby and filbert bushes, to the extreme west of the green-house.—O. & P. fruit and ornamental trees and native shrubs—R. native flowers—Q. tulips and late flowering exotic plants—O. O. diminutive rustic alcoves from thrifty growing plants of upright privet, Ligustrum strictum, formed by placing a platform of light boards two feet six inches from the ground, and three feet long, and one foot six inches wide, on the twigs of the privet; those in the centre of the platform to be trimmed off close to its under side, and those on the back and sides to be led up round the platform, entwined and arched; the door to be constructed from the twigs in front, and an opening left two feet six inches high, which is the height of the dome.

This described ornamental pleasure ground, contains some hundreds of trees and shrubs, possessing the color of green in common, yet differing in both the shape and shade of the leaf, and add much to adorn this spot by their variegated moving foliage, light and shade.

D. E. F. and G. four principal compartments, each 43 feet 6 inches by 43 feet—D. has a circle in the centre 26 feet in diameter, a parterre for annual flowers; in the centre, a sun dial; a walk 4 feet wide surrounds the circle, and from it north and south; the residue of the ground D. allotted to Dahlias, &c.—E. F. and G. compartments for culinary vegetables, strawberries, and an occasional plum tree—B. B. B. outside borders 6 feet wide for currants, gooseberries, raspberries, &c.; in the centre of the north border a small board suspended, labelled, "Waste not, want not," near which bee-hives. . . . borders for small flowers on the south and north side of D. and F. . . . borders south side of E. and G. for foreign grape vines and herbaceous perennial flowering plants. On each side of centre walk, . . . trellis for native grape vine; posts 7 feet high with 5 rods of wire crossed at equal distance; at the southern extremity of trellis, a light arch, on the back or north side of which, may be inscribed, "Walk clustered grapes He crowns the vine." At the northern extremity of trellis, an arbor thrown over the walk 12 feet long, more for ornament than use; grapes in our northern latitudes ripen better on the open trellis.

Candytuft, Iris umbellata, a good annual border flower; Dwarf Iris, Iris pumila, and yellow flowering stone crop, Sedum aizoon, pretty biennial bordering.

On a subject embracing such variety, it is not best to be more minute on border or other plants, as the collection and selection of plants, and the invention of other ornamental decorations will afford amusement to the man of taste, and to him this pleasing occupation must be left.

"Oh sages! think on joy like this,
And where 's your boast of apathy."

YOU 'LL COME TO OUR BALL.

"Comment! c'est lui!—que je le regarde encore!—c'est que vraiment il est bien change; n'est pas, mon papa?"—[Les Premiers Amours.]

You 'll come to our Ball;—since we parted,
I've thought of you, more than I 'll say;
Indeed, I was half broken-hearted,
For a week, when they took you away.
Fond Fancy brought back to my slumbers
Our walks on the Ness and the Den,
And echoed the musical numbers
Which you used to sing to me then.
I know the romance, since it 's over,
'T were idle, or worse, to recall:
I know you 're a terrible rover;
But, Clarence—you 'll come to our Ball!

It 's only a year, since at college
You put on your cap and your gown;
But, Clarence, you 've grown out of knowledge,
And changed from the spur to the crown;
The voice that was best when it faltered,
Is fuller and firmer in tone;
And the smile that should never have altered—
Dear Clarence—it is not your own;
Your cravat was badly selected,
Your coat do n't become you at all;
And why is your hair so neglected?
You must have it curled for our ball.

I've often been out upon Haldon,
To look for a covey with Pup;
I've often been over to Shaldon,
To see how your boat is laid up:
In spite of the terrors of Auty,
I've ridden the filly you broke;
And I've studied your sweet little Dante,
In the shade of your favorite oak;
When I sat in July to Sir Lawrence,
I sat in your love of a shawl;
And I 'll wear what you brought me from Florence,
Perhaps, if you 'll come to our Ball.

You 'll find us all changed since you vanish'd:
We 've set up a National School;
And waltzing is utterly banished;
And Ellen has married a fool;
The Major is going to travel;
Miss Hyacinth threatens a rout;
The walk is laid down with fresh gravel;
Papa is laid up with the gout;
And Jane has gone on with her easels,
And Anne has gone off with Sir Paul;
And Fanny is sick of the measles—
And I 'll tell you the rest at the Ball.

You 'll meet all your Beauties: the Lily,
And the Fairy of Willowbrook Farm,
And Lucy, who made me so silly
At Dawlish, by taking your arm;
Miss Manners, who always abused you,
For talking so much about Hock;
And her sister who often amused you,
By raving of rebels and Rock;
And something which surely would answer,
An heiress, quite fresh from Bengal;
So, though you were seldom a dancer,
You 'll dance, just for once, at our Ball.

But out on the world!—from the flowers
It shuts out the sunshine of truth;
It blights the green leaves in the bowers,
It makes an old age of our youth;
And the flow of our feeling, once in it,
Like a streamlet beginning to freeze,
Though it cannot turn ice in a minute,
Grows harder by sudden degrees.
Time treads o'er the grave of Affection;
Sweet honey is turned into gall;
Perhaps you have no recollection
That ever you danced at our Ball.

You once could be pleased with our ballads;
To-day you have critical ears;
You once could be charmed with our salads;
Alas! you 've been dining with Peers;
You trifled and flirted with many;
You 've forgotten the when and the how:
There was one you liked better than any:
Perhaps you 've forgotten her now.

They tell me you 've many who flatter,
Because of your wit and your song;
They tell me (and what does it matter?)
You like to be praised by the throng;
They tell me you 're showered with laurel!
They tell me you 're loved by a Blue;
They tell me you 're sadly immoral—
Dear Clarence that cannot be true!
But to me you are still what I found you
Before you grew clever and tall;
And you 'll think of the spell that once bound you;
And you 'll come—won't you come? to our Ball!

THE DEATH OF DON PEDRO.

The reader may remember, that when Don Pedro had, by his excessive cruelties, quite alienated from himself the hearts of the great majority of his people, Don Henry of Transtamara, his natural brother, who had spent many years in exile, returned suddenly into Spain with a formidable band of French auxiliaries, by whose aid he drove Pedro out of his kingdom. The voice of the nation was on Henry's side, and he took possession of the throne without further opposition.

Pedro, after his treatment of Queen Blanche, could have nothing to hope from the crown of France, so he immediately threw himself into the arms of England. And our Edward, the Black Prince, who then commanded in Gascony, had more than one obvious reason for taking up his cause.

The Prince of Wales marched with Don Pedro into Spain, at the head of an army of English and Gascon veterans, whose disciplined valor, Methinks very frankly confessed, gave them a decided superiority over the Spanish soldiery of the time. Henry was so unwise as to set his stake upon a battle, and was totally defeated in the field of Nejarra. Unable to rally his flying troops, he was compelled to make his escape beyond the Pyrenees; and Don Pedro once more established himself in his kingdom. The battle of Nejarra took place in 1366.

But, in 1368, when the Black Prince had retired again into Gascony, Henry, in his turn, came back from exile with a small but gallant army, most of whom were French, commanded by the celebrated Bertrand Du Guesclin, or, as he is more commonly called, Du Guesclin—and animated, as was natural, by strong thirst of vengeance for the insults, which, in the person of Blanche, Pedro had heaped upon the royal line of their country, and the blood of Saint Lewis.

Henry of Transtamara advanced into the heart of La Mancha, and there encountered Don Pedro, at the head of an army six times more numerous than that which he commanded, but composed in a great measure of Jews, Saracens, and Portuguese,—miscellaneous auxiliaries, who gave way before the ardor of the French chivalry, so that Henry remained victorious, and Pedro was compelled to take refuge in the neighboring castle of Montiel. That fortress was so strictly blockaded by the successful enemy, that the king was compelled to attempt his escape by night, with only twelve persons in his retinue,—Ferdinand de Castro being the person of the most note among them.

As they wandered in the dark, they were encountered by a body of French cavalry making the rounds, commanded by an adventurous knight called Le Bague de Villaines. Compelled to surrender, Don Pedro put himself under the safeguard of this officer, promising him a rich ransom if he would conceal him from the knowledge of his brother Henry. The knight, according to Froissart, promised him concealment, and conveyed him to his own quarters.

But in the course of an hour, Henry was apprised that he was taken, and came, with some of his followers, to the tent of Allan de la Houmaye, where his unfortunate brother had been placed. In entering the chamber, he exclaimed, "Where is that whorson and Jew, who calls himself King of Castile?"—Pedro, as proud and fearless as he was cruel, stopped instantly forward and replied, "Here I stand, the lawful son and heir of Don Alphonso, and it is thou that art but a false bastard." The rival brethren instantly grappled like lions, the French knights and Du Guesclin himself looked on. Henry drew his poniard and wounded Pedro in the face, but his body was defeated by a coat-of-mail;—a violent struggle ensued:—Henry fell across a bench, and his brother being uppermost, had well nigh mastered him, when one of Henry's followers seizing Don Pedro by the leg, turned him over, and his master, thus at length gaining the upper-hand, instantly stabbed the King to the heart.

Froissart calls this man the Vicomte de Roquebety, and others the Bastard of Anise. Menard, in his History of Du Guesclin, says, that while all around gazed like statues on the furious struggle of the brothers, Du Guesclin exclaimed to this attendant of Henry, "What! wilt thou stand by and see your master placed at such a pass by a false renegade?—Make forward and aid him, for well you may."

Pedro's head was cut off, and his remains were meanly buried. They were afterward disinterred by his daughter, the wife of our own John of Gaunt, "time-honored Lancaster," and deposited in Beville, with the honors due to his rank. His memory was regarded with a strange mixture of horror and compassion, which recommended him as a subject for legend and for romance. He had caused his innocent wife to be assassinated—had murdered three of his brothers,—and committed numberless cruelties upon his subjects. He had, which the age held equally scandalous, held a close intimacy with the Jews and Saracens, and had enriched him at the expense of the church. Yet, in spite of all these crimes, his undaunted bravery and energy of character, together with the strange circumstances of his death, excited milder feeling toward his memory.

The following ballad, which describes the death of Don Pedro, was translated by a friend. It is quoted more than once by Cervantes in Don Quixote.

I.
Henry and King Pedro clasping,
Holding in straining arms each other;
Tugging hard, and closely grasping,
Brother proves his strength with brother.

II.
Harmless pastime, sport fraternal,
Blends not thus their limbs in strife;
Either aims, with rage infernal,
Naked dagger, sharpen'd knife.

III.
Close Don Henry grapples Pedro,
Pedro holds Don Henry strait,
Breathing, this, triumphant fury,
That, despair and mortal hate.

IV.
Sole spectator of the struggle,
Stands Don Henry's page afar,
In the chase who bore his bugle,
And who bore his sword in war.

V.
Down they go in deadly wrestle,
Down upon the earth they go,
Fierce King Pedro has the vantage,
Stout Don Henry falls below.

VI.
Marking then the fatal crisis,
Up the page of Henry ran,
By the waist he caught Don Pedro,
Aiding thus the fallen man.

VII.
"King to place, or to depose him,
Dwellth not in my desire,
But the duty which he owes him,
To his master pays the sword."

VIII.
Now Don Henry has the uppermost,
Now King Pedro lies beneath,
In his heart his brother's poniard
Instant finds its bloody sheath.

IX.
Thus with mortal gasp and quiver,
While the blood in bubbles wold,
Fleeth the hero's soul that ever
Is a Christian's bosom dwell'd.

GAMBLING AWAY A DAUGHTER.—"A few days since," says the Journal de la Meuse, "an inhabitant at Void, playing at billiards, staked the hand of his only daughter, a handsome girl of eighteen, against his adversary. The imprudent father lost, and the winner has since insisted on payment being made, claiming the young lady, fortune and all, or else a sufficient indemnity. The daughter, however, objects to the validity of the bargain, and gaming debts cannot be enforced by law."

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1841.

A CHAT WITH OUR READERS.

Many weeks have been allowed to pass since we indulged in a pleasant chat with our readers. A barbarian would think that a man's voice ought to be pretty loud to be able to reach twenty thousand people at once. But we, that guide the pen and pick up the types and drive the presses, know better; our instruments are more potent than a magician's wand—we have but to wield them, and lo! we are here and there and every where at the same moment. We now avail ourselves of this great power, numerous and gentle readers—friends, we would have said—to hold some passing converse with each and all of you.

Do you continue to like the NEW WORLD? Do our labors satisfy you? Is our taste accordant with your own? Are we sufficiently pleasing in our selections?—sufficiently various "that the mind of desultory man, studious of change and pleased with novelty, may be indulged?" If yes—we are gratified—more gratified than we can possibly express. But, if you are satisfied with what we have done, much more must you be pleased with what we are about to do.

Our arrangements in England, for the purchase and early transmission of new works, proof-sheets, &c. were never so complete as at this moment. But very few weeks will elapse before we shall give most substantial demonstrations of this fact.

By the next steam-packets, expected to reach this city and Boston on the first days of the next week, we shall receive a budget, rich and copious as the horn of Plenty itself. Its contents will be poured into the columns of the New World with all reasonable dispatch; and they will be such as to gratify the most fastidious appetite. Since the packets will now arrive at the rate of one during each week till the next winter commences, we shall give our continued stories in a regular and uninterrupted series. But we do not intend to publish over two or three of them: since a greater number would interfere with that freshness and variety which should always characterise our paper.

Our arrangements for original articles are also prolific and excellent; but our rule is never to publish one of these simply because it is original. In our choice of them, as well as of others, we are guided by their merit alone. The plan which we were the first to adopt, of giving original pulpit-discourses, will be carried out; for we believe that it is cordially approved. Those, which are given this week, are recommended no less by their intrinsic excellencies than by the solemn and absorbing nature of the subject upon which they dwell.

But let us come to the object of this parley with our many subscribers—leaving them to judge of our paper rather by its performances than its promises. Will you not lend us your aid in extending still farther our circulation throughout the country? Will you not increase our ability to make the New World more and more worthy of your encouragement and support? If you regard our efforts with favor, will you not declare your opinions in the circle of your friends and acquaintances? By a simple exertion of a kindness like this, you could confer incalculable benefits upon us—and enable us to repeat with truth and a triumphant emphasis—

"No pent-up Utica contracts our powers,
The whole unbounded continent is ours."

AN ORIGINAL PLAY FOR THE NEW WORLD.—We have the pleasure of announcing for publication in the next New World an original drama in five acts by Mrs. JAMES MOWATT of New-York. It is entitled "Gulzara, or The Persian Slave"; and we think the reader will concede that it displays dramatic and poetical abilities of no ordinary power. This drama, though never publicly represented, was performed last winter before a select circle of friends in excellent style, and with most flattering success. We do not doubt it will be eagerly sought for by the friends of our native literature. The story is extremely interesting, and the style is rich, flowing, and replete with beauties.

ORNAMENTAL GARDENING.—We are indebted, for the cuts which adorn this article, to Jesse Buel and Co., proprietors of the Cultivator, an excellent paper published at Albany at the exceedingly low price of $1 per annum. It consists entirely of original articles; each number is stereotyped, and it circulates over thirty thousand copies. It enjoys a most desirable reputation both in this country and in Europe. We hope that the article which we publish, will have the effect to awaken attention to this important subject.

FUNERAL OF PRESIDENT HARRISON.

WASHINGTON, April 7, 1841.

THE MORNING.

At sunrise, a federal salute proclaimed that this was the melancholy day appointed for solemnizing the funeral obsequies of the great and good WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON. Immediately afterward, people began to meet and cluster in the different streets; and before eight o'clock there were all the signs of preparation for an unprecedented ceremonial—the assembling of Associations and Fraternities with their banners and other insignia—the mustering of military companies—the running hither and thither of Marshals and Aids in their uniform—the crowds of persons on foot and horseback wending their way to the western part of the city, &c. In entering Pennsylvania Avenue from the Capitol and proceeding toward the President's house, no one could fail to be deeply impressed with the symbols of mourning which overhung the doorways and windows of every house. No one who has not witnessed such a spectacle can imagine its imposing solemnity.

Turning from this sight to the saddened looks of the multitudes arrayed in black, and many of them wearing srape on the arm or hat, an entire stranger might have discovered that the sympathies of a People had been awakened by the loss of a distinguished citizen, and that they were paying marks of honor to his memory by these striking observances.

As the day advanced, the windows and balconies of the houses, and every elevated site that could command a view of the funeral procession, were filled with persons of both sexes; but their countenances and deportment clearly manifested that in their minds were uppermost stronger emotions than any mere promptings of curiosity.

PRESIDENT'S SQUARE.

Here the scene was most imposing. The troops designated as the Military Escort, by the Major-General-Commander-in-Chief, were formed in line in the Avenue, north of the Executive Mansion, with its right resting opposite the western gate. They consisted of the volunteer infantry of the District—a battalion of the United States Marines—a Volunteer Squadron of Cavalry belonging to Georgetown—a Division of United States Light Artillery—and several Volunteer Companies of Infantry from Baltimore. The crowd of spectators here also was very great: and their decorous and sedate deportment was the subject of general attention and remark. In truth, manifestations of sorrow and respect pervaded the multitudes wheresoever they were congregated.

THE PRESIDENT'S HOUSE.

Was opened to ladies, and the gentlemen attending them, officers of government, the representatives of foreign states, and such other persons as were designated by the Marshal, under the orders of the Executive officers. The number was necessarily restricted, in order that the religious services might be properly performed; and those without cheerfully acquiesced with the prescribed arrangements. On entering the mansion, we saw all around the proofs that it was converted into a house of mourning. The columns and walls of the great hall were shrouded with crape; and from the arches and niches were suspended the same melancholy insignia. The East Room exhibited a similar awe, inspiring appearance. The furniture and decorations of which so much has been said—the chandeliers, and mirrors, and curtains were all covered and concealed with the symbols of mourning.

In the centre of the room the body of the departed President was placed. The coffin and pall had been altered at the suggestion of General Macomb, so as to conform to military style—both having now a border of gold lace. On the lid of the coffin were placed two swords crossed—one representing the Sword of Justice the other the Sword of State—a scroll containing the Constitution of the United States—and a wreath of laurel. The features of General Harrison had undergone no alteration since last I saw him: and the marks of decay were less than might have been expected from the virulence of his disease. At the foot of the coffin, on a table, lay the Bible and Episcopal Prayer-book, which he had been in the daily habit of using. The General purchased them himself, on the morning of the inauguration, and from that time to the day of his fatal attack he had made it his constant practice to read a portion of the scriptures every morning, as soon as he arose.

At half-past eleven o'clock the relatives and personal friends of General Harrison, who had been inmates of the Executive Mansion, entered the East Room, and as they passed along, there was not one in that large company but must have felt the deepest commiseration for their bereaved condition. Then came PRESIDENT TYLER, accompanied by the members of his Cabinet: and soon afterward, in succession, the Foreign Ministers and their suites, in full Court Costume, but wearing crape on the left arm and on the hilt of the sword—ex-President Adams—Messrs. Talmadge, Benton, Walker and Prentiss, of the Senate; Messrs. Cushing, Monroe, Wm. Cost Johnson, White, Doty, Carter, Saltenstall and others, of the House of Representatives, and numerous public functionaries, and distinguished citizens. Never was there a meeting more solemn and imposing. The occasion was well calculated to impress the high officers of State, the titled dignitaries of foreign lands, and the eminent public men there assembled; but I have not time now to write half the incidents of the day, much less to indulge in the reflections which they were fitted to excite.

The Rev. Dr. HAWLEY performed the funeral service of the Episcopal Church, and—after a brief address in which he bore his testimony to the high regard for religion which ever characterized the deceased, and expressed his confidence that he had exchanged his exalted station here for a crown of eternal glory in the mansions of the blessed—he read a portion of the scriptures from that bible which the General had made his companion and guide in discharging the high duties of his station.

After the religious services were concluded, the coffin was borne to the Funeral Car, which was so constructed as to give to the spectators a full view of the pall and coffin. It was indeed only a neat platform covered with black velvet, and placed upon wheels. It was drawn by six beautiful white horses; each attended by a groom dressed in white. The pall-bearers (one from each State and Territory) took their positions beside the car: and the Procession instantly began to move in the order prescribed in the published Programme.

THE PROCESSION.

Alas! how different this mourning array from the procession that escorted and accompanied our revered Harrison only one short month ago to the scene of his inauguration! How different the circumstances of this day from those hours of public rejoicing and exultation! Instead of the resounding cries and cheers which then filled the air, there is now silence deep and universal, as the spectators gaze upon one object, which engages all their thoughts, their senses, their affections—the body of the illustrious Patriot and Hero carried along on the funeral chariot! You may easily imagine that as the 4th of March and all its scenes of splendor and joy—where all was so full of promise and security—came over their minds, the contrast was overwhelming, and that loud sighs and burning tears attested their deep affliction.

The procession was much larger than that on the day of the inauguration. Besides those mentioned in the programme, there were several military detachments from Baltimore, fire companies, and masonic and other associations of the District. Conspicuous in the solemn train were the members of the Senate and House of Delegates of Maryland, who attended in a body, preceded by some of their officers.

On arriving at the Congressional Burying Ground, the military escort took position on an elevated site adjacent; while the pall-bearers with the corpse, preceded by the clergy and physicians, and followed by President Tyler and his Cabinet, the Ex-President, Foreign Ministers, &c., &c., entered the grave-yard. After a brief prayer, the coffin was placed in the Receiving-Tomb—the usual military honors were paid by the troops with musketry and artillery, and the immense assemblage, bidding a last sad adieu to the remains of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, formed again into line, and returned in the same order in which they had preceded to the grave.

Thus ended these melancholy rites. Excuse this hasty and incomplete narrative. After the scenes of such a day, I am in no condition to describe them with the pathos or power which they demand.

WASHINGTON, April 10, 1841.

The absorbing topic is the Address of President TYLER, setting forth the principles which will govern the general course of the Administration. The Whigs receive it as a sterling Whig document; and the opposition, especially the Globe clique, cannot fail to see that it puts down all the imaginings and hopes of the new Chief Magistrate's being other than a Whig. One thing it shows most clearly—a perfect identity of opinion with General Harrison as to the nature of our system, and the principles of free government. Of the specific measures also which are suggested and commended by Mr. Tyler, some had been adopted under the administration of General Harrison, and all would unquestionably have received his approval. It is worthy of remark here that so early as 1816, General Harrison and Mr. Tyler were members of the House of Representatives together; and there commenced a friendship which continued until the General's death. On several important questions, involving the leading principles of government, and the great distinctions of parties, they concurred in opinion and acted together.

The passages of the Address which have excited most attention, are those relating to the Revenue, the Currency, and the Custody of the Public Funds. Mr. Tyler is clearly opposed to those temporary expedients for supplying the actual wants of the Government which have been resorted to of late years. He is manifestly against Treasury Notes, and in favor of imposing such duties on imported articles as will be sufficient to make up an adequate revenue. He is for restoring the public revenues to their accustomed course; today; that is, placing them under the control of Congress; and with a view to it, he desires the repeal of the Sub-Treasury, a system "unwise, impolitic, and highly oppressive," in his opinion. He says:

"I shall promptly give my sanction to any Constitutional measure which, originating in Congress, should have for its object the restoration of a sound circulating medium, so essentially necessary to give confidence in all the transactions of life, to secure to industry its just and adequate rewards, and to reestablish the public prosperity. In deciding upon the adaptation of any such measure to the end proposed, as well as its conformity to the Constitution, I shall resort to the Fathers of the great Republican School for advice and instruction, to be drawn from their sage views of our system of government, and the light of their ever-glorious example."

This is full of meaning; and it appears to mean that if Congress will "originate" a National Bank, in order to restore a sound circulating medium, and to produce the desirable effects on the credit and confidence, and on the industry and prosperity of the country; and if the powers given to the Bank are deemed "proper and necessary," Mr. Tyler will hold such a Bank to be constitutional, as Mr. Madison did under similar circumstances. More of this anon.

The President still occupies his lodgings at Brown's Hotel; but it is expected that he will remove to the Executive Mansion on Monday. The family of General Harrison intended to leave to-day: but they may be detained for several days yet, as the two grandsons of the General are suffering from indisposition. Mr. Tyler has very kindly renewed his invitation that they should be his guests so long as they may find it convenient to remain. They intend to spend some time in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and will not go to the West till the middle of May.

The body of Gen. Harrison will remain here for the present; and until the wishes of his widow and son at North Bend are known. His nephew, Benjamin Harrison, is extremely solicitous that the remains of this the most illustrious member of the family should be entombed at Berkeley, Virginia, the old family seat, where Benjamin H. now lives. The people of this District are equally anxious that he should repose here where he died, and hope that a suitable monument will be erected to his memory. It is likely, however, that his bereaved widow and other relatives in Ohio will insist on burying him at North Bend. On the farm there is an elevated spot of peculiar beauty, commanding a view up and down "la belle riviere" the Ohio, of seven or eight miles, which Col. Todd has designated for the place of his grave. Should Congress erect a monument to his honor, the voyager would descry it rising up amidst beautiful scenery at a great distance, and think with emotion of his triumphs and his fate.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1841.

Yesterday (being Sabbath) new honors were paid to the memory of the late President, in all the churches of the metropolis. It was the day for administering the sacrament in many of them: and the addresses on the solemnity and importance of the sacred communion were well mingled with allusions to him, who professed such a reverence for all the observances of religion, and whose pathway to the grave was smoothed and illumined by its consolations. The pulpits and desks of most of them were shrouded in mourning. Some of the discourses were peculiarly eloquent. In the evening, the Rev. Mr. Van Rensselaer, of Albany, a son of the Patroon, preached a most interesting sermon on the occasion in the First Presbyterian Church, of which the ladies of General Harrison's family were members. President Tyler and his sons, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Post Master General, and Attorney General were present. So also were the male relatives of the deceased now in the city, and a large assembly of auditors.

Many interesting incidents in the life of Gen. Harrison, illustrative of his private and public virtues, were recounted; and the narrative of the last hours and closing scenes of his career melted all hearts, and drew tears of sympathy and regret.

Besides other things, it was mentioned that the General had enjoyed the advantages of a religious education from a most pious mother. During his recent visit to the spot of his birth, and the old family mansion in Virginia, he delighted to show his friends "his mother's room," the closet to which she used to retire for her devotions, and the very corner where she used to sit reading her Bible, and where she taught him in childhood to pray to God on his knees. The impressions there made on his young mind never were effaced; and for the last twenty years he has never retired to rest without reading a portion of the Holy Scriptures.

General Harrison was very much surprised to find that there was not a Bible in the President's House. He declared that it ought to constitute a part of the furniture; and said that out of the first appropriation made for the Executive Mansion he would cause to be purchased the best copy that could be procured, and to be written in it "To the President of the United States, from the People of the United States." His reverence for the Sabbath was indicated by his constant attendance on Divine worship, and his withdrawing from all secular employment and cares to the retirement of his own chamber for religious study or meditation, or to the quiet of his domestic circle. On the Sabbath after his inauguration many of his political friends called to pay their respects to him as usual. He said to his family that he disliked this exceedingly, and that "Sunday visiting must be broken up." The next Sunday, some of the foreign ministers called, and he was denied to them. The same evening some of his political friends came in. He could not disguise his annoyance at their general discourse, and very soon made an apology for taking leave of them, saying—"Gentlemen, I shall be most happy to see you at all times, except on Sunday."

I have mentioned these little incidents because I believe that, amid the general mourning, they will be interesting and consoling to his religious friends in every quarter of the Union.

The Cabinet continue to have daily consultations with the President at his lodgings, Brown's Hotel, for he has not yet taken possession of the White House. The utmost harmony prevails among them. But few appointments have yet been announced. Indeed the Secretaries have been up to this time chiefly engaged in reporting to the new President the state of the business in the different departments.

It is inferred that President Tyler will invoke the action of Congress on the subject of the currency; but will leave it to the Legislative authority to "originate" a measure for "the restoration of a sound circulating medium." It is believed that should a National Bank be deemed by Congress necessary and proper to accomplish that object, he will not refuse his sanction to the act of the People's representatives. Read over his remarks on the subject, and the sentence referring to the "fathers of the republican school," and then ponder on the following extract from the Message of President Madison, December, 1816:

"For the interests of the community, at large, as well as the purposes of the Treasury, it is essential that the Nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit, and use, wherever it may circulate. The Constitution has entrusted Congress, exclusively, with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description; and the measures which were taken, at the last session, in execution of the power, give every promise of success. The BANK OF THE UNITED STATES has been organized under auspices the most favorable, and cannot fail to be an important auxiliary to those measures."

It would not be wonderful if President Tyler had in his mind these and other passages of Madison. There is certainly a remarkable identity of thought and opinion between his Address and the avowed principles of that illustrious man. The country will rejoice to find the new President taking him for a model. Loco Focoism may clamor at the spectacle of another Virginia President doing for the country what Washington, Madison and Monroe sanctioned; but a country restored to prosperity will applaud the act, and his name will be handed down to posterity encircled with the highest approbation, and the best honors which freemen can bestow.

WASHINGTON, April 13, 1841.

The official recommendation of President TYLER, that a day be consecrated by the whole of the people of the United States to religious observances, on account of the late National bereavement, gives unmingled satisfaction to the best men of all parties in this quarter; and I doubt not will be cordially responded to and complied with by all good citizens. It is an impressive thought that, on the day designated, the people of our wide-spread Union, of every class and condition, and every religious creed, will be joining, with one accord, in recognising the righteous administration of the Almighty, in submitting humbly to his dispensations, and imploring a continuance of the Divine benignity to our government and country. It will be noticed that the official paper suggesting this universal observance of the day bears the simple title of "A RECOMMENDATION." It is to be hoped Mr. Calhoun and others of his school will not think the measure unconstitutional!

The President will not take possession of the Executive mansion, until Friday next, when Col. Copeland, the nephew of the General, Mrs. Harrison, and the other ladies propose to leave. Their departure has been delayed by the sickness of the young lady, the General's grandsons. I am happy to learn that the Secretary of War intends to place both of them in the Military Academy, West Point, as soon as they arrive at the age required by the regulations of the Department. They are both sprightly, active, promising little fellows. One of them is also a grandson of General PIKE, his mother being the only child of that distinguished hero. For this boy the late President always manifested the deepest concern and affection; and in connection with him the following anecdote, illustrating the good nature which marked the social intercourse between Mr. Van Buren and General Harrison during his sojourn here, before the Inauguration, may be interesting.

Toward the close of their first interview which had been conducted with much good humor on the part of Mr. Van Buren, and by more than his usual vivacity and pleasantry on the part of General Harrison, the latter said, "I have a favor to ask of you, Mr. President—it is to place the 'grandson of my old friend, General Pike, at West Point. He is heir to nothing but his grandfather's sword. He is "my grandson, too, and as I have never conferred any appointment on a relative, I wish you to do it for me." Mr. Van Buren promptly replied that it would give him pleasure to have an opportunity of sending the young gentleman to the Academy. But, it was afterwards ascertained, that he wanted a few months of being of the proper age. So the plan was frustrated. The public will be gratified to learn that Mr. Secretary Bell will carry out the wishes of the departed patriot in this respect.

Cels. Chambers and Todd, the faithful aids of the General have left the city.

The ladies of the new President's family are expected to arrive here in the course of next week. The wife of the President is in rather delicate health; but, in presiding at the White House, she will be assisted by her daughter, Mrs. Jones, of Virginia, and Mrs. Tyler, jun., (formerly Miss Cooper, a daughter of the celebrated tragedian.) There is also an unmarried daughter, who, if half be true which fame reports of her personal attractions, will be a brilliant addition to the young and lovely portion of Washington society. Mr. John Tyler, Jun., (the second son,) will be the President's private Secretary.

At present the Cabinet meetings are held at the State Department, in the Secretary's private chambers.

President Tyler has adopted a system which enables him to get through a great deal of business every day. He receives his fellow-citizens two hours every morning, (from ten to twelve.) After that, he takes the command of his time for Cabinet consultations, official and private business, and such appointed engagements as he may think fit to make with his personal or political friends.

FLOWERS.

It must be a satisfaction to everybody to know that the flowers are coming in—and to a great many people, who have been nearly converted into mould for future growths of flowers by the severity of the past winter, the satisfaction must be especially grateful. We are by no means covetous of long life; but an abiding sense of the many delights with which life is fraught tempts us to think that we ought to live as long as we can. We mean all this in its most pleasurable interpretation; for in no other point of view does the love of life seem to us either reasonable or philosophical.

The charming thoughts that are associated with flowers, with their shapes, colors, and fragrance—their poetical uses—their seasons and successions—and all that has been said about them by bookmen and lovers, lie so close at hand, and are so familiar in the aggregate to the world at large, that, like most familiar things, they are generally treated with neglect. People don't care about flowers, because they have them growing luxuriantly under their eyes, and because one crop of blossoms is no sooner wasted in the air than another crop comes out, and because, in fact, do what you will, you cannot exhaust the flowers, which are endowed with a perpetual vitality, and which without any artificial help, even against all sorts of unneighborly difficulties, will grow and grow, and flourish, and throw off their perfumes as if it were designed in the scheme of the creation to show the principle of immortality throughout the minutest works of nature.

But with all our indifference—more apparent than real every human being loves flowers. Here is a bunch of freshly-cropped violets. Not to say one word about their delicate and most exquisite aroma, it is impossible to look into their deep cups without being struck by the image of loveliness, retreating and blushing and trying to hide itself within its darkly brilliant folds, which they present palpably to the imagination. Well, we no sooner get this idea into our heads, than we begin to recollect what has been said about violets—what SHAKESPEARE said about them—what beautiful and passionate pictures have been drawn by poets concerning them—and what loveable spots they nestle in in the poetry of all ages and languages. In a moment of time we are thus carried away into a boundless region of contemplations, and the chances are a hundred to one that, if we have only patience enough to dream out our dream, we shall have traversed a more expanded surface of delightful associations over this little bunch of violets that we should care to do in the noblest library in the world.

Books are great and glorious agents of civilization and happiness. They are the silent teachers of mankind, filling the mind with wisdom, and strengthening the understanding for the strife of action; making us powerful and gentle, wise and humble, at the same time. But we cannot be always buried in our books; we must go out into the sunshine; and it is necessary, in order to enjoy our books, that we should also enjoy the privilege of air and light, drinking in health and vigor, to enable us to make the best and most profitable use of our sedentary hours. In direct opposition, then, to books, or rather in secret combination with them, we would place flowers—the out-of-door books Nature has so liberally provided for us in such a rich variety of types and bindings, as to leave no excuse for not gratifying all our individual tastes. The lover of flowers has this advantage over the lover of books, that he never can be at a loss or variety; but we suspect the classification is somewhat arbitrary, and that there is hardly any one who loves the one who does not also love the other. The best way to enjoy either is to enjoy both; to take them alternately, so that they may relieve and show each other off to the best advantage. A walk in an open field, and one hour spent in gathering wild flowers, to be afterwards grouped into a vase upon the library table, is by no means the least suggestive preparation for a morning's reading.

When you say that such a person is very fond of books, you mean that he is a constant student; but you imply no more. He may be fond of profound books or flimsy books; and it is of the last importance that you should be more explicit in your description, if you would have your friend obtain any credit for a taste above the dismal round of the circulating library. But when you say that such a person is fond of flowers, it is impossible to mistake your meaning. There is no room for misconception as to what is meant by a love of flowers. You need not be a floriculturist to be fond of flowers—you need not have any knowledge of botanical names, or vegetable physiology; but it is indispensable that you should have a soul and a heart for beauty and the sensible glories of the green and bounteous earth. To love flowers, is to love nature. What may not the love of nature do for man, when all other avenues to his feelings are locked up by selfishness, or care, or worldly influences? Let him but cherish this fertile corner in his affections—fertile in hope and goodness—and we need not despair of the darkest-natured of our race. He can be reached in this one point of sympathy, when all other appeals have failed. He is vulnerable here, if the rest of his organization be as a sheet of mail.

Hence, flowers occupy a space in the consideration of worldly happiness, much greater than we might suspect at the first blush. They belong to the sunshine and the productive soil—to the light—to the winds—to the pathways, and the banks of the streams—to the skies, whose tints they reflect, and into whose radiant depths they ultimately fade and above all they belong to us by right of birth and possession, and the loving nurture of our hands and eyes, and our scientific discoveries, which have taught us how to make perpetual summer, and to inspire the roots of sweet flowering things with additional springs of propagation. And these same flowers, which are so beautiful in themselves, so lusty in the fragrance that pours through their delicate leaves, and so fragile to the touch, live where we cannot live, and by means unknown to us. On the loftiest mountains, inaccessible to the foot of man, they leap into the clouds; in the depths of the ocean, where we cannot see them, they blossom and flourish; on naked rocks where there is not a particle of dust to take root in, they burst into bloom, and even amid eternal snows they clamber and work their way into the frosted air, where we find it difficult to sustain life, reproaching us by the hardness with which their slight tendrils sprinkle their buds abroad. There is a river in Russia—the name of which we happen to forget—which in the wintry season is one mass of ice, yet its banks are covered with roses, of which it seems there is a constant succession. All flowers, should be to us what these roses are to the icy stream—suggestions of health and beauty, reminiscences of the summer time, and hopeful contrasts between the morbid intervals of life and its vitality. Flowers are always on the sunny side of things, and we too should keep there as much as we can.

THE UNITED STATES BANK REPORT, which has been recently published has fallen like a bombshell among the people. It is a most able exposition of a most stupendous fraud—a fraud, the disgrace of which is illimitable; and the consequences of which will extend throughout the land and continue to operate even after "this generation shall have passed away."

The Bank of the United States, for a number of years, stood before the people in the relation of a public debt—a government security—a permanent, solid fund—where the widow and the orphan, the aged and infirm, might safely invest their all and rely on an income that was beyond contingency. As a natural consequence, this class of the community to the number of thousands placed their sole means of living in the hands of the President and Directors of this Bank. When the institution was re-chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, (the name of the old Bank having been retained,) the stock-holders made no change of their property; for they considered it to be better where it was than it could be by any change.

And now, what is the result of their unsuspecting confidence? Simply this: they are reduced to beggary. Their sole property has depreciated from 120 to 20 dollars a share—they receive no income from it—and they have no means whatever of supporting themselves. Nor is this all. The credit of our whole banking system—that system on which the well-being of our country must for years depend—is shaken: for the people may well say, if the United States Bank has been ruined by fraud, what bank can be safe? And they may add, if Mr. Biddle—whose character and personal popularity, in 1837, were pre-eminent among all the distinguished men in the land—if he has proved himself dishonest, who can be trusted?

We do not, by this latter query, mean to imply that Mr. Biddle is alone responsible for the infamous mismanagement of the Bank—but he is chiefly responsible, nevertheless. His control over the affairs of the institution was nearly (if not quite) absolute; he of course ordered or knew all that was done; he publicly stated, when he resigned the Presidency, in March, 1839, that the Bank was "in a highly prosperous condition"—yet, within fifteen months from this declaration, the Bank was found to be hopelessly broken. It is idle for him to pretend that in fifteen months a Bank with $35,000,000 capital could fall from prosperity to ruin; even if the report of the Committee did not—as it does—demonstrate that the work of corruption commenced long before.

With the exception of some $330,000 paid to Mr. Jaudon for three years' services as agent for the Bank in London, the principal losses seem to have occurred by means of large loans to irresponsible individuals without adequate security, and without any record of the transactions on the books of the institution! And we should like to know how far such loans differ from direct robbery? The law discriminates between the two cases, it is true: the more is the pity! but what is the difference, morally? We can see none.

Mitchell—whom, in comparison with these stupendous rogues, we may well term the unfortunate—defrauded some of his fellow men to an aggregate amount of $4000 or $5000; and he is (justly, we admit) branded as a scoundrel, pursued as a fugitive, and, if caught, will be punished as a swindler. But what is his crime in comparison with that of the President and Directors of the U. States Bank?—In its consequences, it is nothing in comparison: in its moral turpitude, it is nothing: but in its legal criminality it is everything! And this, in an enlightened community, is called justice!

The great—the wholesale villain—sins with impunity; but the minor rascal suffers the penalty of the law: or, in the words of King Lear:

"Through tattered clothes small vices do appear;
Robes and furred gowns hide all! Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
Arm it in rage, a pigmy straw doth pierce it."

We have seen nothing urged in Mr. Biddle's defence but his own letter in which he speaks of it as the first letter of a series explanatory of his dealings with and for the Bank. We do not know how far the series is likely to extend, but we think it will take a great many such letters to clear his skirts. This one is quite too strong: it shows too much: it makes his case too good. He says, among other things, that the Bank claimed from him $321,000, of which sum he did not owe it a farthing: and, so far, the story is very good. But, unfortunately, he proceeds to say that as the directors were importunate—rather troublesome—in their demands, he just paid "the trifle," to get rid of them. This was liberal. As we have just before suggested, it was too liberal. It looks suspicious, such liberality. However, when we come to look at the Report, and see how this small sum was paid, our admiration at Mr. Biddle's liberality is considerably diminished. If the reader will refer to the Report he will see that the payment was made in Texas Bonds, at par—which we think will remind him of the story about the man who sold his dog for $100, and took two pups for pay, at $50 a-piece. This, however, is treating with levity a matter that should be considered in all seriousness.

It is a burning disgrace to our country that such stupendous rascality as this should go unpunished; and the disgrace is aggravated by the fact that this last Bank fraud—though indeed the largest of all—is only one of a series that for twenty or thirty years past have periodically spread ruin and alarm through the community.

As our laws now stand and are now administered, there is little hope of amendment through their instrumentality; but public opinion has some force left, and to that we appeal. We beg that these men may be shunned by gentlemen, and "cut" in all decent society. Let a mark be put upon them, by which honest and respectable men will know how to avoid them. We are rejoiced to hear that this course has been adopted toward Mr. Biddle in Philadelphia; and we do earnestly hope that both he and his associates in guilt will receive the same moral excommunication from respectable people in all parts of the country.

PRESIDENT TYLER'S POSITION.—Opinions seem to differ very widely as to the course that will be pursued, and as to the political principles entertained—by our new President. For our own part, we attach very little importance to the various speculations afloat, in which we believe the office seekers are as much interested as is the country: but our attention has recently been called to some of the President's Constitutional opinions, which satisfy us that he is an able and an honest man—and beyond these two qualifications we have no interest to inquire.

While he—as the Hon. John Tyler—was in the United States Senate, in 1834, he was instructed by the Legislature of Virginia to vote for the famous Expunging Resolution. In reply to this instruction, he resigned his seat as Senator, and the letter containing his resignation concludes in the following manly and eloquent terms:

"I dare not touch the Journal of the Senate. The Conj stitution forbids it. In the midst of all the agitation of party, I have heretofore stood by that sacred instrument. It is the only post of honor and of safety. Parties are continually changing. The men of to-day give place to the men of to-morrow; and the idols which one set worship, the next destroy. The only object of my political worship shall be the Constitution of my country. I will not be the instrument to overthrow it. A seat in the Senate is sufficiently elevated to fill the measure of any man's ambition, and, as an evidence of the sincerity of my convictions that your resolutions cannot be executed without violating my oath, I resign into your hands three unexpired years of my term. I shall carry with me into retirement the principles which I brought with me into public life; and by the sur-render of the high station to which I was called by the voice of the people of Virginia, I shall set an example to my children which shall teach them to regard as nothing place and office, when either attained or held by the sacrifice of honor. I am, gentlemen, your fellow citizen,

JOHN TYLER.

These sentiments and this language may well reconcile Americans to the present administration; and although we disclaim both Van Burenism and Whiggism as such, we feel very well disposed toward adopting Tylerism as our rule of action in politics. The man who supports the Constitution is our man, by what name soever he happens to be known.

83- The President's Secretary is J. Tyler, Jr. The name of his lady was Miss Priscilla Cooper. She is the daughter of Cooper the Tragedian; of whom, while treading the boards in his glory and his pride, it was finely said

"Cooper, the noblest Roman of them all."

This lady is, it seems, to reign at the White House. The Globe calls her "a most accomplished, refined, and amiable woman." To this praise we can cordially subscribe. The duties which she is destined to perform could not be committed to one more worthy to adorn and dignify so lofty a situation. Mild and patient in adversity, she will be gentle and kind in prosperity.

Miss Cooper was for a short time on the stage. She trod the boards, however, in mere obedience to her father's will, and from a deep, filial sense of obligation to his wishes. The profession of an actress was ever repugnant to her feelings, and her sensitive nature shrank from the rude necessities of a profession, the honors of which she neither hoped nor sought to win. We remember to have seen her performance of Virginia in Boston, some years ago, for her father's benefit. It was not acting: it was chaste and beautiful reading—an exhibition of tender, womanly emotion—a striving after a certain aim; and that aim was to gratify and aid her father. She evidently labored under the most painful embarrassment, and it was with difficulty she sustained her rôle. In the dress-circle were many of her close personal friends; for, though an actress, she moved in the best circles of the city, and was caressed by the most refined of her sex. She was upheld through all the performance by the encouragement of her friends; but each one heaved a sigh of relief when the tragedy was ended. At this time many sympathies and cordial friendships were extended to Miss Cooper.

84- THE FUNERAL PROCESSION on Saturday of last week was a novel and imposing spectacle, and the various preparations and accessories throughout the city were most happily in keeping with it. The various bells were tolled in a continuous peal from and after twelve o'clock; at all prominent points the national flag was displayed at half-mast, the shops and places of amusement were closed, and the streets, through which the procession passed, were hung with mourning draperies.

The procession itself was all that could be desired—saving some items of mismanagement, which seem to be inseparable from the arrangements on great occasions. The hour appointed for the moving of the procession (12 o'clock) was rather late, considering how much was to be done afterward; and, as usual, nearly two hours of delay ensued before the march began: consequently it was not finished until after five o'clock, and then the lateness of the hour compelled the Committee to postpone all the concluding ceremonies of the programme. Unfortunately, too, about the time that the proceedings might have been terminated, had a proper hour been selected and punctually observed, a storm of sleet and snow set in, which rendered everybody uncomfortable, and compelled great numbers to quit the procession during its march. The appearance of the military was respectable, merely. With the exception of the U. S. Soldiers, and a few companies of infantry, all marched badly, and the troops bore their arms without any reference to uniformity—some were at a "support," some "slope," some "trail," and some "carry," all at the same time, and all within the compass of a dozen platoons.

Nevertheless, taken as a whole, the celebration was worthy of the occasion, and both are likely to be long remembered by our citizens.

THE SNOW STORM.—It is a fact worthy of being put on record that on the morning of the 13th of April, 1841, the snow lay in the streets of New-York from ten to twelve inches deep on a level! It is the first time we have ever seen our citizens crowding to the polls (either in Spring or Fall) through snow-covered streets.

85- MR. TYLER'S ADDRESS to the American people is a calm document,—evidently the production of a high-minded and unselfish man. He uses, as we saw with a smile, General Jackson's famous expression, "my Administration." The verb "to ultimate" is a most decided Americanism; but we do not feel disposed to quarrel with this or with any other demonstrations of the country of his birth, which Mr. Tyler may see fit to make. Indeed, we are rejoiced to find, from an examination of his public career, from his writings and speeches, and from the general testimony of those who know him best, that he is thoroughly American in all his inclinations and sentiments. The Richmond Enquirer would have him a Virginian and nothing but a Virginian. But he rises superior to sectional attachment and sectional principles, and, in this address, he shows that he means to be the President of the people.

It is evident enough to us that Mr. Tyler will not refuse his sanction to a National Bank, should Congress determine that such an institution is necessary to a proper and permanent regulation of the currency. On this point, most anxiety was felt by the Whigs: the language of this address, though somewhat guarded and susceptible of various interpretation, is yet sufficiently explicit to allay any apprehensions resulting from the President's former opinions on this subject. It has been stated that he was opposed to a recharter of the United States Bank. This might well be and yet be perfectly consistent with friendliness towards the project of a new National Bank. It will be remembered that President Jackson himself told Congress in one of his messages, that he would propose to them a plan for a Government Bank, that would have all the excellencies of the old one without any of its acknowledged defects. The Richmond Enquirer says that it is confidently asserted by the Whigs that President Tyler has declared his conviction of the necessity of a National Institution. There is no manner of doubt that the Sub-Treasury scheme has his unqualified reprobation.

The party, which elected Mr. Tyler, cannot fail to be gratified with this document. It is right that it should be promulgated. It is, on the whole, quite satisfactory, and marks out very well the ground that the President means to travel over, though it may not, as exactly as Mr. Calhoun would like, "define his position."

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FELLOW CITIZENS:

Before my arrival at the seat of Government the painful communication was made to you by the officers presiding over the several Departments, of the deeply regretted death of William Henry Harrison, late President of the United States. Upon him you had conferred your suffrages, for the first office in your gift, and had selected him as your chosen instrument to correct and reform all such errors and abuses as had manifested themselves from time to time in the practical operation of the Government.

While standing at the threshold of this great work, he has, by the dispensation of an all-wise Providence, been removed from among us, and by the provisions of the Constitution the efforts to be directed to the accomplishing of this vitally important task have devolved upon myself. This same occurrence has subjected the wisdom and sufficiency of our institutions to a new test. For the first time in our history the person elected to the Vice Presidency of the United States, by the happening of a contingency provided for in the Constitution, has had devolved upon him the Presidential office. The spirit of faction, which is directly opposed to the spirit of a lofty patriotism, may find in this occasion for assaults upon my administration. And in succeeding, under circumstances so sudden and unexpected, and to responsibilities so greatly augmented, to the administration of public affairs, I shall place in the intelligence and patriotism of the people my only sure reliance. My earnest prayer shall be constantly addressed to the all-wise and all-powerful Being who made me, and by whose dispensation I am called to the high office of President of this Confederacy, understandingly to carry out the principles of that Constitution which I have sworn "to protect, preserve and defend."

The usual opportunity which is afforded to a Chief Magistrate upon his induction to office of presenting to his countrymen an exposition of the policy which would guide his administration, in the form of an inaugural address, not having, under the peculiar circumstances which have brought me to the discharge of the high duties of President of the United States, been afforded to me, a brief exposition of the principles which will govern me in the general course of my administration of public affairs would seem to be due as well to myself as to you. In regard to foreign nations, the ground work of my policy will be justice on our part to all, submitting to injustice from none. While I shall sedulously cultivate the relations of peace and amity with one and all, it will be my most imperative duty to see that the honor of the country shall sustain no blemish. With a view to this, the condition of our military defences will become a matter of anxious solicitude. The Army, which has in other days covered itself with renown, and the Navy, not inappropriately termed the right arm of the public defence, which has spread a light of glory over the American standard in all the waters of the earth, should be rendered replete with efficiency.

In view of the fact, well avouched by history, that the tendency of all human institutions is to concentrate power in the hands of a single man, and that their ultimate downfall has proceeded from this cause, I deem it of the most essential importance that a complete separation should take place between the sword and the purse. No matter where or how the public moneys shall be deposited, so long as the President can exert the power of appointing and removing at his pleasure, the agents selected for their custody, the Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy is in fact the Treasurer. A permanent and radical change should therefore be decreed. The patronage incident to the Presidential office, already great, is constantly increasing. Such increase is destined to keep pace with the growth of our population, until, without a figure of speech, an army of officeholders may be spread over the land. The unrestrained power exerted by a selfishly ambitious man, in order either to perpetuate his authority or to hand it over to some favorite as his successor, may lead to the employment of all the means within his control to accomplish his object. The right to remove from office, while subjected to no just restraint, is inevitably destined to produce a spirit of cringing servility with the official corps, which, in order to uphold the hand which feeds them, would lead to direct and active interference in the elections, both State and Federal, thereby subjecting the course of State legislation to the dictation of the Chief Executive Officer, and making the will of that officer absolute and supreme. I will, at a proper time, invoke the action of Congress upon this subject, and shall readily acquiesce in the adoption of all proper measures which are calculated to arrest these evils, so full of danger in their tendency. I will remove no incumbent from office who has faithfully and honestly acquitted himself of the duties of his office, except in such cases where such officer has been guilty of an active partizanship, or by secret means—the less manly, and therefore the more objectionable—has given his official influence to the purposes of party, thereby bringing the patronage of the Government in conflict with the freedom of elections. Numerous removals may become necessary under this rule. These will be made by me through no acerbity of feeling. I have had no cause to cherish or indulge unkind feelings toward any, but my conduct will be regulated by a profound sense of what is due to the country and its institutions: not shall I neglect to apply the same unbending rule to those of my own appointment. Freedom of opinion will be tolerated, the full enjoyment of the right of suffrage will be maintained as the birthright of every American citizen, but I say emphatically to the official corps, "thus far and no farther." I have dwelt the longer upon this subject, because removals from office are likely often to arise, and I would have my countrymen to understand the principle of the Executive action.

In all public expenditures the most rigid economy should be resorted to, and, as one of its results, a public debt in time of peace be sedulously avoided. A wise and patriotic constituency will never object to the imposition of necessary burdens for useful ends; and true wisdom dictates the resort to such means, in order to supply deficiencies in the revenue rather than to those doubtful expedients, which, ultimating in a public debt, serve to embarrass the resources of the country and to lessen its ability to meet any great emergency which may arise. All sinecures should be abolished. The appropriations should be direct and explicit, so as to leave as limited a share of discretion to the disbursing agents as may be found compatible with the public service. A strict responsibility on the part of all the agents of the Government should be maintained, and speculation or defalcation visited with immediate expulsion from office and the most condign punishment.

The public interest also demands that, if any war has existed between the Government and the currency, it shall cease. Measures of a financial character, now having the sanction of legal enactment, shall be faithfully enforced until repealed by the legislative authority. But I owe it to myself to declare that I regard existing enactments as unwise and impolitic, and in a high degree oppressive. I shall promptly give my sanction to any constitutional measure which, originating in Congress, shall have for its object the restoration of a sound circulating medium, so essentially necessary to give confidence in all the transactions of life, to secure to industry its just and adequate rewards, and to re-establish the public prosperity. In deciding upon the adaptation of any such measure to the end proposed, as well as its conformity to the Constitution, I shall resort to the Fathers of the great Republican school for advice and instruction, to be drawn from their sage views of our system of Government, and the light of their ever glorious example.

The institutions under which we live, my countrymen, secure each person in the perfect enjoyment of all his rights. The spectacle is exhibited to the world of a government deriving its powers from the consent of the governed, and having imparted to it only so much power as is necessary for its successful operation. Those who are charged with its administration should carefully abstain from all attempts to enlarge the range of powers thus granted to the several departments of government, other than by an appeal to the people for additional grants, lest by so doing they disturb that balance which the patriots and statesmen who framed the Constitution designed to establish between the Federal Government and the States composing the Union. The observance of these rules is enjoined upon us by that feeling of reverence and affection which finds a place in the heart of every patriot for the preservation of union and the blessings of union—for the good of our children and our children's children, through countless generations. An opposite course could not fail to generate factions, intent upon the gratification of their selfish ends; to give birth to local and sectional jealousies, and to ultimate either in breaking asunder the bonds of union, or in building up a central system, which would inevitably end in a bloody sceptre and an iron crown.

In conclusion, I beg you to be assured that I shall exert myself to carry the foregoing principles into practice during my administration of the Government, and, confiding in the protecting care of an ever-watchful and overruling Providence, it shall be my first and highest duty to preserve unimpaired the free institutions under which we live, and transmit them to those who shall succeed me in their full force and vigor.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, April 9, 1841.

86- The Banks in Richmond, Va., by mutual agreement, voluntarily suspended specie payments on Tuesday last. This course was, to our minds, perfectly proper and consistent with sound policy. It is folly for the banks in such a city, out of ultra notions on the subject of "honor and good faith," to maintain specie payments when all the country around them is in a state of suspension.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Officers of the Customs.

Collectors.—James Perrine, Mobile, Alabama, in the place of John B. Hogan.

Edward Brooks, Detroit, Michigan, in the place of John McDonell.

Jonathan Roberts, Philadelphia, vice Calvin Blythe.

Surveyor.—J. Washington Tyson, Philadelphia, in the place of George W. Ritter.

Naval Officer.—Bela Badger, Philadelphia, in the place of John Horn.

A Portuguese slave was lately carried into Rio Janeiro by the British brig of war Tower. She had 380 slaves on board, and had lost 140 on the passage.

THE CANALS.—Official notice has been given that the Canals of this State will be opened for navigation on the 24th inst.

The remains of Mrs. Montgomery, who was recently killed by the Indians in Florida, have been removed by the father of that unfortunate young lady, and borne to the grave with appropriate funeral solemnities, at Cincinnati, a few days since. She was the wife of Lieutenant Montgomery, of the Army, and had been married but a very short time before her death.

The Governor of Alabama has summoned the Legislature of that State to meet in Special Session on the third Monday in April, "for the purpose of providing by law for the election of Members to represent Alabama in the next Congress."

FATAL ACCIDENT.—A most distressing accident occurred in this city on Saturday last. Col. John Means, the keeper of a lively stable, accompanied by Samuel, the second son of Mr. Wm. H. Douglass, merchant, had driven a buggy and two horses into the river, at the upper end of Mulberry street, for the purpose of watering the horses and cleaning the carriage, when it is supposed the horses took fright and ran off into the current. Col. Means sprang out to catch the horses, but after struggling with them for some time, received a blow from one of them in the back part of the head, when he immediately sunk. The youth who was in company with him was also drowned in his attempt to swim to the shore. The most strenuous exertions were made by some of the citizens who had assembled, and both the bodies were found in a short time, but all attempts at resuscitation proved ineffectual.—[Chillicothe Advertiser.]

A RECOMMENDATION.

When a Christian People feel themselves to be overtaken by a great public calamity, it becomes them to humble themselves under the dispensation of Divine Providence, to recognise His righteous government over the children of men, to acknowledge His goodness in time past, as well as their own unworthiness, and to supplicate His merciful protection for the future.

The death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late President of the United States, so soon after his elevation to that high office, is a bereavement peculiarly calculated to be regarded as a heavy affliction, and to impress all minds with a sense of the uncertainty of human things, and of the dependence of Nations, as well as of individuals, upon our Heavenly Parent.

I have thought, therefore, that I should be acting in conformity with the general expectation and feelings of the community in recommending, as I now do, to the People of the United States, of every religious denomination, that, according to their several modes and forms of worship, they observe a day of Fasting and Prayer, by such religious services as may be suitable on the occasion; and I recommend Friday, the fourteenth day of May next, for that purpose; to the end that, on that day, we may all, with one accord, join in humble and reverential approach to HIM, in whose hands we are, invoking him to inspire us with a proper spirit and temper of heart and mind under these frowns of His Providence, and still to bestow His gracious benedictions upon our Government and our country.

PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES.—Sixth edition, revised and corrected.—The engravings and contents of this book are so numerous and various, that we can do no more than give it a very general notice. Indeed, the title page describes the work with an accuracy which supercedes the necessity of an extended notice from our pen. Want of room will allow us to do little more than commend it to the patronage of our readers, a task which we cheerfully perform. No book of its size and price, ($2) with which we are acquainted, possesses so much real intrinsic merit; amusement and instruction are both combined. It happily combines these two attractions, and all persons must be pleased and edified by a careful perusal of its pages. It is strictly illustrative of the Scriptures, viz.:—Engravings of the manners and customs of the East; Oriental Cities and Ancient Ruins; Antiquities, curiosities, trees, plants, &c. mentioned in the Bible. Many of these pictorial illustrations are beautifully engraved, and describe, with a surprising accuracy, the present condition of the cities alluded to in the sacred volume, and leave an impression on the mind which language, however graphic, would fail to do.

We are much better pleased with the whole mechanical execution of the present edition; the paper is beautiful, and the typography clear and correct. It is, indeed, a family book, and also one of reference for teachers. It has already passed through six editions of 2000 each!—a good commentary on the value and popularity of the volume.

The second volume will be issued early in May.

Several poems have been published on the death of our lamented Chief Magistrate. We are sorry that they are unworthy of their solemn theme. Many lines are used to express the simple but absorbing sorrow of the heart; but how ineffectual they are—how poor are all the "dirges" and "requiems" of our modern versifiers, compared with stanzas like the following! In them is told all that can be told. They strike us as singularly appropriate to the season and circumstance of General Harrison's demise. We are somewhat surprised that they have not before been quoted; for, in view of the event which has shrouded our country in mourning, they might as well have been written yesterday as a hundred years ago. But, alas! the nineteenth century has no William Collins!

ODE.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1746.

How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod,
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By Fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

The Courier and Enquirer of Tuesday last, has a spirited article—doubtless from the pen of Col. Webb—on the conduct and proceedings of "the handsome Mr. Effingham." We regret that we have not room to transfer it to our columns; for it effectually demolishes the last remnants of respectability which may have adhered to the character of the "mild," "high-minded," "quiet," "philosophical," "clear-headed," "handsome," "thoughtful," "liberal," "just," "courteous," "simple," "direct," and "full of truth," Mr. EFFINGHAM.

It appears from this statement—the correctness of which cannot be doubted—that an individual by the name of Cooper, James Fenimore Cooper, has repeatedly and vainly attempted to procure indictments against editors, in his native county of Otsego. This individual should be caught and caged—he is evidently rabid. If suffered to run at large he may bite somebody and inflict him with a mania for commencing libel-suits.

The most profitable Railroad in the United States is that from Utica to Schenectady, the capital stock paid in of which is $1,500,000. On this capital, the interest earned has been 13 1-2 per cent. per year. This road is seventy-miles long, and cost less per mile, than any other road in the country. It has a light flat rail, and is restricted by law from carrying freight, as this would interfere with the profits of the Erie canal, owned by the State.

TO AGENTS.—We trust those who are acting for us will not flag in their exertions to increase our subscription list. The new story of Barnaby Rudge was commenced on the 20th of March, and is a good point for new subscriptions to commence. We are making great outlays of expense to increase the value and interest of the NEW WORLD, which can only be compensated for by an increased subscription.

THE NEW WORLD

Is a Journal of Popular Literature, Criticism, Science and the Arts. It is supplied with articles by the first living writers of the United States and Great Britain. The first number was issued in October, 1839, and its circulation has steadily increased to this day, till it counts more readers than any other newspaper of its kind in the world. This is owing to the fact of its having given to the public, for a sum merely nominal and always in advance of any other print, the most popular works of the most approved authors. Within the brief period of its existence it has issued, with unexampled celerity, and often before they appeared in London, works by Sir E. L. Bulwer, Thomas Moore, Charles Dickens, (Boz), Sheridan Knowles, W. H. Ainsworth, D'Israeli, Sergeant Talfourd, Captain Marryat, Henry Cockton, the author of Valentine Vox, Samuel Warren, author of Passages from the Diary of a late Physician, Mrs. Jameson, Miss Mitford, and others less known to fame though scarcely inferior in merit. Pieces original and selected, by writers of our own country, have also adorned its pages—Miss Sedgwick, Professor Longfellow, Washington Irving, Bryant, Holmes, Halleck, Sprague, Dana, Sargent, &c. &c.

A novel and striking feature of the New World is that it has given, besides the great literary productions of the day, the discourses of eminent divines—the Rev. Orville Dewey, D. D.—the Right Rev. G. Doane, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey—the Rev. William E. Channing, D. D.—the Rev. Robert Newton, the celebrated English Clergyman—the Rev. George B. Cheever—the Rev. Mr. Kirk—the Rev. Thomas J. Sawyer, and others.

In addition to all these new and popular works, these eloquent discourses, this comprehensive Journal has given the best poems and periodical papers which have appeared in the English and American Magazines. What has been done is an earnest of what will be done. But we shall not only preserve the former character of the paper, but elevate it—our daily increasing facilities enabling us to do so.

A most attractive feature in the New World at present is a new story by Boz (Charles Dickens), author of Oliver Twist, &c., entitled "BARNABY RUDGE." It will be regularly continued from week to week; and, as it has just been commenced, back numbers can be supplied.

The New World is frequently embellished with costly and beautiful Engravings.

Though striving to say much in few words, it is quite vain to attempt setting forth half the attractions of the New World in this place. It will speak for itself. Specimen numbers can always be sent to any part of the country to post-paid orders.

We cannot forbear to add in conclusion that the New World studiously avoids all party politics, and is conducted on principles of the strictest neutrality. No profane or improper jest, no vulgar allusion, no irreligious sentiment is ever allowed to soil its pages. Reverence of God and respect to man govern it always. The rule of the Editor is never to publish a line which he would hesitate to read aloud in the hearing of virtuous and intelligent females. THUS THE NEW WORLD IS MADE AN UNEXCEPTIONABLE FAMILY NEWSPAPER, and is earnestly recommended to the regard of every friend of pure literature, as well as of correct morals and the public good.

TERMS.—Three Dollars a year in advance: Two copies for Five Dollars. All remittances must be post-paid or free, and the invariable rule of the office is to discontinue every subscription at the expiration of the time paid for, unless previously renewed by a further payment in advance.

LITERARY PORTRAITS—No. 1.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

We, this week, commence a series of portraits which will be continued from time to time in the New World, and which cannot fail to be interesting to the intelligent reader, who is acquainted with the works of our American writers. The series will not be exclusively confined to mere authors—men who have written books—but to men who are generally known throughout the country, as connected with the press. We have chosen the most fitting name with which to commence our gallery—that of the Editor of the Evening Post, and the author of poems, which have become standard in America, have been re-published in England and are regarded with great favor in both countries. Our sketches will be brief, and will not include elaborate criticisms upon literary productions.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT is the son of Peter Bryant, of Cummington, Mass., a physician of respectable rank. William was born on the 3d day of November, 1794. He gave evidences of the faculty of verse-making at an early age. When but nine years old, he composed for a school-thesis certain lines, which received the imprimatur of the editor of the Hampshire Gazette, a weekly newspaper published in Northampton.

The youthful poet was rather encouraged than restrained by his indulgent parent in these early manifestations of a love for "Idle poetry,

 That useless and unprofitable art."

Instead of checking the imagination of his son, Dr. Bryant, who was a sound scholar and a man of taste, guided and directed it; and the poet now acknowledges that he is indebted to parental teaching for some careful habits in composition.

When only fourteen years old our author published at Boston, in a small volume, with some other poems, "The Embargo, or Sketches of the Times." The book was so well received that a second edition was printed within the year. "The Embargo" was a political jeu d'esprit levelled at President Jefferson and his measures. It is chiefly remarkable from the fact that the boyish principles therein expressed have, of late days, been gravely brought to sustain a charge of inconsistency urged against the man.

In 1810, the young satirist entered Williams college, in Williamstown, Massachusetts. He remained here two years, and then, obtaining a dismissal upon his own application, turned his attention to the study of law. In 1815, he was admitted to the bar at Plymouth, and afterwards practiced with moderate success.

Mr. Bryant came to New York in 1825. He shortly became an editor of a Magazine, entitled THE NEW YORK

REVIEW. Some of his most admired pieces appeared here. In 1826 he became associated in the editorial conduct of THE EVENING POST.

During each of the years 1827, 1828, and 1829, he contributed one-third of its matter to an annual entitled "The Talisman"—the remaining two-thirds being written, chiefly, by Messieurs Verplanck and Sands.

In 1832 Mr. Elam Bliss, of New-York, issued the first complete edition of the poems of Bryant. It was soon exhausted, and a second immediately published in Boston. Of this latter, Mr. Washington Irving, then in London, took upon himself an English re-publication, in which he announced himself as the editor, dedicating the book in this capacity to Mr. Samuel Rogers. Since this period the Harpers, of New-York, have printed several editions, of which the latest contains seventeen pieces not to be found in any previous collection. One or two fine poems, not yet comprised in volume form, have lately appeared in the "Knickerbocker Magazine" and the "Democratic Review."

In June, 1834, the poet, with his family, sailed for Europe, with the design of there devoting some years to literary pursuits and to the education of his children. He visited Italy and Germany, residing principally in Munich, Heidelberg, Florence and Pisa. In the spring of 1836 he was suddenly called home by the severe illness of Mr. Leggett, his associate in the "Evening Post."

"The poetical reputation of Mr. Bryant," remarks a fine critic—Mr. Edgar A. Poe—to whose published sketch we are indebted for some facts in this notice, "both at home and abroad, is, perhaps, higher than that of any other American. In England his writings have been received with especial favor, and here the public approbation has been decided and unanimous. In no instance has his great abilities been denied—nor can it be denied that this fact itself is a substantial proof of the character and of the extent of these abilities. No man of the noblest order of genius was ever distinguished by absolute uniformity of applause. On the other hand this uniformity is never known except where we meet with the most rigorous negative merit. In truth a manly exemption from the prevalent poetical affectations of his time has done more for Mr. Bryant than any one positive excellence. Yet of positive excellencies he has many; and there are one or two of his shorter poems which sometimes startle the critic into a belief of a rarer spirit—of a more ethereal temper—than that of which the poet gives any general or steady indication."

We believe that the reputation of the "first American Poet," is always accorded to Mr. Bryant. His poems are certainly more generally known and are more American in their character than those of any other native poet. In our opinion, Mr. Bryant might acquire as a prose-writer a reputation not inferior to that which he has attained as a poet, were the subjects on which he employs his pen of a more lasting character. His leading articles in the Evening Post are models of a correct and elegant style; they are full of wit, happy illustrations, and forcible antithesis. They are not less vigorous than they are polished, and the charm of their style gives interest to the driest subjects.

In politics Mr. Bryant is of the strict Democratic school; no paper in the United States, more ably and consistently than his, supported the administrations of Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. His enemies call him malignant—falsely, we believe. His conduct in private life, and his character as a poet indicate him to be a man, gentle and benevolent. In the domestic circles, and by his friends, numerous and good, Mr. Bryant is truly loved. His moral character is unimpeachable: a kind husband, an affectionate father—he lives up to the sentiments expressed in many of his poems.

The likeness in the above sketch is very good. The expression has been caught by the artist, and conveyed with striking fidelity. Our admiration for Mr. Bryant as a poet—our esteem for him as a man, would have prompted us to say more; less we could not have said with any justice to our subject.

For the New World.

DREAMLETS.

I know a little silver lake whose banks are bright with flowers;
 There oft at night my footsteps stray to cheat the lingering hours;
 And when the moon's full glory beams from heaven's blue arch above,
 In Faucy's bright but fleeting dreams I meet the lass I love.
 Her dark brown hair untrammelled falls in richly waving curls;
 Her opening rose-bud lips betray a bright array of pearls;
 With fairy step and laughing eye she trips o'er flower and vine,
 And, archly echoing sigh for sigh, she whispers, "I'll be thine."
 But where, O lovely visions! where, in life's undreaming part,
 Dwells unrevealed this maiden fair, this idol of my heart?
 If still on earth her presence flings o'er mortals such sweet power,
 Oh spread again your airy wings and wait me to her bower!
 If ye are faithful shadows, cast by coming good or ill,
 I'll hope to find you to the last, and leave earth—hoping still;
 And far beyond the moon's pale beams and stars' more distant light
 I'll seek fulfilment of my dreams, 'mid scenes supremely bright.
New-York.

Original Discourse.

GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY AS EVINced BY THE RAVAGES OF DEATH.

A SERMON.

Delivered on occasion of the death of the late President of the United States, in the Methodist Church in Washington street, Brooklyn.

BY THE REV. JAMES FLOY, Pastor of that Church.

Behold he taketh away; who can hinder him? Who will say unto him, What doest thou? Job: 12.

Still, in death, is the voice of him who, a few short weeks ago, proclaimed from the Capitol the line of conduct by which he should be guided, and the motives that should actuate him in the discharge of those high duties to which his country had called him. Quenched, forever, the brightness of that eye, which kindled as the plaudits of his constituents welcomed him to a station more honorable than a monarch's throne. Sad and memorable instance of the vanity of human greatness and of life's uncertainty! The fairest prospects have been blighted in the bud: expectations blasted: hopes withered: The breezes of the 4th of March wafted his inaugural address to the citizens of this extended republic; and ere some of them had perused the document, the heart that dictated, and the hand that penned it, were cold in death. The 4th of April had not yet dawned, when sorrow and lamentation filled the city where, scarcely a month before, all was joyousness and gratulation. Swiftly the melancholy tidings flew; and callous indeed must be that heart which partook not in some degree of their gloom and sadness when the announcement fell upon the ear: Harrison is dead, the President sleeps with his fathers.

Hushed be the voice of party spirit: silenced the discord of political strife. As men, as fellow countrymen, as brethren of the family of the republic, our loss is one: our grief the same. It is the President of the Union that God hath taken away: it is our chief magistrate that is in his grave. There let all acerbity of feeling, all harsh judgment, all prejudice be buried with him. Not mine the task, nor this the place, to scan his faults; nor yet to pronounce his eulogy. I come not

"His merits to disclose,

Or draw his frailties from their dread abode."

History will do him justice. Posterity will inscribe his name, with unerring precision, in that rank of the world's great men to which he is entitled. Undue partiality on the one hand, and unjust prejudice on the other, will give place to the realities of sober truth. His death is one without precedent in the annals of the republic. William Henry Harrison is the only man who has died President of the United States. In view, therefore, of his station, the brief period during which he enjoyed his honors, and the suddenness with which he was called hence, appropriate are the solemnities of this hour. Fitting the occasion, also, is the theme presented in the text:

I. GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY, AS EVINced BY THE RAVAGES OF DEATH. Behold he taketh away, who can hinder him?II. MAN'S DUTY IN REFERENCE TO THAT SOVEREIGNTY.
Who will say unto him, What doest thou?

I. He taketh away. Death is spoken of as a King, a monster, a tyrant. "T is mere poetry—Death has no claim to either of these appellations, and is, in fact, but ministering servant of the Almighty. His commission is from the ruler of the universe: it is special in its direction; positive in its requirement; unfailing in its fulfilment. The hand of violence may hurry his approach, and vice will shorten the career of the wicked. What then? The Lord God omnipotent reigneth. By Him the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Without Him not a sparrow falleth to the ground.

So, also, the commandment with promise holds out long life to the obedient; and length of days is in the right hand of wisdom. The many wheels of life, in some instances, as if worn out by their own friction, appear, spontaneously, to stand still. But is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? Are not his days also like the days of a hireling? By whose fiat is the silver cord loosened, the pitcher broken at the fountain, the wheel at the cistern? Thou turnest man to destruction. Behold He taketh away.

Who can hinder him? Ingenuity has devised schemes innumerable: Science has lent her aid, and Perseverance has ransacked creation to discover an elixir, or to compound a panacea, that might lengthen life, and ward off the darts of the Almighty's messenger. Preposterous undertaking! Lamentable evidence of man's degradation; of the depth of human depravity. The creature attempting to cope with the Creator! An insect contending with Jehovah! A worm battling with Omnipotence!

Who can hinder him? Strength, Genius, Beauty indiscriminately are called, and obey the summons. Infancy, youth, manhood, are equally and alike powerless to resist his mandate. Vain, when the hour is come, the entreaties of affection, the tears of friendship, the agony of love. Cherubim and a flaming sword turn every way to repel the hand that, for itself, or for another, would pluck death's antidote from the tree of life.

Not only in the fact that He taketh away and none can hinder him, is seen God's sovereignty. It is specially visible in the time, the manner, the circumstances of Death's visitations.

There, upon the untired vision of an infant, has just fallen the light of Heaven. See, those eyes are closed again, unconscious of a tear, in this world of grief. Full of terror is an infant's death. So lovely, so spotless. Lamblike innocence! Angelic purity! Read in its new distorted features, its livid lip, its stiffened form, the effects of the primal curse, the evidence of man's apostasy and fall.

Or, mark again as the first perils of infancy are past, and the little feet are beginning to obey the wishes of the soul, exulting in the power of locomotion, and the lips are rejoicing in the strange mystery of speech, the icy hand of Death rudely tears away the tendrils that twined around the mother's heart; and covers, with dark eclipse, the sunshine of the father's soul. Is it well with the child? Yes. But strong the fortitude, more than merely human the resignation that, with the Shunamite, when her little one sat upon her knees till noon and then died, exclaims, in answer to the question—It is well.

Instances have occurred, not frequent indeed, but sufficiently numerous, to evince the dread sovereignty of Jehovah, when Death's commission has been directed to the halls of merriment; the marriage party; the bridal feast. Shall this joyousness be broken in upon so ruthlessly? Must virtue, loveliness, depart at an hour so untimely? Even so. Take away the tokens of affection. Displace the insignia of happiness. Remove those flowers; or, let them remain; wreath them into a funeral wreath; fit emblem at once of the beauty and evanescence of the departed.

Then, again, O fearful hour! death visits the couch of the mother "when she feels, for the first time, her first-born's breath." That little one, into whose nostrils God has just breathed the breath of life, who dates from that moment the commencement of a never-ending existence, is left to grapple alone with the world's selfishness. To him, unknown the value of a mother's care, or the strength of a mother's love. Her hearty blessing; the fervor of her prayers; the restraining influence of her tears; these are not for him. He taketh away—who can hinder Him?

The husband and the father, upon whom so many were helplessly dependent, went forth, in the morning, blithely to his daily toil. How his soul expanded, how he nerved that arm as his thoughts reverted to his own peaceful fire-side! Gay were his day-dreams, cheerful his labor, as the loved ones, for whom he toiled, danced in his imagination. Alas! he shall see them again no more on earth. That morning salutation was the last kiss of earthly affection. That matin prayer his farewell blessing. Go thou—it is better to go to the house of mourning than to go to the house of feasting—bear the tidings that will spread the pall of desolation around that dwelling. Stay there a season; thy religion tells thee to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction; perchance thou mayst minister consolation to the new-made widow; to those children to-day fatherless.

Whence comes that groan of agony? The world hath heard it many a time and oft. Tis easily interpreted; readily translated—Would to God I had died for thee, my son, my son! It comes from that grey-haired sire standing by a new-made grave, like a solitary mountain oak riven, but not destroyed by the lightning's scathing blast. Tis the grave of departed genius; of one whose sun hath gone down ere it was yet noon. Oh, it is soothing, though full of sadness, to meditate upon what he was, to imagine what he might have been! So ambitious, and withal so humble. Foremost among his compeers in the race for fame, yet not unmindful of the honor that cometh from God only. Is it wonderful that the old man cannot fathom the mystery of his death, seeing that his own life was bound up in that of the lad, and, as far as human foresight can extend, the world would have been the wiser and the better for his stay on earth?

Am I dealing in fiction in this sacred place? Are these the mere shadowings of imagination? Or are they rather stern realities of every day occurrence? What meaneth this drapery with its sombre hue? What those badges of sorrow everywhere visible? Was it imagination, that whelmed in grief, the scarcely settled inmates of the White House at Washington, when death executed his first summons for a President? Was that fiction which bore to the cottage on the North Bend of the Ohio the dreary tidings that the father and the husband had departed? Or was it in sober verity the flying roll, which, in vision, the prophet saw, inscribed within, and without, with lamentation and mourning and wo? Everything else may be fiction rather than death's visitations.

He taketh away. His messenger does his work, here, by what men term accident, sudden as the spark from smitten steel; there, by long dreary hours of wasting agony; by roaring tempests, and by deceitful calms; by famines; by the sword; by the withering blast of the Sirocco; by the heaving of the earthquake; by pestilence walking in darkness, and by destruction wasting at noonday.

Who can hinder him? Death, commissioned, finds his victims among the rich and the poor—the high and the low—the bond and the free; on the ocean or on the land; in the camp; in the cabinet; in the hall of science; in the walks of philosophy; in peaceful retirement, and in the bustling activity of business.

II. Having thus contemplated the sovereignty of Jehovah as evidence of the ravages of death, pass we to the second part of our theme: MAN'S DUTY IN REFERENCE TO THAT SOVEREIGNTY: Who will say unto Him, what doest thou?

1. Evidently, in the first place, is suggested by the text, and reiterated by the revealed will of God, the duty of acknowledging His hand in these bereavements. True, man's self interest demands this at all times, and under all circumstances. But, in the buoyancy of health, and in the enjoyment of prosperity, how prone is he to forget the hand that feeds, the arm that sustains him in existence. How true the language of the sacred writer. God is not in all his thoughts. But when the affections of his soul are crushed within him by the untimely, the unexpected visit of death, then, if ever, there is hope that he will hear that voice which says, Be still and know that I am God. Will this nation recognize and acknowledge Jehovah's hand in this dispensation of his Providence—that God hath taken away her President?

Painful the reflection, that during the long period, when this whole land was converted into one great theatre of party warfare, and during the whole season of that fierce struggle which eventuated in Harrison's election, God was little thought of by the combatants on either side. How then did iniquity abound, and the love of many wax cold!

The election over, the result ascertained, myriads of lips were loud in their huzzas for Harrison. Few and far between the hosannas to the King of Kings, the Ruler of the Universe! How the very heaven echoed with the mortal's name, when he stood forth upon the Portico, and swore to protect and defend the Constitution. So far as the record of the event is warrant for the operation, his inaugural oath alone was the solitary evidence that this nation believes at all in the existence of a God. No note of thanksgiving diversified the ceremonies of the day. Not a blessing was implored. Not a petition for the prosperity of the new made President ascended to the throne of God. Why was it thus? Did the bug-bear cry of Church and State so frighten from their propriety those who have the direction of these matters, as to render it expedient in their eyes to omit all allusion to that Being by whom kings reign and princes secure justice?

The disavowance of Church and State! What does that mean? Simply that the ecclesiastical authority and the civil arm should be kept separate, in order that the grand experiment of the power of Christianity, independent of State influence and patronage, should have free course. To this, every Christian heart should respond—Amen. Christianity does not depend upon the arm of the civil power. She needs it not; asks not for it. But does it thence follow that the State needs not the protectingegis of Omnipotence? Or nullify the declaration, that except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain? Is it wise—is it becoming, that in her prosperity she should forget God and mention him only in her adversity? That she should dispense with religious ceremonies in the joyousness of a re-auguration, and call for the sympathies of Christianity, only in the sad solemnities of the funeral hour?

Shall I be told it has been always thus? I reply—and would that my voice might reach every department of the government, legislative, judicial, executive, thus, by a people whose God is the Lord, thus it ought not to be.

Not in vain the few short weeks of Harrison's presidential career, and not in vain his untimely death, if the nation learn therefrom, the lesson, in all her ways to acknowledge God.

2. Again, the sovereignty of Jehovah, as evinced by the ravages of death, calls for unfeigned humiliation on the part of the living. He taketh away: who will say, what doest thou? Throughout the extent of the vast empire of the Almighty, there is no stranger phenomenon, and none more common, than overweening arrogance on the part of the insect man. Vanity and corruption in alliance; pride and mortality linked together. "T was pride that thinned the ranks of the angelic host. Pride that prompted the act, that closed the gates of paradise, and brought upon our beauteous earth the blighting curse of God. Unrestrained, unchecked, whither would it have led the fallen race? Soaring continually aloft would have risen the towering Babel; Pelion would have been piled on Ossa; mountain on the top of mountain, until the very heavens had been scaled, the sceptre riven from Jehovah's grasp, the crown plucked from the brow of Omnipotence. "Thou hast said," is the accusation of the prophet—"Thou hast said, in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; I will also sit upon the mount of the congregation in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High." Such, not always indeed uttered in language, is the sentiment of the unsubdued, unchecked spirit of man, whose breath is in his nostrils; of the worm that dieth and wasteth away; that giveth up the ghost, and where is he?

Go, take that proud heart to the chamber of the unburied dead. See how low ambition lies. How dim the eye of genius. How revolting, all that once was loveliness, and beauty's self! And as thou standest there, listen to that question which cometh to thee from the spirit land—"Who maketh thee to differ from another?" Already has the departed said to corruption, thou art my father: to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister. But ere they cover up that heart, once so warm and true in the cold, damp grave, hearken to its monition:—the dead speak eloquently; and preach trumpet-tongued the vanity of earthly distinction, the nothingness of human glory, the abominable absurdity of haughtiness and pride.

And oh! my countrymen what does this sudden bereavement by the hand of an all wise God, call for on the part of this nation? Humiliation deep, sincere, heartfelt. Truly we have been a proud people. By bells, bonfires, and cannon—how have we lauded ourselves and exulted in our prosperity. The names and the exploits of our fathers have been the theme, unceasingly, of the poet and the orator, and the God of our fathers has been almost forgotten. So corrupted by unceasing sweets has become the public taste. So vitiated the public ear by incessant flattery and self-gratulation, that scarcely now, will the nation listen to the voice of rebuke and warning, for her most notorious derelictions from the path of equity and justice. Tush! has been her language, the country's honor cannot be disgraced—the national escutcheon can never be tarnished. Questioned has been his patriotism who indulged the thought, and he that has dared to give it utterance, has been branded with contumacy and fanaticism. Behold, saith Babylon, I sit a Queen, and am no widow, and shall never see sorrow. But what saith Jehovah. Her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.—In the cup that she hath filled, fill to her, double. Therefore shall her plagues come in our day, death and mourning and famine.

It is easy, and men are very prone, to account for every thing that transpires on earth, by referring it to mere natural causes. Every body can give a reason for the derangement of business, the cessation of the wheels of industry, the prostration of the fairest prospects of the nation during the last few years; and by both parties alike, is forgotten that God who putteth down one and setteth up another. Is there evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it? And now, that death has been permitted to cut down our tallest cedar, happy for us if, looking away from natural causes, we behold therein the chastening hand of our heavenly parent: acknowledge that He taketh away: and, confessing our national offences, prostrate ourselves in unfeigned humiliation before him.

III. Again, submissive resignation under the afflicting bereavements incident to mortality, is evidently enjoined by the language of the text. O how natural, how common and at the same time how futile and presumptuous, when He taketh away, is the exclamation—What doest thou? Everywhere at the present day, as there was at Rama, in the day of the prophet, is there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning—Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted because they are not.

Behold, says the afflicted one, in the first gush of anguish, when fully awake to the consciousness that He hath indeed taken away, behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger. Yes, thou stricken one, there is sorrow like unto thy sorrow. Behold, He taketh away. Bitter indeed is thy cup, but it is mingled by the hand of infinite wisdom and goodness. Dark and difficult the lesson that God is teaching thee, but oh how sweet, how full of bright and buoyant hope when thou hast fully learned it! He shall not return to me, but I shall go to him. What I know not now I shall know hereafter. "This is that increase of the heart, whose fragrance smells to heaven."

Very similar, in many respects, to the grief of steadfast friendship and family affection, and conjugal love, is, to this nation, the sorrow occasioned by the death of her chosen chief magistrate. It occurred, as is ever the language of the bereaved, at a time when we were least prepared for it. The blow was struck, as death generally strikes, at an unexpected hour. There had been no precedent in the nation's history to prepare the public mind for such tidings from the capital.

By all was indulged the hope, which, in many, rose to confident expectation, that, with Harrison's inauguration, the clouds that lowered upon our horizon would have been dispersed, and a new era of prosperity would have dawned upon the republic. It came at a time peculiarly dark and portentous in the nation's history. The fierce vial of God Almighty's wrath was impending over us. Indeed, less unexpected than the event which we now mourn would have been the summons to arms; "the screaming trumpet and the thundering drum;" the commencement of a protracted and bloody war.

By this visitation how solemn the admonition; how impressive the lesson:—Vain is the help of man. Unerring wisdom hath taken away; infinite goodness permitted the blow; perchance to save us from the curse denounced against him who trusteth in man or maketh flesh his arm. Unfeigned submission therefore, and confident trust in God, are peculiarly, at this hour, the nation's duty: her appropriate place, the dust; her becoming garb, sackcloth and ashes; the sentiment of her soul, that of the Psalmist—I was dumb; I opened not my mouth because Thou didst it.

4. Death's visitations call for sympathy and condolence with those who have been bereaved. They may not murmur at the will of God: 'tis impious to say unto him, What doest thou? But nowhere is it forbidden them to grieve with a chastened sorrow; to hallow, with the fondest affections of the heart, the memory of departed worth. Soothing is the sympathizing voice of friendship in the outburst of grief, when fear is converted into certainty, and the unwelcome reality forces itself upon the soul that He hath indeed taken away. In nothing is the benevolence, the goodness of our Creator more signally evident, than in the fact that in this world of ours joy is increased, and grief lessened, by sharing it with our fellow creatures. Happiness, like the bread broken by the Saviour, the more it is divided the more there is of it; and the same Saviour hath taught us, by precept and example, that sorrow may be alleviated by weeping with those that weep.

The grief of the nation caused by the death of Harrison may be mitigated in some degree by turning from his funeral urn, and dwelling upon the incidents of his life. Born in Virginia, a son of one whose name is attached to the ever-memorable declaration of independence, he commenced his public career at the early age of nineteen. His conduct as a soldier, as Governor of the North Western Territory, as a Commissioner on the part of the United States to treat with the Indians, as a member of the House of Representatives, as a Senator, as Minister Plenipotentiary to Columbia, in all these stations his conduct is matter of history; and although we may not divine what, in a still higher office, he might have been, the grief of the Republic may find some alleviation in meditating upon what he was.

But of what avail is all this to those who mourn not the death of a President, but who weep for the father and the husband? What, to that widowed heart, that ye called to the highest office in your gift the partner of her affections, and covered him with the mantle of earthly glory? Desolate in her old age, does she not feel a portion of that sadness, which caused Mary to exclaim at the sepulchre of the Saviour, They have taken away my Lord and I know not where they have laid him.

Standing in this sacred place may I not, fellow countrymen, in your name, and in behalf of our common Christianity, tender to that afflicted widow and to the bereaved relatives of the departed, the condolence of the church of the living God, and assure them of a share in the nation's sympathy?

5. Finally: God's sovereignty, as evinced by the ravages of death, is eminently calculated to impress man with a sense of his own frailty and of the necessity of preparation for that hour when it shall be said of him, "Behold he taketh away."

What a strange paradox is man! Knowing that he must die, he acts as if he expected to live for ever. Conscious that every tolling knell that falls upon his ear is but the prelude to his own epitaph; that every funeral procession in which he walks is a memento of the hour when, for him, the mourners shall go about the streets; that every death of which he hears is lessening the number between himself and the grave—his conduct is such as almost to induce the belief that, by some strange hallucination, he has imbibed the idea that he shall prove an exception to the general rule. But this is not in reality his belief: he knows better. Death is the only future event in his earthly history of which he has any positive assurance. Connected with this assurance is also his utter ignorance of the manner and the time of his departure. And in view of this certainty on the one hand, and uncertainty on the other, what does wisdom, prudence, nay, common sense dictate, as alike man's interest and duty? What is the one absorbing lesson for us individually to derive from the event to a commemoration of which have been devoted the solemnities of this hour. The lesson, in comparison with which, so far as we are individually concerned, all others dwindle into insignificance, is the necessity of seeking now that state of preparation which will enable us, through God's grace, with calm tranquillity, at any moment to bid the world farewell! "Death cannot come untimely to him who is prepared to die."

To conclude: What a rebuke is the mouldering dust of the late President to the pride of office, the squabbles of party strife, the thoughtless whirl of business, of folly, and dissipation!

Let those upon whom devolve the honors and cares of the government, pause and reflect upon the frailty of the tenure by which they hold their official stations. Let them never forget, that not only to the party which gave them office, and not only to the people at large, but to that tribunal from which there is no appeal, whither Harrison has gone to render an account of his stewardship, are they accountable for the measures they propose, and for the means by which they seek to carry them into execution.

Let the grave of your President rebuke the madness of party strife, and teach your fellow countrymen, however much you may differ from each other in opinion, to put away all wrath, all bitterness, all malice; to avoid, on the one hand, the folly of deifying a worm of the dust, and, on the other, the wickedness of aspersing character and slandering reputation.

To both the great parties into which the country is divided, representatives of each of which I see before me, from the grave of your President comes the admonition, Let there be no unholy strife between you, for ye are brethren—equally and alike anxious for the prosperity and the glory of your common country: and that country needs alike from all, in this hour of bereavement and impending peril, the sincere and fervent prayer, GOD SAVE THE REPUBLIC.

ACT I.

SCENE I....The chamber of ZULEIKA in the Harem of the Sultan Suliman—ZULEIKA reclining on a couch engaged in embroidery. FATIMA seated on a cushion at her feet, winding bright-colored silks.

ZUL. [showing her work.] How think you it is shaped, this tinted flower?

Mimics it nature well, dear Fatima!

FAT. So skillfully, the dulcetest slave had vowed It grew beneath Zuleika's fairy hand!

ZUL. Thou flatterer! how feign I'd let thee cheat! Mine eyes to think thine true! For, 'tis to win The gerdon of my father's smile these hues In broderly blend. Dear father! sweet the toil That boasts that best reward—to pleasure thee! Who labors, joy imparting, doth himself, With his own gift, enrich; [again showing her embroidery.] But is't well done?

FAT. In sooth most dextrously; but if 't were ill, Methinks that never fell the partial eye Of your most idolizing sire on aught Those fingers traced, when broke not rapturously His sympathizing lip in smiles!

ZUL. Alas! When shall that eye of love once more meet mine? Three moons have wearied with their lustre, since The death-fraght blast of war hath robbed your bower Of its dear lord—Zuleika of her sire! Oh! how I long to hear that Bagdad ownst Victorious Suliman her conqueror! That Persia's king before his footsteps flies, And homeward-bound those steps my father turns! Wer't not for my young brother's joyousness, Your varying tales and loved companionship, How tedious, since the drum's first beat, had lagged Old Time's decrepid feet!

FAT. For favorites, mured In yon pent harem's bounds, and languishing, Like flow'rets 'mid some thickly shaded wood, That wasted wither, pining for the sun, They might; but not for her, the arbitress Of good! who, scarce by thirteen springs matured, With mightier sceptre sways these harem walls Than ever wielded spoil Sultana yet! Unless 't were Roxelana's self; indeed, Whom Suliman 't is said made peace, or war, Enslaved the free, or loosed the captive's chain, To please. Alike Roxelana's child for more!

ZUL. Pr'ythee, have I not told thee, prattling girl, 'T is not the might my sire's indulgent love Invests me with, (save when that power I use Rather in recompense than punishment,) Adds to my sun of happiness one beam? And yet you deem me too omnipotent; Forget the Sultan, e'en in bounteous love O'erweeping reason's bulwark, wise, hath left

* The era, in which the incidents of this Drama are supposed to occur, is during the reign of Sultan Suliman, the most renowned of the name; of whom L'Herbelot says, "C'est le grand Soliman, qui est le premier ou le second du nom, selon divers sentimens des historiens. Il succeda a Sultan Selim Khan, fils de Bajazet, son pere et commença a regner l'an 926 de l'Hégire." As this play was designed solely for private representation, or the use of schools, the omission of male characters was deemed necessary; which, though it rendered the plot, perhaps, more difficult of construction, and the interest of the Drama less easy to be sustained, greatly facilitated its performance; the only male part, that of Amurath, being one of a boy so young that it may with all propriety be represented by a young lady. L'An de l'Hégire 941. Soliman fit la guerre a Schah Tahmasp, Roi de Perse, prit les villes de Tauris et de Bagdad sur lui, et l'obligea de fuir vers l'avant dans son pays, apres quoi il revint a delasser a Constantinople. D'HANSELOR.

† L'Herbelot especially mentions the unbounded influence of the celebrated Roxelana over Suliman; his passion for her was so great that her slightest will was to him a command. The only excuse for some of the extravagances he committed is that she seduced them.

The Kialar Aga (of our harem's guard Sole chief,) supreme approval of my deeds, That age's coldness temper youth's wild warmth. But waste we not to-day my father's gift; How shall we honor it in the employ Of good?

FAT. Wer't not well used in summoning Gulzara, the young Persian slave, the last And loveliest purchase of our honored lord, Whom yester eve, a Niobe of tears, The speechless incarnation of despair, Was hither brought, and whom our harem all Successless strove to cheer?—be your's the task.

ZUL. Well said—be such my occupation here, No tear shall fall within Zuleika's realm, Zuleika's hand shall not essay to dry: To save one drop, that springs from guiltless woe, A diamond in my crescent should grow dim!

[She claps her hands three times—enter KATINKA with obeisance.]

Gulzara greet for me; say in our bower We wait the pleasure of her company. KAT. Sultana! I have wings at your command! [Exit with obeisance.]

ZUL. For friendly sympathy shall she not lack, That honied thief, who stealth sorrow's sting, And wounds itself to heal another's pang.

[Re-enter KATINKA as before.] KAT. Obedient to your wish, Princess, she comes. [Enter GULZARA, slowly, who bends to ZULEIKA, and exit KATINKA.]

ZUL. Welcome, young stranger, in my father's name I bid you to his palace welcome—and May hospitality that waits your steps, And kindly friendship make its shelter dear.

GUL. I were ungrateful not to give you thanks! ZUL. Nay, spare them until fairly won, for still That eye with gath'ring moisture half flows o'er; That brow is shadowed by a voiceless gloom. In yonder sumptuous harem find you aught Engend'ring grief?

GUL. [confused.] Oh! yes—no! Yes—spare me, Peerless Sultana, spare your slave, until My untaught tongue has smoothly learnt to frame, (Despite a heart o'er swelling with such thoughts As may not break the barrier of my lips,) Such complaisant reply as to your rank Is due.

ZUL. You wrong me most unwittingly; As the skill'd Hakim seeks the malady, Which, knowing not, he cannot hope to cure, Gulzara, I would hear uncolored truth.—What in the gay Zenana like you not? GUL. It lacks to me the humble look, the dear Familiar aspect of my native cot; Your brodered cushions cannot bring me sleep, Your flatteries joy, or gorgeous splendor peace,—'T is not my home!

ZUL. Yet such must henceforth be;

GUL. What art of our's can render it less strange? Have you the art these gilded walls to give Th' unpolished rudeness of my father's hut, Where ev'ry object that I gaze upon Brings back the story of some childish hour? To bid that father's holy smile beam forth—The placid light that cheers our toil or sport—To wake for me my mother's gentle tone,—Whose warbling makes the bulbul's music harsh—And with gay childhood's laughter glad mine ear? Take back your splendid luxuries—in lieu Of wealth and ease, these lowlier treasures give; Though labor be my lot, and scanty food Toil's recompense. Were this boon possible, Then might I call your palace-prison home!

ZUL. Such magic know I not—yet must we strive To make our bowers as dear as stranger ones Can be. [Claps her hands, enter KATINKA.]

Your softest cushion hither bring! [Exit KATINKA, and returns with the cushion, which she places where ZULEIKA by waving her hand directs, and, after waiting an instant as for commands, exit again.]

The downy couch invites your yielding form; Our converse may beguile the weary hours, That fastest fly by thoughtless mirth pursued.

GUL. [seating herself.] Forgive me that I have not guile to force

The merriment that should to yours respond; Could but the soothing hand of pity heal The blow of cruelty, my bosom scarce Would bleed.

ZUL. I pray thee, woo more cheerful thoughts; That sure physician, Time, brings certain cure For ev'ry wound—with holier charms shall robe These stranger walls, than those you languish for To-day; you know not yet my father's soft And gentle nature—yes! the day will come, When changed Gulzara more than home or kin Shall love the Sultan Suliman!

GUL. [starting from her seat.] Love him! Love him? thy father! ay—great cause is mine To love the Sultan Suliman! to pay Him back for banishment from all most dear—Parents, and home, and sweet companionship Of joyous sisters—with that only gift The opulent may prize but cannot force, The poor reserve, or offer—Love! You jest Indeed! Zuleika—born in high estate

And chained by chilling forms that riches weave To curb down speaking nature's warmer impulse—Thou canst not know the sweet reunion round The evening hearth when day-toils cease; the shout Of gleeful children, mingling with the low And thrilling music by the zebec waked; Or, softer still, the praise from lips revered, That consecrates some act of by-gone day; The holy blessing on each bended head—That potent opiate, wooing happy sleep And radiant dreams. The dusky brow of night, Grown old and tinged with grey which, dying, gives Expectant morning birth, thou canst not paint. How freshened by the wholesome rest that's given To poor Content, we meet, and, with renewed Affection, usher in the welcome light!

Would that we ever thus, on thy fair banks,
Belovéd Tigris, blest had lived! for, spite
More barb'rous usage, my fond father vowed
His offspring untransplanted should around
Him bloom, strangers alike to slavery
And shame. Vain was his oath—the evil eye
Fell on us—how or where the Sultan saw,
Or wherefore fixed on me, I wonder still.
His stately vizier to my father sent;
A noble price was offer'd—all in vain
I wept and prayed—my mother moan'd and sobb'd,
My father's heart was bowed in silent woe;
Resistance were to war with thunderbolts,
Or with unshielded bosom tempt their burst;
They took away my humble robe, they decked
Me in this gaudier garb: amid her tears,
Fondly my mother smiled to see me thus
Arrayed—but my poor father shook his head,
And wishful scan'd my simpler dress and sighed;
While from his parched and burning lid, the tear,
Whose gushing eases, pride-pent, found no way.
Then came the dreadful hour—the parting hour!
Oh! 't is a fable all, that hearts can break;
Else were this breast that fearful instant riven!
How fast with feeble hands they clung—how called Upon Gulzara to forsake them not,
My infant sisters! how my father strained
Me long and silently! my mother, wild
With woe, with streaming eyes, on bended knee,
Implored the transient respite of an hour!
Rudely they tore me from her twining arms,
By force unclasped—but oh! I see her now,
As, from the rich embroidered draperies
Of that gay araba, I looked my last,
And saw her, stone-like, stand, with arms wide stretch'd,
White lips—eyes from their sockets starting out:
And, when the shroud of distance, like death's pall,
Had veiled me from her sight—the shriek that burst—
My mother's shriek! e'en now it rings, to mad
Mine ear—and shuts out every mocking sound
Of comfort, which but wastes the breath it spends!

ZUL. No more, I pray! thy words are spells that raise
A phoenix from the wo long hushed and dead;
And ruthless memory haunts me with a grief
Outriving thine—I, too, am motherless!
On her, first-loved and truest loving, I
Have gazed when she gave back no answer glance!
We will not think of this—once more I say
You know not the dear parent still mine own.

GUL. Would that I ne'er had known!—his cruelty—
ZUL. [Interrupting her with dignity.] He is my father!
pause—let that restrain
Your blind reproach.

GUL. He is, and to have been
Thy father, should have been earth's noblest, best,
By every high and lovely virtue graced,
Which sits on you as 't were an heritage.
But were he such, or greater, (could there be More great,) my reverence, or my gratitude
He might command—but never waken love.

ZUL. There 's cause for this; I see it now; you love
Some other? is 't not so?

GUL. [aside.] What have I said!
ZUL. Blushes, they say, like crimson-tinted clouds,
Proclaim the God they veil—divined I right?
GUL. I pray you bid me not reply.

ZUL. I must,
But prompted by no whim or light caprice.
Speak, then, and freely, maiden; I attend.
GUL. [aside.] Thou falt'ring tongue! how shall I tutor thee
Aloud to utter what this shrinking heart
Is whispering to conceal? why, 't is no shame!
Zuleika, yes; there was—there is—one more—
Than bears the name of kindred—whom—

ZUL. Thou lov'st!

To hear the tale be ours: thou lov'st, and whom?
GUL. Whom? 't is the question I still ask myself.
By chance—such seeming chance, of purpose sure,
As Destiny schemes—we met. One evenfall,
When farther from our cot than prudence urged
Or was my wont, I wandered—sudden from
Th' adjacent wood a fierce young Arab rushed.
From his rude grasp, with terror impotent
A huntsman rescued me. I know not why
So often turned my thoughts that night to his Protecting arm and reassuring voice;
But, when the mem'ry of my fear arose,
Strangely a joy broke in that chased its gloom,
As, brightly pictured in my dreams, that face,
Like guardian saint's, watched o'er me still. Next morn,
While herbs and flowers on neighboring hills I sought,
My thoughts were roving, where, I scarcely knew,
When lo!—I raised mine eyes—their object stood Before me. Ask me not—'t were sacrilege
To paint the mystic weavings of the chain,
Or breathe the how love more closely knit our hearts.
Day after day passed on, and still he came;
More joyful each new meeting, and more sad
When warned the setting sun that we must part.
He was not young, but in that mellow prime
That hath of softness more, more tenderness
Mingling with all youth's fire; yet would I not Have changed the gath'ring snows upon his brow
For manhood's jettiest lock; and all that might Have others marred, were but new charms in him.
'T was while thus sped the pleasure-laden hours,
The Sultan's mandate came; in dizzy haste,
I sought our old accustomed trysting place,
But Hafed came not—hours wore on, but brought Not him; the morrow rose—he tarried still;
Another sun must sunder us for ever!
Again I stole despairing forth to look Upon that aged tree, whose murmur leaves
Seemed echoing back the vows which they had heard;
Hopeless upon the earth I flung myself,
But started up as wound a gentle arm
Around me—Hafed? yes, 't was Hafed's self!
The past seemed but a fearful vision; this
The joyful truth—the future's menaces—
And latent fears, and present grief, absorbed

In that sweet moment's transport! but, alas!
Cruel, when kindness most could cheer! for looks
All warmth and words all love, reproaches met
My startled ear, reproaches for my joy!
The Sultan's splendor dazzled me, he said;
I willing went to grace my gilded cage;
He was forgot! The flash of joy, the last
This heart can e'er give forth, was quenched at once.
As lurid lightning leaves the sky more dark,
My soul grew from its momentary bliss
More deeply sad; but soon he to my vows
Gave ear, banished transforming frowns, and soothed
Me with bright promises that we should meet,
Should blissful meet again—bade me believe;
Swore that I still should be his bride, and left
Me suddenly, confused by words so strange,
But filled with hope. Deceitful hope! thou shon'st
A false mirage to cheat my thirsting soul.
The morrow came, but Hafed!—Hafed! where
Was he? And where his oaths? My tale is done,
Or needs no finishing—behold me here!

ZUL. Would that 't were longer, but less sad, and yet
What 's saddest, oft, most charms the happy ear.
How strangely new, how thrilling must have been
The passion that ingulfed all other feeling!
Reared in these walls, with eyes that never gazed
On face of man, except my sire's, yet have
The books that his indulgence granted me,
Mirrored so well the ecstasy of hearts, [changed,
That, linked 'till death, loved on through life un-
I almost wept that I had never known
To love!

GUL. Ask not the fatal knowledge—Love!
The bright-hued serpent, luring but to sting;
Who for each fancied rapture he imparts
Bestows th' alloy of agonies too real.
Oh! rather pray thy breast may never wake
To deeper feeling—you are happy! Not
The wild felicity with passion wed—
Its hurricanes, e'en when most fortunate,
Of anger, fear, of jealousy, revenge;
The storms, all turbulence and rage, that mix
With its delirious bliss—but calm content
Of innocence is yours. It were to bid
The placid stream, that smoothly bears your bark,
Swell into danger-crested billows, with
The skies in combat, but to ask such change.

[A noise heard behind the scenes.]
AMU. [from behind.] Stand back, ye saucy slaves! not be disturbed?

When did my sister with disturbers class
Her Amurath? stand back, and let me pass.
[Enter AMURATH, who springs into the arms of ZULEIKA.]
Good morn! sweet sister mine; those surly slaves
Would feign have barr'd my entrance—say, I vex
You not?

GUL. [who appears moved while the boy speaks.] That voice!
ZUL. [returning his embrace.] Nor could my Amurath!
GUL. [aside.] Surely that face hath met mine eye before,
Those tones mine ear; 't is like some faded dream,
That leaves a shadow misty, undefined,
For memory to prey upon—that brow—
Those speaking eyes—I've seen—and yet not so.

AMU. Sister, it irks me much that our dear sire
Still tarries from his home: sure his return
Must glad us soon, will 't not?

ZUL. We can but hope.

GUL. [half aside.] For my despair!

AMU. Is this that Persian slave
'T is whispered in the harem bears our sire
Such loathing hate? now, by his beard, if 't be
We shall not (as they augur) vainly woo
Her love; for, were 't in courtesy alone,
She can but yield that rightful payment, due
The debt of our's.

GUL. Young courtier, thanks! thee not
To love, unless with adamant gates
My heart were barred, I scarce could dare to hope.

FAT. [who has gradually approached.] Then lov'st thou that which must destroy thy hopes.

GUL. [dropping the hand of AMURATH.] And how?

FAT. In loving him who banishes
The hope, enshrined in ev'ry breast that swells
Its wishful pulses 'neath the harem's dome,
Sultana of that mimic world to reign;
For Sultan Suliman hath often sworn,
While yonder boy, lov'd Roxelana's child,
His sceptre's heir and sole successor lived,
He never bride 'mongst all his harem flowers
Would choose, that no new son legitimate
Might pluck the crescent from his favored brow,
Or, struggling for the envied diadem,
Dissension in the peaceful harem wake.

GUL. Oh! were but that the only barrier
To my desires! no, credit me, what bars
May block the pathway to my hopes, the boy
Shall ne'er be one.

FAT. [aside.] Shall not? 'T is passing strange—
Look then her eagle eyes upon the sun?

Enter KATINKA.

KAT. Princess! Ayesha, wife of Mustapha,
Our noble Sultan's fav'rite fisherman,
Bids that the lustre of your countenance,
On her, and on her lowly offspring fall.

ZUL. Ayesha here again? 't is not three days
Since of some precious trifle last she begged
Our pleased acceptance. I remember not
That to my father or myself she owes
These testimonies: this indeed is love
Unbought—free entrance to the faithful give!

[Exit KATINKA, who returns with AYESHA, bearing a basket of shells tastefully arranged with moss; she kneels to ZULEIKA, behind whose couch KATINKA places herself, folding her arms upon her breast.]

AYE. Daughter of Peris! humbly at your feet
This loveliest offering of the bounteous wave,
Though poor at such an altar, I present—
And pray your favor's gracious evidence,
By its reception, to your slave be shown.

ZUL. [bowing as she receives the basket.] You are not chary of your tokens—nor

Shall we, by your example tutored, stint
Our just reward.

[After examining the shells with AMURATH, the latter passes them to KATINKA, who remains holding the basket.]

AYE. [rising and making an inclination of thanks.]

[Aside.] Ah! did she but divine
What just reward I asked! The boy is there;
Again shall disappointment balk my hopes?
Still shall I seek, and seek in vain? No—though
The search were lengthened to eternity,
Alone my life in yielding, I relinquish thee,
Thou sweet pursuit of stern Revenge!

GUL. [to ZULEIKA, coming forward.] This morn
The perfumed wind that through my lattice stole,
With incense, breathing blossoms of the lime
Was laden, and I looked upon a grove
Where rainbow-pinioned birds shone in the sun,
And songsters, clad in humbler garb, poured forth
Their melody unseen; while murmuring bees,
That vocal with their plaintive music made
The wind, seemed whispering of my father's home.
Your kind permission, Princess, let me beg
To unattended wander in these woods;
There is a balm in Solitude and Nature,
Whose boasted virtue I would willing test.

ZUL. Our pleasures hoard we not so miserly,
As to enlarge their stock, by ravishing
From your poor store, in captive holding you.

[GULZARA bends in acknowledgment, and is preparing to depart.]

AMU. Dear sister, give me leave; [taking GULZARA's hand:] I will with you. [which—

GUL. Come, then; there's something in that soft tone—
Which I—nay, this is madness—phrenzy—I'll
Not think upon 't. Let us together forth.

[Exit GULZARA, leading AMURATH.]
AYE. [aside.] Allah is great! Unhoped, unlooked for joy!
He goes with her, and she alone. At last Vengeance indeed is mine. I knew 't would come;
I have not waited—not untiring watched—
For chance to baffle me—Revenge! ha! ha!
[Exit on the opposite side.]

END OF ACT I.

ACT II.

SCENE I.... A grove attached to the gardens of the palace—a fountain in the midst. Enter GULZARA and AMURATH promenading.

AMU. Why look you still so sad? while through my veins
This soft and vivifying breath of spring
Impels the sportive blood in gleeful dance;
And buoy my spirits up, till most they seem
To mock at your's—why are you still weighed down
By heaviness—or more oppressive thought?

GUL. Your spring of life, most favored Amurath,
Hath brought the lovelier spring of happiness;
Mine, of the verdure of content hath robbed
My path, and left the winter's barren frost
And chilling gloom within my heart.

[AYESHA steals in and conceals herself behind the fountain.]

AMU. I would
I were magician now, that I might use
Mine art to see thee smile. I'd part with some
Dear pleasure of mine own to give it thee.

AYE. [aside.] Spendthrift! cherish more charily thy joys.
Who says thou 'lt not be bankrupt soon?

GUL. But I
So generous of my poor possessions, would Not be—nor to thy blithesome breast transfer
The sole exchange I have, my burd'ning hoard
Of griefs.

AMU. And if thou would'st, I scarce can think They'd weigh so heavily as does this cloak
To-day, that more oppresses me, and clogs
My feet, and checks my panting breath, than e'er
Did suff'ring yet.

GUL. Let me relieve thee of 't;
Unburthened be that shoulder long! the load
That it must bear will gather but too soon.

AYE. [aside.] Heed her well, boy; there spoke the Prophet's voice!

GUL. Were I of the three storied Fates but one,
Should yonder calm and cloudless firmament
The emblem of thy glorious destiny be!

AYE. [aside.] Were such thine office should'st thou sistership
With me avow; for I the darkened thread
Would weave, and to thy sunny sky bring clouds;
Else were the blackness of mine own unpaid.
I would that she were hence! how swift they fly,
These precious moments. They must 'scape me not.
What would I do? I tremble at myself.
Tremble! If there be trembling it must be
The Sultan Suliman that trembles: and
At me! Look now your last, young Prince; I'll part
Them swift. [scenes.]

[Runs out, and in a feigned voice calls loudly behind the scenes.]

AYE. Gulzara, haste! Gulzara, hear

You not?

GUL. Who calls?

AMU. What voice is that? Again?

AYE. [from behind.] Gulzara, instant to the palace haste!

Zuleika summons, and impatient waits.

GUL. Adieu, dear Amurath. I must away;

One kiss. Adieu. [Exit hastily.]

AMU. Stay, stay! I follow thee.

[As he is following, AYESHA runs in the other side and seizes him.]

AYE. You follow me! Mine, mine at last! ha! ha!

AMU. Woman! what mean you by this frantic jest?

Let loose your hold!

AYE. You must with me!

AMU. With you!

And wherefore? Know you who I am? Woman!

It is the Sultan's son you dare profane
By such rude grasp.

AYE. "The Sultan's son!" I dote

Upon the sound—the Sultan's son is mine!

Those words have nerved my hands with double strength.

AMU. You rave—away—let loose my arm—begone!

AYE. Yes, I am quickly gone, and thou with me.
I have no time for dull detail, to make

The snare seem pleasant round the tangled bird.
I am no magpie, cheated of my prey
Discoursing of its worth. We tarry not.

[Endeavoring to drag him out.]

AMU. Mashallah! she is mad! What shall I do?
Ye unseen guardians of the innocent
That people the pure air, protect me now!

[To her.] Forget you, then, this thinly sheltered grove
Close to the palace of my father stands?
His slaves, surrounding every portal, wait
One cry of mine, like lightning to transform
The victim and the victor—me to rescue—you
To punishment consign. Must I use force?
I warn you loose, ere 't be too late, your hold!

AYE. De, then, your worst, and test if gorged delight Hath ears for shrieking misery. Come on.

AMU. [Struggling.] Gafar! Hassan! help! Zuleika! sister!
Allah, they come not! Hassan! help! oh, help!

AYE. There is no help. For months I have prepared
This hour—languished to see it come, far more
Than shipwrecked mariner longs for gleam of land.
I am not mad—or grief hath turned my brain;—
And if it has, why, thou art reason's light,
For thou art the revenge will soothe my grief!
And thou art mine. The sentinel that guards
Yon secret pathway to the shore, upon Whose rugged bosom stands our cabin, is
My brother. The vile slaves you call to aid,
On wild'ring draughts and dainties that I brought,
Are in the palace revelling. Believ'st
Thou, now? Resist not—we must hence.

AMU. Oh! stay!

What would you with me? I have harmed you not.
AYE. He has, of whom you are a part; and you
Are but the vulnerable avenue
That guides my sure-aim'd blow to him!

AMA. My father?

You do him strangely wrong; his name hath been Another name for goodness—spare his son! [Kneeling.]
You turn unpitiably away—you'd drag
Me hence—what, to imbrue those woman hands
In blood? to snatch a life but just begun,
And make your own far worse than thousand times
Expiring, racked by torturing remorse?
I wrong you with the thought. You will not do 't?
Have pity—I'll be secret—they'll not know
What deed I now beseech you to forego.
You yield—you will? you do! and I am free!

[As he is starting up to go out she detains him.]

AYE. When breathes mine own unhappy son that word,
Your lips shall to the sound respond; but not Till then.

AMU. You do not mean these menaces?
You'd fright me with a threat? you shall have all
You wish, and for all wishes granted, give,
Give but my ravished liberty. Sweet sister!
Sister! you cannot hear my voice! and you
Will call upon me when my ear is deaf.
Pity! [Again kneeling.] In pity to Zuleika hear me!
Oh! she will die with woe. You could not look
On those sweet eyes glazed o'er in lifelessness—
Those lips but late that spoke so gently, e'en
To you—their roses purpling, livid grown
At touch of death, that seals their tones for aye!
And I the cause? [Impatiently.] leave me—I must be Yes, I must to my sister—Hassan! Slaves! [free,]
AYE. Your cries, that harmless pierce the mocking air,
Taunt with their echoing—powerless as some Poor bird that 'gainst its wiry prison beats
A mangled head. Your struggles can as soon
Displace the iron bars of callousness
That barriade my heart. Your prayers are wind,
Your tears salt drops on marble falling—cease,
We linger long: you must away.

[Struggling to drag him out.]

AMU. Not yet.
No help? Mercy! mercy! Zuleika! Oh,
My sister, hear your Amurath! Zuleika.

[Exeunt.]

END OF ACT II.

ACT III.

SCENE 1st. . . . The Chamber of ZULEIKA. ZULEIKA in a careless attitude upon her couch, her head buried in her hands as though in grief.—FATIMA bending over her.

FAT. Be comforted, dearest Zuleika, give Not way to such absorbing grief, he will Be found—he will—he must.

ZUL. [looking up.] Oh! that your words
Were prophecies, and entered in my soul
Like holy breathings of an oracle!
How shall I meet my father's angry sorrow?
How live to greet him with "I have no brother?"
Will he not speechless wish that tongue which strikes
His own with horror dumb? O'erwhelmed by such Ill tidings, will he not their bearer loath,
And shun me as some odious thing? and thou,
Poor Amurath! thou suff'rst now, or art
Beyond the pale of earthly anguish; shall
I never see those frolic-beaming eyes,
Those mirth-embellished lips—till yestern morn
By no rude sigh profaned—that noble brow,
So like thy sire's? Impossible! there is
To sudden loss one soothing left; for shocked
Reality shrinks from her task to point
How venomed are the shafts of woe; reserves,
Until we grow accustomed to the pang,
The slow withdrawal of her fearful veil.
I scarce can think this bolt, though 't crush me, real,
Though 't rankle, scarce believe my wound: last night
I heard his merry voice, and thought I felt
The loving pressure of his tiny hand,
And woke—to dread 't would never more grasp mine!
Oh! what an age of torment hath been compass'd
In the short breathing space since yestern morn,
When last he bounded joyous from my sight?
FAT. Torment, indeed, that asks short space to sew
Its thorns; no dial-plate hath grief; one hour
Of centres woes that might embitter years;
But ere he conquer you, for combat arm
Strong Hope to vanquish him! Had we some clue,

However small, to trace his steps—

ZUL. 'T will come!

Think you beneath affliction's pressure I
Have bowed me calmly down, and struggle not
Its weight to lighten? Orders for strict search
Are giv'n; their speedy forwardance myself
Have aided; not one caution is forgot.
But 't is when that, which in the body's toil,
Bids the mind cease its torturing, is done,
That we revert with double consciousness
Back to our most forgotten misery!

[Enter KATINKA, with hasty reverence, bearing a cloak.]

KAT. [hurriedly.] I come, Sultana, from Gafar, who—
ZUL. [starting up.] My brother? quick—what news? Allah be praised!

He is not found? You know not where he is?

KAT. A venom'd arrow galls your sorrowing slave,
Whose lips, unblest, must chase those crowding hopes.
We have but found this cloak, which you well know,
And—in the chamber of the Persian slave!

ZUL. Gulzara! Heaven!

[She drops the cloak which she has taken from KATINKA.]

KAT. Gulzara—and with her,
Slow wand'ring in your fav'rite grove, the Prince
Was last beheld—about the hour of noon;
The slaves describe her running hurriedly
Along the corridor, replying not
To their loud inquiries—

ZUL. She came to me,
Feigning I summoned, and with troubled mien
Requested then permission to withdraw.

KAT. This cloak gives strong suspicion of her guilt:
The Kislar Aga's orders have been given
That she be seized—

ZUL. Gulzara guilty? seized?
It cannot be! wore ever crime so fair
A mask? It is beyond belief! And what Could be her aim?

FAT. Princess, recall you not,
When heedlessly I said young Amurath,
To all aspiring hopes whose wished-for goal
Was Suliman's Sultana to become,
Stood barrier, her haughty answer was
He never should be barrier to her's?
Is this not then her executed threat?

ZUL. But her strange tale—her wretchedness—her love
For the unknown, engrossing ev'ry thought?

FAT. E'en Love himself doth meet a fearful foe
When high Ambition fronts him in the field:
And who shall even vouch her story true?
She who were capable of this dread deed,
Were of all feigning and all artifice!

ZUL. Must I believe this horror? was I so Deceived? Oh! that conviction struck me not!
Whom shall I henceforth trust? or when the stars
Look bright, shall I not picture them transformed
To burning brands to scathe the admiring world?

[GULZARA rushes in, and throws herself at the feet of ZULEIKA.]

GUL. Princess! Zuleika! save—protect thy slave!
Thy plausive words embolden me to fly
To thee—what would they with me? whither would They force me? what—what have I done?

ZUL. A deed
So dark my tongue revolts to give it breath,
And horror-struck credulity would glad Refuse 't belief.

GUL. Oh! then believe 't not thou!

ZUL. Would that I still could say I did not—off!
Thou treach'rous thing! impersonation base
Of those bright picturings of fraud that link
A Hour's face and serpent's form. Oh! like
The baleful Caraminia,* which unsheaths
Its sweet buds to the sun, to poison e'en
The fresh'ning zephyrs that promote its growth,
Thy venom hast thou thrown around her whom
Thy seeming moved to meliorate thy lot.

GUL. Of what am I accused?

ZUL. [scornfully.] Thou playest well
The role of innocence, but we will aid
Thy memory, Gulzara, to recall.
Who yestern morning in the lime grove strayed
Alone with my lost brother?

ZUL. [startled.] Amurath?

ZUL. [aside.] Ha! she is struck. Alas! it is too true.

[to her.] Who left that grove—for ever curst retreat!—
Without the boy, and hurried thence, and feign'd
I summoned, striving by pretended haste
Her guilty agitation to conceal
From questioning slaves—permission to retire
Then praying, in her chamber barred, shut out
The kindly throng who'd cheer her solitude.
From that fell hour one image, gladd'ning all
Our eyes, has met their longing gaze no more—
But, mark me: in thy chamber, ill concealed,
This guilt-disclosing cloak; its mantling folds
Hath shrunk from round the crime-stained form of her
Who last beheld its wearer. Have you heard?
You stand accused of—

GUL. [who, while Zuleika was speaking, has slowly and indignantly risen from her knees.] Murder! Just Allah!

ZUL. [aside.] Guilt overpowers her!

GUL. Oh, why gaze you thus
With such abhorring eyes upon me? 'T is—
'T is false! Yourself you do not credit this;
My fears but cheated me to think you did;
'T is but some time-beguiling sport; yes, 't is Some mockery—

ZUL. The mockery 's in you,
That would insult our presence by this show
Of feeling—aping injured innocence.
Where is my brother? Answer to thyself,
If conscience leave thee power, and then to me!

GUL. [after a pause, during which she seems too agitated to speak.] Called I that wretchedness which wrung my soul

When morn's unwelcome beam chased visioned joys?
Deemed I that misery, which was but grief,
Undarkened by dishonor's with'ring touch—

* The Caraminia, an eastern flower of great beauty, is so deadly in its nature that it poisons the very air where it grows.

Unlinked with this most foul, polluting stain?
Murder? I dream; some nightmare of my brain
Possesses me; I sleep not!—'t will not off—
Murder? Thou mean'st it not: Oh! couldst thou think
These hands, which were insured perchance to toil,
But taught to be more used to deeds of good,
Could close their sinews in this fiendish act?

These eyes, which morn and eve have bent their gaze
On Allah's throne, nor shrunk from that dread orb,
Which through those casements scann'd the inmost soul,
Could mark the writhing of the anguish'd frame,
The quiver of the black'ning lip, before
Th' unwilling breath, struggling half-spent to hold
Its beauteous tenement, depart? These ears,
So wont to listen to sweet counsellings
Of good from parent lips, could hear unmoved
The cry, the choking prayer, the shudd'ring groan?
This heart, where, if the labored care avail
Of youthful guardians, husbandmen of love—
Were virtue, piety, truth,—the first fruit sown;
Think you could yield forth such a poisoned crop
As to conceive this dark, unhallowed deed?
You wrong not me, so much as nature, who Could render such abortion possible!

ZUL. [aside.] Can this be treachery? My heart convinced
Would warrant ev'ry word. I'll try her further.
Bethink thee well, Gulzara, and confess.
Know you the dungeon for its tenant waits?

GUL. The dungeon? ha! the gloom of Eblis curs't—
The noisome damps to chill my shaking bones—
The suffocating air—th' excluded light—
That common boon which reptiles may enjoy—
The lonely hours—

ZUL. They fright you; well they may:
For they will conjure up your crime, to rise
Most fearful of all visitants, and haunt you.

GUL. [proudly and passionately.] They'll conjure up my innocence! will give Me strength to scorn their puny power, and mock

At thronging horrors which I merit not!
There 's almost crime upon the lips would brand
Me with 't. I did misjudge myself; I have No fear. Injustice lends this sinking form
Her staff of indignation, and I scorn
Your might. Confine, and torture, shackle; what You will, do with this helpless frame; you can Not touch the soaring soul, whose stings alone [walls,
Can pierce, which spurs your threatened dungeon—
And revels in the hallowed freedom, born
Of innocence—not all your force can chain!
Yes, to the dungeon, guiltless I defy
Its deadliest terrors and your cruelty!

[Exit, followed by KATINKA.]

END OF ACT III.

ACT IV.

SCENE I. . . . A fisherman's hut; AYESHA seated on a rude chair mending nets and singing. AMURATH sitting pensively on a low stool, his head leaning on his hand, and his eyes fixed on the ground.

AMU. [after a pause.] Where art thou now, sweet sister?
in thy bower

Weeping alone, and starting wildly, like
Some guilty thing, at ev'ry footstep, lest
It be that one thou dread'st, yet longest
To hear—my father's! and that meeting—oh!
Ayesha, picture to thyself that hour,
And say if in thy pitying bosom beats
A heart with savageness to cause such woe?
Think on her trembling, voiceless, when she meets
My father's eye, and dares not fondly fling
Her soft arms round his neck—and when this blow,
That fells the sturdy oak, is given, oh think
Upon the reed, already bowed, 't will crush;
Think but of this, and then—

AYE. I do think on 't,
Rejoice to paint the scene—dwell over it,
More dotingly, than erst th' enamored king
Hung o'er his chisel's labor as it sprang
To life. Like him I prayed; like him, behold
My wish!

AMU. How wilt thou mourn, dear father; and

Those eyes, long moistureless, will they not weep?
AYE. Such bitter tears as he made flow from mine,
That sapp'd the rosy hue in these wan cheeks,
Falling like ice upon my heart, and froze
The healthful current of its noblest feelings,
Till, petrified, it grew insensible
To Mercy's voice, or Pity's hand, which knock'd
In vain for entrance or response; this was His work—thy sire's.

AMU. Surely he wronged you not?

AYE. Not wronged? Oh, no! they'll say that justice guides
The foot that crushes the unsightly worm
Unconsciously offending: let them then
Pronounce if in the serpent's vengeful sting
There be not equity, and call me just. [rising.]

AMU. [rising and following her to the front of the stage.]
Thy words are sunless mists, whose sombreness
Perplex me more. Thine ill relating, lend
The beam that shall disperse these wild'ring clouds.

AYE. I will, and to thy youthful ears strike awe.
Reared in the palace, daughter of a slave
Whose tuneful zebec charmed your father's ear,
For years I served the Sultan faithfully.
In token of his favor, yet a child,
He did bestow me on the fisherman
Young Mustapha—whom well your father loved.
We were not rich, and yet most happy—for
I did possess that which outvalued all
The luxuries of wealth—one only son.
Wo is the day—the evil day! when stole
The sportive urchin from my watchful eye,
And in an oft committed trespass fell,
Whose penalty the Sultan had proclaimed
A painful death. The fierce chaouches dragged
Him trembling and dismayed—unknowing scarce
His crime, before the Sultan's judgment seat.
Thither in haste I flew, and at his feet
Implored his mercy on my child! He seemed To heed my prayer; but, when I hopeful ceased,
Did mock me with the answer that his life

Was spared—his life! They had not dared to shed
An infant's blood. And what was now that life
Without the joys that gave it worth? or mine
When set the star that lighted it? I prayed
For more: he sternly bade them lead me thence—
My boy to prison—banishment—I know
Not where—the fiat had gone forth—unheeded
My phrenzied rage; they bore him from my sight!
AMU. I cannot think for lasting punishment.
This absence so prolonged—the cares of war,
Have from my father's memory razed your son.
AYE. Not him from mine: that hour I vowed revenge,
And fixed mine eyes on you; through whom 't is found.
Again I sought the palace, but my tears
The scorching fever of revenge had quenched;
Ever some trivial token bearing, I
Forgetful seemed of which all else forgot.
The Sultan's absence in this Persian war,
My hidden purpose favored—of the grove,
My brother being sentinel, through him
I planned that deed to do what now is done!
AMU. And must my life like base-born peasant's pass Within these walls, as though no royal blood
Swelled proudly in my veins?
AYE. These walls, perchance,
Are paradise to those that echo now
The groans of my lost boy.
AMU. You will not be.
So cruel? True, your hapless son, my sire
Consigned to punishment; but 't was for some Misdeed, committed, though unmeant. I harmed
You not; Zuleika never injured you;
Yet strikes your poniard at the breast of both.
Together will we wither, though apart;
You could not bear to see me pine, and pine—
Day after day grow pallid by your side—
And, as the tree whose root some secret worm
Attacks, thus slowly die—while your stretched arm
Could pluck away destruction, and new life
Restore; then give me back my liberty!
AYE. [aside.] He wrings me to the soul; an infant's tongue
Once more within these walls! I wonder not
It moves me—could I—could I—get thee hence
Thou woman's weakness; to thy pining voice
Mine ears are deaf; thou frighted conscience, back!
Thou 'dst shake my purpose—almost now hast shaken;
But no, the image of my injured boy,
Writhing in chains that wound his tender flesh,
Rises reproachfully to blast my sight, [chance!
And nerves me with the strength of—fiends, per-
And then the thought of Suliman's despair,
It is too sweet—this chalice, filled with joys
From his lips stolen—though 't inebriate
With nectar, fallen angels call revenge!
I'll yield it not to pleading pity's prayer.
AMU. Ayesha! dear Ayesha!
AYE. Not one word.
I have already heard too much, beware!
[Resumes her seat and work.]
AMU. No help then? no escape? here must I die!
It may be—but not like the foolish hare
In fear expiring—with no struggle made
For liberty—no effort—or to dry
The flood that for me now is swelling, or
To give it better cause to rise. [sits down.] I've heard
My father say what cities' strength has failed
To conquer, stratagem must win; I'll think
On this. [he muses, during which time AYESHA sings.]
Your boy—his father lives?
AYE. He does.
AMU. But dwells perchance afar?
AYE. On his cast nets
The sun hath twice its length'ning shadows thrown,
And from his stay I augur he has met
With some success; I hourly wait his boat.
AMU. [aside.] I must myself or forge the key that opens
My prison door, or perish for my lack Of skill. [Ponders again.] I have it. Well: it can but fail.
[Rises slowly from his seat and approaches the window in the back scene.]
AYE. [sharply.] What would you?
AMU. Only wile the laggard Time
From his slow pace [aside and archly.] by quickening my own!
[After looking out of the window intently a moment.]
That boat: how swift it nears—it must be he!
A man springs out. [AYESHA rises.] Ayesha! look—nay now
He's hid behind yon rocks.
AYE. 'T is he! I go
To greet him. [rushes out.]
AMU. I, to greet my liberty!
I'm free! father thy tutoring was n't lost!
Yon door leads to the secret path. That barr'd
Behind me, ere the swift foot could gain
The palace by the common road, I shall Be safe within their shielding arms: rejoice
My sister! father! I am yours' again!
[Runs out and is heard to bolt the door behind him; after a moment AYESHA re-enters.]
AYE. I saw nor beat, nor man: what meant you, boy?
[Looks round.] What, gone? not here? Where art thou, Amurath?
Allah protect me! he has fled. [Exit running—is heard to try the door, and returns despairingly.]
Barr'd! barr'd!
Oh! simple head! outwitted by a child!
A puny boy! I'm lost! too surely all
Will be discovered—Death's cold arms are spread
To clasp their victim—fool! to heed his words.
Yet—he is happy! free! how can I mourn?
I was not strong of purpose as I thought
Myself. Already had Remorse dispatched
Her furies dire to lacerate my breast.
He's free—restored—this crime will haunt me not;
I can but share the prison of my boy,
Or in a darker close my weary eyes,
Where shall no vision of his misery rack
My sleep. They shall not drag me hence. I have Deserv'd; and bravely will I meet my fate!

[As she is going, stops, and turns slowly round.]
Farewell! my little hut—what is 't to me,
I never shall behold you more? for ah!
He that so jocund made your rustic walls
Hath bade them long adieu—thou 'lt shelter now,
'T is true, a childless, and a wifeless master.
But since this deed hath darkened all my soul,
It would but tarnish his pure love. Farewell! [Exit.]
SCENE II....A dungeon—night—GULZARA on a pallet of straw—a lamp burning.]
GUL. Thou potent sorceress, Night! how terrible
Thou art! the shadow of thy mantle veils
The direst deeds, but conjures shades to strike
Their guilty doer with a pulseless fear!
He sees in thee th' accomplice of his crime;
And when lull'd memory would sleep, thou art
The grim Promethean vulture to her rest,
That goadest conscience with th' enactment dread,
Of horrors thou conceal'st. The glossing beam
Of daylight brings thy calming opiate, charmed
Forgetfulness—but Night—why think on this?
Can Night bedim the brow of innocence?
And yet these awe-inspiring walls, [rising.] that people
With shadowy forms and grotesque images
My solitude—the desert stillness—all
Appal and fright me; but, 't is only fear!
Who, though she seem to wear Guilt's garment, is
With conscience-searching stings not armed for me.
The doom of crime, not its remorse, is mine,
Its doom indeed—the fearful trial waits!
Nerveless they lead me forth, shrinking, unveiled!
Before the low, reviling throng I stand;
My lips with shame and fear together cling;
My cleaving tongue denies me utterance—hark!
The madd'ning shout of "guilty," breaks my trance!
They near—the frightful executioners—
The bowstring tightens round my struggling neck:
But no, not that—'t is not the mortal pang
I tremble to await—endure—but 't is
This deathful blow, sure aimed, will strike through me
To other hearts—oh! 't is that they must writhe
In anguish far beyond the agonies
I bear. Mother! I know thou wilt not live
To sorrow o'er thy child's dishonor! Father!
This arrow in thy side, that may not kill,
Will goad at ev'ry step! thou thought'st it wo
When, envied and caressed, I mournful left
Thine humble roof—but oh! what earthly sound
Will compass now thy suffering, when thou know'st
Thy daughter's spotless name defiled with crime?
That crime atoned by ignominious death!
Heaven! will they believe th' accusers? No!
Their honest hearts will spurn the base deceit!
But this foul stain will endless cleave to them,
As the sear'd brand that scathes the guilty brow;
And rear a target for scorn's banded bow!
Oh! gentle Patience, tutor me to bear
These dire accumulated ills. The dark
Futurity is shrouded from my view,
But, the high mission from above that rules
Its mysteries, cannot err—and to its will
I yield me now.
[Sinks again on her pallet, and composes herself as though to sleep—the drawing of a bolt heard from without.]
So soon! the bolt draws back—
It is my savage jailor comes to lead
Me to the dreaded trial—oh! that this Foul air were not so clogged—that I could breathe
More free. Alas! that very breath I soon [comes!
May cease to draw. What matters it? [starts up.] He
I am prepared—
Enter ZULEIKA.
Gulzara!
ZUL. [who at first fears to look round, but starts at the sound and rushes forward.] Zuleika! [checking herself.] Come you to comfort or upbraid? for either,
Bootless your errand—since to comfort, you
Must want the power, and to upbraid do lack
The cause—
ZUL. I come for neither, but to pray,
To exhort Gulzara to avow—what shall
I say? the madness that gave birth to this Most monstrous crime.
GUL. I've heard it is their wont,
In lands where tyrants reign and subjects tremble,
On wheels to break, or torture on the rack,
The haplessly accused—till the craz'd wretch
Groan forth confession of black deeds he ne'er
Committed. Princess! are you coldly come
The executioner, to test if I Shall prove as weak?
ZUL. I pardon you the taunt—
Despite conviction, reason, everything,
I cannot think you guilty to this last
Degree—not, not of murder.
GUL. Speak that word
Again! It is the Heaven-sent Nucta drop*
Curing the plague upon my vitals preying.
Oh! I am innocent—you own it? There
Is one, when doomed Gulzara breathes no more,
And the dread story of her guilt is told
In loathing—one, who will proclaim the tale
Is false. You trust me?
ZUL. I must henceforth live
Mistrusting all my senses would approve
If I did not—
GUL. Then is the bowstring but
The bar that draws to open Paradise!
I do not ask for life. What is 't to die
Without the stain that made death terrible?
'T is but 't endure a passing pang—to feel
The last cold quiver of the limbs—then sink
To rest, that fear and care no more disturb.
They, who have suffered in the soul, shall own
That transient pain a jest, to agonies
The spirit must endure. One boon I crave:
When ruthless slaves have done their duty—when
In bloody sockets glare the starting eyes,
And the last stifling sigh is choked, ere 't scape—

* The Nucta drop is supposed to fall from Heaven, on St. John's day, and to have the power of curing those afflicted with the pestilence.

When mocking menials, aweless, shall insult
The freezing corpse with merry ribaldry,
Oh! as thou hop'st to cross Al Sirat's height,
With foot unfaltering, promise me, Zuleika!
My aged parents from thy hand shall know
I perished innocent, as when they last
Called down a blessing on their guileless child!
ZUL. Think not of this; all shall be well with thee;
But my poor Amurath!
GUL. 'T was in the grove
We parted, nor have I beheld him since.
ZUE. He left you then?
GUL. Rather I fled from him,
Warned by a distant voice to haste to you.
ZUL. He followed not?
GUL. Not as I think. This is
Some plot; 't is very strange; [musing.] it shall be solved!
GUL. And happily, grant Mahomet! but if
For me too late, remember then my boon.
ZUL. Too late it will not be. How will I plead
With my loved father, and—
GUL. Bid me not hope;
Think not the Sultan can be pacified
By words. The wrath of power slakes itself
In blood alone; and cool'd, shrinks from the fount
That quenched its burning. When my lips are mute
Thine may awake a sigh—but will not more.
ZUL. Then weaker than the vernal slave's, that makes Us weep for hire, they're grown. My father's name
Hath planted terror in the bravest hearts;
Yet have I seen his cheek grow white, and eyes
Brim o'er, at hist'ry of fictitious wo;
And deem you he will look unmoved on real?
Fear not; I know that thou art guiltless, and Will risk my life to shield thee. Now, adieu!
GUL. Adieu, Zuleika! It doth well beseem
Such gentle purity as thine to come
Dispensing peace—and beauty, in the soft
And mellowing light of virtue's gilding sun,
Making more beautiful. Here at thy feet
I breathe my beggar thanks; thou need'st them not.
Were might of sceptre mine, how poor my pow'r
To tender thee reward. Thy recompense
Hath been to taste the sweets of that first joy
By nature—ay, by Heaven itself, loved best,
The ecstasy of making others blest!
[GULZARA remains kneeling as ZULEIKA exit.]
END OF ACT IV.

ACT V.

SCENE I....Night. The grove brilliantly illuminated. Enter ZULEIKA and FATIMA, bearing baskets of flowers.
FATIMA. This spot will but increase your gloom; why bid
Its shade be lighted, like a festive bower,
When springs from hence the mist that clouds your path?
Let us away, Zuleika, dearest; I
Would try the magic of my lute; but here
'T were powerless. [Gently attempting to lead her away.]
ZUL. Go, if thou wilt; but me
'T will soothe to wander here, where Fancy spreads
Her magic wing, and wafts my brother's voice
To haunt this spot with tones, e'en than thy lute's
More soft. As flowrets o'er the loved one's grave
Affection's hand, a mournful tribute, strews—
So will we consecrate the hallowed earth
That bore his foot-prints last. [they strew the flowers.]
The very wind
With his sweet breath is redolent, and fills
My heart with gladness strange and undefined—
A pleasure waked by hands invisible—
Joy's herald—not himself—but comes he when Proclaimed? I know Gulzara guiltless. Lives
He, then, my brother? "Yes," this heart replies;
But doubts steal in—
FAT. Be Hope their banisher!
Cherish that sun of a chaotic world.
When the dark future frights our weeping eyes,
Were 't not, kind Hope! for thy fictitious light,
That 'lumines half its Memphian gloom, we'd long
For present death, to 'scape the ills to come,
Which, energized by Hope, to bravely meet
Is to disarm. You've said full oft, methinks,
And truly, too, the grey-haired dervishes
Whose converse I so love, almost had made
A moralizer of your Fatima.
Then to the moral that she draws from these,
Your late afflictions, lend a heedful ear!
Clouds that to-day obscure the frowning sky,
To-morrow give it lovelier to the eye:
So shall Zuleika's griefs, that great appear,
But fade, to make her joys restored more dear!
[A noise heard without, as of rejoicing, and the name of "AM-URATH" frequently repeated.]
ZUL. What cry is that? It swells in joy, and—ha!
This name? Amurath! Amurath! again
It rings. Oh! Fatima, my tott'ring feet
Give way—I sink—hist—now the sound is hushed!
FAT. [supporting her.] You tremble; be composed; shall happiness
By her advancing shadow bow to earth
What wo's ungentle grasp hath failed to crush?
AMU. [from behind.] What mean these lights? My sister!
speak—my sister!
[He rushes in amid loud acclamations, and throws himself into the arms of ZULEIKA.]
ZUL. He lives! he lives! Brother, brother—it is—
'T is he indeed! [putting him from her to look at him.]
Surfeit yourselves, ye eyes,
Long fasting; feast ye now upon his face!
AMU. Sweet sister! lov'd Zuleika, once more your's,
This transport kills your happy Amurath!
ZUL. Nay, thou hast been a century dead to me,
And welcome as one, mourned within the grave,
Uprisen from the tomb, art come. Where hast
Thou been?
AMU. In sorrow equal to thine own,
* Summan is described as having been one of the greatest warriors amongst the Turks, and to have gained more battles than any other monarch, and yet to have added great weakness of character to his military virtues, being the slave of his feelings and passions.

Coop'd in most rustic cage; but I cajoled
My jailer—to myself gave liberty;
And flew to thee through darkness—night—I scarce
Know how, unless some guardian spirit, moved
By love of thee, guided my doubtful steps.

ZUL. And brought thee safe! What multitudes of thanks
Shall crowd the gates of Paradise for this!
Where hast thou been? Whose was the savage hand
Could give thee pain, mine own, my Amurath?
Oh! dearly shall they rue this hour—who was't?
And how?

AMU. Along the secret path, when fled
Gulzara at your feet, Ayesha bore—
ZUL. Not Mustapha's fair-featured wife? the slave
Whom Suliman's long favor would enrich?
Oh! seeming, seeming, what a cheat thou art!
While triumphs base Ayesha in her crime,
Gulzara in the loathsome vault enjailed
Makes us, in our supposed sagacity,
Tyrants and blinded dupes of outward show!

AMU. Gulzara dungeon'd? sister, mean you that?
The gentle Persian? you permitted this?
Speed, speed, to burst her shameful bonds, myself
I will entreat her pardon for this wrong. [Going.]

ZUL. Stay, greedy brother mine, feign would I share
Thy rapture, basking in the light of her's,
Say not I ask too much! Katinka waits
To lead her hither— [claps her hands.]

[Enter KATINKA.]

Free the youthful Persian,
And to our presence guide her speedily;
Bid her not grieve, but give not voice the joy
That waits her when she here before us stands.

[Exit KATINKA.]

AMU. How could suspicion light on her?

ZUL. Alas!
'T was feared ambition prompted her the deed.
She was forewarned while lived the Sultan's heir
Must Suliman be still Sultanaless.
Sudden you disappeared—this tell-tale cloak
Was in her chamber found. Wandering alone
With her the household slaves beheld you last:
Chance was her criminal and not we.
The future shall efface the past—but thou,
Art thou indeed restored, my Amurath?
Can I believe it is no dream that gives Thee to my longing eyes?

AMU. If 't is, we'll sleep
For aye, and mingle with the waking world
No more.

[Enter KATINKA.]

KAT. Princess she comes, but with no smile
Dimpling her pallid cheek.

FAT. [to AMURATH.] Your presence may Too suddenly surprise her—joy hath killed
What grief but gave a sharper sense of being,
As though death's angel loved to snatch the soul
In bliss—but sickly shunned its hour of woe:
I pray you then withdraw awhile!

AMU. [complainingly.] My thanks
Good lady Hakim! your prescription suits
Me ill; not see the transport that my flight,
(Which was not of the easiest,) helped to cause?
Nay shake not thus thy sapient head—I must Remain—yet, since your potion is too large,
We'll halve it, by your leave. It shall be so:
Her will I safely see—but she not me—
At least not while I can restrain myself.

[Conceals himself among the trees.]

[Enter GULZARA, dejectedly.]

ZUL. Ever so mournful sad, Gulzara? I
Had hoped the converse of to-night dispelled
Your gloom.

GUL. Not mournful, but with thoughts upturned
To where they may be soon for ever fixed!

ZUL. You are oppressed, but quick upon the heels
Of grief tread happiness to chase her back.
And said I not Gulzara—aye, this night—
I knew your innocence?

GUL. You did believe
My protestations, and I thank you for 't.

ZUL. I now do more—I know them to be true!

GUL. [agitatedly.] You have no proof? The Prince—your brother—is— [claims aloud]

AMU. [leaping in her arms.]—Here, dear Gulzara, and pro-
Your innocence!

GUL. Oh! holy prophet! I
Had scarcely dared to pray for this. Unharm'd!
Safe, art thou, angel boy! O, father! mother!
Lift up your heads again! And now come, Death,
Near as before—I fear thee not. Now, if I yield me yours, 't is not in ignominy!

AMU. First shall a life of happiness atone
For all the ills we have occasioned you!

GUL. [gazing at him.] Again that tone! How thrills it through my soul,

As something long familiar to these ears?
The song, whose words forgot, haunts with its air!
Was ever brow moulded so seemingly Like his? Or, is it that these eyes so oft
Have wept to view that face once more, they find
A visioned semblance in all loveliness?

[Enter KATINKA.]

KAT. Ayesha to your gracious presence prays Admission. Princess, shall we entrance give?

ZUL. Unsummoned comes she then? Knows she, her guilt
Discovered, direct punishment awaits
Its perpetrator? Lead her hither. [Exit KATINKA.]

AMU. Sister,
I pity her—in sooth I do,—and she Hath heavy grief endured.

ZUL. And heavier would Give thee, my cherished brother! Pardonless
The hand that menaced thee one minute's pain!
Your pity you but waste. I shall not mine.

Enter KATINKA, followed by AYESHA, who kneels to ZU-LEIKA, as in contrition, her head bent down and her hands folded on her breast.

Come you within the lion's den to tempt
His wrath? Your guilt has been already voic'd,
And tarries not its retribution just.

AYE. Great is the Sultan! Where should I conceal
This fated head to 'scape his anger? but I do beseech you hear what scourges lashed
Me to this phrenzied deed. I had not strength,
If favor chanced, to give my will insane
Its wished-for execution. Ere he 'scaped
I wavered—shrank. His pleadings touched my heart.

ZUL. Boast you a heart, that with such mortal pangs
Wring that of others? You, who ruthless raised
O'er this offenceless being the rude arm
Of violence? The thought, with a wild fire—
Stranger till now—kindles my burning veins.
Quick—take her hence. Within a dungeon chained,
Without one glimmer of that sun, whose face
Her crime pollutes—mutes for her guardians—and Her ear (deaf to my brother's pleadings,) let
No sound of human melody beguile.
Away with her!

AYE. Not yet! One instant grant!
Not till you hear me! 'T was your sire, not I,
Performed this deed. His cruelly urged me to 't.

ZUL. Would you wake mercy in the daughter's breast
Attaining, with malignant charge, the father?
Kindness to you to earth were cruelty,
And fostering the adder, Vice, to bare
Each fenceless bosom to its fang—begone!

AYE. Judge me not harshly!

ZUL. Not by me, wilt thou
Be judged—but hope no leniency—enough!

AMU. Yet hear her, sister, only hear her tale.

AYE. You supplicate for her who injured? shall
The vulture find a wounded dove its shield?
You cannot loath me as I hate myself,
Hate what I am, but mourn what I have been.

[Rising.] Princess! six changeable moons ago, I would Have started, horror-struck as thou, at thought
Of what hath so debased me now—but time
And despot circumstance work woeful change!

I had a son—one only son—he was Care's certain selace, joy's sweet messenger,
The focus whence diverged each ray of bliss
That lighted my existence. List whose hand
Snatched that sole beam and darkened it for ever.
A new decree whose violation brought
The penalty of death, the ill-starred boy

Unconscious broke; your father, at my prayer,—
Mock-merciful,—his life, not pardon, grants.
Whether enjailed, enslaved, or banished, what
His punishment I knew not, know not now,—
But sorrow o'er the knowledge how they bore
The struggling, weeping infant from my sight;

And, with him, ev'ry kindly feeling nursed
Within this breast, leaving to frantic grief,
That seeming comforter, Revenge! Thenceforth
It was my household God—I was transformed!

Not Tigress ravished of her young, was more
Athrast to glut her rage—from my own heart
I knew how well your father loved his son,
And vowed to plunge the dagger in his breast
With which he recklessly stabbed mine! that I
Was baffled, I rejoice, and rather now
Would meet the fate that waits me than have lived
More darkly doomed, with mem'ry of this crime.

ZUL. [turning from her.] It was too black—too dreadful—thou art safe

My brother, but thy danger frights me still.

AYE. [slowly advancing and again kneeling.] I scarcely dare implore your mercy! yet
Reflect upon the wrongs that to this deed
Were goading me!

ZUL. Bid me reflect upon

The deed itself—my father's agony—

My brother's pain—I have no mercy left!

No pardon!

AYE. 'T is a fearful thing to die!

ZUL. Is't not more fearful to deserve to die!

AYE. Had even the noblest of frail mortals his Deserts, oh, who would then escape rebuke?

Gentle Sultana, pity my affliction.

ZUL. No more, you would unpoise the righteous scales
Of Justice, I command you, peace!

AMU. Let me

Entreat you, sister, grant to me this boon?

Never before have I beheld your eye

So stern, your brow knit with such threatening frowns.

ZUL. Who harms my brother never should behold
It otherwise.

AMU. Yet freely from my heart
I do forgive her. If you sorrow'd much
In wanting me, then what her agony
When her loved son was rudely snatched away?

ZUL. I never did refuse your lightest wish,
But plead not, brother, now, for this I must Not grant, and will not hearken to.

FAT. I wronged

Gulzara by too hasty judgment. My Atonement let me to this supplicant
Transfer, imploring that you pardon her!

ZUL. Spare me your prayers. When his has been withstood
I shall not listen to your voice.

GUL. [advancing.] List, then,
To mine! She to the dungeon you condemned—
Incarcerated for another's crime—
Thrust 'fore whose eyes anticipated death,
Beseeches you to let her suff'ring pass
As this repentant one's, and pardon her.
Remember—Power, when robed in leniency,
Not strength, wears loveliest semblance when display'd
To pardon penitence, not punish guilt;
Bespeaks true nobleness of majesty!
And Justice finds her things oft powerless
To chasten hearts the smile of goodness wins
To imitate herself; then emulate,
In clemency to this your slave, the sway
Of pitying Heav'n, whose high prerogative
Most needed, most employed; is 't not to pardon?

AMU. Had I thousand tongues, Zuleika, each
Should plead with hers—and should they plead in vain?

ZUL. [first turning to one, then to the other.]

Brother! Gulzara! You have conquered! Rise,
Ayesha! and thy future life, not swords,

Proclaim thy gratitude. Thou art forgiven.

AYE. Let me still kneel, until thy bounty is Complete. Give not a life that's valueless,
Withholding what imparts its worth—my child!

ZUL. Shall be restored.

AYE. Joy, joy too great to bear!

My son restored! His blue eyes once again

The Heaven of my own! His prattling tongue

Making my glad heart to its music dance!

Oh, Princess! sunk as by this act I am

Beneath humanity, I shall not prove

Than senseless beasts more thankless; and there is

A Roman tale, that memorates of old

A hunger'd lion,* moved by gratitude,

Who, recognizing, shrank from offered prey,

Nor on the well-remembered hand that erst

Did cure his wound, appeased his famishing.

That tale is graven on my heart. A life

Of faithful service shall express the thanks

I have no tongue to speak—but whose warm flood

O'erflows my grateful eyes.

ZUL. I need them not:

Who doeth well, finds in the act itself

His action's noblest recompense.

AMU. I share

Your pleasure, dearest sister, and almost

Had borne the anguish of dread yesterday

For this sweet hour's ecstasy.

FAT. And I

Re-echo all your bliss, and only need

Gulzara's pardon of defaming doubts

To make complete my own.

GUL. Freely 't is yours

[aside.] And I—while ev'ry lip and ev'ry eye

Beams in the sunny light of happiness,

Stronger, by contrast, seem the shadows o'er

Mine own. Hated! while other sorrows filled

My breast, almost wert thou forgot. They pass

Away—but leave the cank'ring thought of thee,
That cannot part, eternal in their stead.

Enter KATINKA bearing a scroll.

KAT. [kneeling as she presents it.] Great Suliman sends to Zuleika greeting.

ZUL. How pleasure, when she opes her hand, pours down

Her gifts!

AMU. Sister, read quick, what says our sire?

ZUL. His foot is on his enemies' breast. Gian

Ben Gian Aegis guards his form. His brow

Enwreathed—victorious he returns.

GUL. Returns!

AMU. When may we look for him?

ZUL. [still reading.] To-morrow's dawn.

GUL. [aside.] So soon? yet why this foolish trembling? is

This face more fair, than those by smiles that court

His lightest look made beauteous, that he e'er

Should waste a glance upon the hapless Persian?

AMU. Sister, you smile: what says he more?

ZUL. Can I

Read right? [reads aloud.] "Garland your walls, summon your choirs

Of sweetest warblers: sandal, swift, anew

The wing'd feet of your loveliest dancers: all

Festivities besecoming to his state

Prepare, to welcome Suliman's new bride!"

How 's this? [reads on apparently much astonished.]

There is some witchery in these times!

Gulzara, with to-morrow's dawn, we haste

To meet the bridegroom Sultan. Whom dost think

Our glad hands shall as proud Sultana deck?

GUL. [pauses, looks round, and her eyes rest smiling on FATI-

MA.] Gaze-eyed Fatima, perchance?

ZUL. Nay, now

You err in very modesty: mingle

Thy joys with ours—it is Gulzara's self!

OMNES. Gulzara?

GUL. I! oh, what a sport of Fate

Have I become! Spare me your merriment—

Soon will I strive to share your mirth, but now

I am too sad—too weakened by distress—

Say but you mean not this.

ZUL. Ungracious maid!

Has my hand, think you, been so prone to wound?

Oft has my father said, while lived this youth

His worshipped Roxelana's son, and my Departed mother's, should no new Sultana

His splendor share, or gay Zenana rule;

Yet now he bids me for the nuptial feast

Prepare. Peraia's wild rose, Gulzara, hail,

His chosen bride! 'T is strange, I own, but true.

Why look you so dismayed? This is, or should

The hour of jovial gratulation be.

GUL. Oh! no, no, not to me! Allah! to wed

The Sultan Suliman? to join with his

This hand foresworn, with perjured lips to vow

Eternal faith, and endless love, to mock

The throne of Allah with false oaths, when I

Have neither love to give or faith to vow?

Rather like faithful Dido, when the voice

Of suppliant subjects bade her in her lord's

Lamented place a rival throne—I'd light

Mine own funeral pile—rather would wed,

(Rich in this fond heart's wealth,) the poorest serf,

That tills the earth to gain his hard-earn'd bread;

Suffer oppression, infamy with him;

Tell, starve with him, than, my allegiance sworn

Another's, be the Harem-envied bride,

Sultana of the Sultap Suliman,

Queen of his heart, and Empress of the East.

ZUL. This is untoward—yet, I blame you not;

Had I so loved, as constant would I prove:

What says my father more? [Reads.] Wonders on wonders!

"Then know! I had determined, ne'er to wed:

But who shall with his Heav'n ruled Kisma war?

List to my tale: Beguiling with the chase

* Androclus was protected in the Roman Circus by a lion whose foot he had healed.

† The shield of Gian ben Gian was as famous among the orientals as that of Achilles among the Greeks. It was in the hands of the three Sulimans consecutively, and they are said to have performed miraculous exploits by its assistance; it also guarded its wearer from the wounds of the enemy.

The hours of truce, a huntsman, as he seemed,
On the green borders of the Tigris viewed
A maiden writhing in a Giaour's grasp;
And mentioning back his train did rescue her!
You that have seen Gulzara wonder not
They met again. He vowed that she should be
His bride—but tested first her faith to know
If rather she would live the favored slave
Of Suliman, or wife of her unknown.
She passed the ordeal, 't was himself, not state,
Which she I think yet dreams not of, she loved—
And shall be as he swore her huntsman's bride!"

GUL. Hafed! [Faints—she supports her.]

AMU. Oh! sister, with this sudden joy
You've killed her—see—

ZUL. Katinka, haste thee, fly!

KAT. Tis needless noble Princess, she revives.

FAT. Then give her air, she lacks but breath, new life
This happy news already has bestowed.

AMU. She opens her eyes, Gulzara, speak to us?

GUL. That voice again? Where is he? Hafed! art
Thou there? I let me but look upon thee ere
I die.

AMU. 'T is Amurath, your Hafed's son,
Or Suliman's, that bids you for his sake
To live!

GUL. Was it no vision then? is he?

AMU. And Amurath thou art—is Hafed then—

ZUL. The Sultan Suliman!

AMU. Our father.

GUL. I am—

ZUL. His bride!

FAT. and KAT. [saluting her.] Our new Sultana hail!

GUL. Now, may I share your transports, never more
At fate's harsh seeming murmur, for her wheel
Revolving ever, hurls us to its base

To hurry to the summit with more speed.

ZUL. And with this latter evolution bears
Jays pinnacle a goodly throng to-night,
What have I left to wish? my brother back—

[Embracing him.]

AMU. Freed by himself! sweet sister when you tell
Our father my mischance, forget not that!

FAT. and KAT. Your joy is ours!

AYE. My lov'd boy once more mine!

GUL. And Hafed, Suliman—hail happy end!

No more Zuleika's brow with frowns shall bend,
Ayesha fierceness feign she ne'er could feel,
Or wo of Amurath bid tear drops steal
To pitying orbs that smiling greet his weal;
Or Fatima's bright eyes, and morals sage,
Contend which most your pleasure could engage;
Or mild Katinka, though her station low,
Still hope to share the praises you bestow.
Our mimic passions o'er, [to the actors.] each lip that grieved

In fabled sorrow, be with smiles enwreathed.
Those lips now welcome mirth with keener zest
Nor mourn their wo [to the audience.] if echoed in your breast.

If, courteous still, by our emotions led,
You now will share our gladness in grief's stead,
And grant the boon Gulzara yet must crave
Your pleased approval of—

OMNES. The Persian Slave!

THE END.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

On quitting the house, a deep sigh of disappointment escaped him. As he gazed for a moment with longing eyes at the windows of the room in which Miss Aubrey was sitting, he felt profound depression of spirit; he had altogether failed; and he had a sort of cursed consciousness that he deserved to fail, on every account. Her image was before his mind's eye every moment while he was threading his way back to his chambers at Thavies' Inn; he sat for an hour or two before the remnant of his fire, lost in a reverie; and sleep came not to his eyes till a late hour in the morning. Just as his tortuous mind was loosing hold of its sinister purposes in sleep, Mr. Aubrey might have been seen taking his seat in his little study, having spent a restless and weary night. 'T was little more than half-past four o'clock when he entered, candle in hand, the scene of his early and cheerful labors, and took his seat before his table covered with loose manuscripts and books. His face was certainly overcast with anxiety, but his soul was calm and resolute. Having lit his fire, he placed his candle on the table, and leaning back for a moment in his chair, while the flickering increasing light of his crackling fire and candle, revealed to him, with a sense of snugness, his shelves crammed with books, and the window covered with an ample crimson curtain, effectually excluding the chill morning air—he reflected with a heavy sigh upon the precarious tenure by which he held the little comforts that were yet left to him. Oh!—thought he—if Heaven were but to relieve me from the frightful pressure of liability under which I am bound to the earth, what labor, what privation would I repine at! What gladness would not spring up in my heart! But rousing himself from vain thoughts of this kind, he began to arrange his manuscripts, when his ear caught a sound on the stair—'t was the light step of his sister, coming down to perform her promised undertaking—not an unusual one by any means—to transcribe for the press the manuscript he was about completing that morning. "My sweet Kate," said he tenderly, as she entered with her little chamber light, which she extinguished as she entered—"I am really grieved to see you stirring so early—go back to bed." But she kissed his cheek affectionally, and refused to do any such thing; and telling him of the restless night she had passed, of which indeed her pale and depressed features bore but too legible evidence, she sat herself down in her accustomed place, nearly opposite to him, cleared away space enough for her little desk, and then opening it, was presently engaged in her delightful task—for to her it was indeed delightful—of copying out her brother's composition. Thus she sat, silent and industrious—scarce opening her lips, except to ask him to explain an illegible word or so, till the hour had arrived—eight o'clock—for the close of their morning toil. The reader will be pleased to hear that the article on which they had been engaged—and which was on a question of foreign politics, of great difficulty and importance—produced him a cheque for sixty guineas, and excited very general attention and admiration. Oh, how precious was this reward of honorable and severe toil! How it cheered him who had earned it, and those who were, alas! entirely dependent upon his noble exertions! And how sensibly it augmented their little means! Grateful, indeed, were all of them for the success which had attended his labors!

As I do not intend to occupy the reader with any details relating to Mr. Aubrey's Temple avocations, I shall content myself with saying that the more Mr. Weasel and Mr. Aubrey came to know of each other, the more Aubrey respected his legal knowledge and ability, and he, Aubrey's intellectual energy and successful application, which, indeed, consciously brought home to Aubrey its own reward, in the daily acquisition of solid learning, and increasing facility in the use of it. His mind was formed for things, and was not apt to occupy itself with mere words, or technicalities. He was ever in quest of the principles of law, its reason, and spirit. He quickly began to appreciate the sound, practical good sense on which almost all the rules of law are founded, and the effectual manner in which they are accommodated to the innumerable and ever-varying exigencies of human affairs. The mere forms and technicalities of the law, Mr. Aubrey often compared to short-hand, whose characters to the uninitiated appear quaint and useless, but are perfectly invaluable to him who has seen the object, and patiently acquired the use of them. Whatever Mr. Aubrey's hand found to do, while studying the law, he did it, indeed, with his might—which is the grand secret of the difference in the success of different persons addressing themselves to legal studies. Great or small, easy or difficult, simple or complicated, interesting or uninteresting, he made a point of mastering it thoroughly, and, as far as possible, by his own efforts; which generated early a habit of self-reliance which no one better than he knew the value of—how inestimable, how indispensable, not to the lawyer merely, but to any one entrusted with the responsible management of affairs. In short, he had all the success which is sure to attend the exertions of a man of superior sense and spirit, who is in earnest in what he is about. He frequently surprised Mr. Weasel with the exactness and extent of his legal information—his acuteness, clear-headedness, and tenacity in dealing with matters of downright difficulty—and Mr. Weasel had several times, in consultation, an opportunity of expressing his very flattering opinion concerning Mr. Aubrey to the Attorney-General. The mention of that eminent person reminds me of an observation which I intended to have made some time ago. The reader is not to imagine, from my silence upon the subject, that Mr. Aubrey, in his fallen fortunes, was heartlessly forgotten or neglected by the distinguished friends and associates of former and more prosperous days. It was not they that withdrew from him, but he that withdrew from them; and that, too, of set purpose, resolutely adhered to, on the ground that it could not be otherwise, without seriously interfering with the due prosecution of those plans of life on which were dependent not only his all, and that of those connected with him—but his fond hopes of yet extricating himself, by his own personal exertions, from the direful difficulties and dangers which at present environed him—of achieving, with his own right hand, independence. The Attorney-General frequently called to inquire how he was getting on; and, let me not forget here to state a fact which I conceive infinitely to redound to poor Aubrey's honor—viz., that he thrice refused offers made him from very high quarters, of considerable sinecures, i. e. handsome salaries for purely nominal services—which he was earnestly and repeatedly reminded would at once afford him a liberal maintenance, and leave the whole of his time at his own disposal, to follow any pursuit or profession which he chose. Mr. Aubrey justly considered that it was very difficult, if not indeed impossible, for any honorable and high-minded man to be a sinecurist. He that holds a sinecure, in my opinion, is plundering the public; and how it is less contrary to the dictates of honor and justice, deliberately to defraud an individual, than deliberately and openly to defraud that collection of individuals called the public, let casuists determine. As for Mr. Aubrey, he saw stretching before him the clear, straight, bright line of honor, and he resolved to follow it, without faltering or wavering, come what come might. He resolved, with the blessing of Providence, that his own exertions should procure his bread, and, if such was the will of Heaven, lead him to distinction among mankind. He had formed this determination, and resolved to work it out—never to pause or give way, but to die in the struggle. Such a spirit must conquer, whatever is opposed to it. What is difficulty? Only a word indicating the degree of strength requisite for accomplishing particular objects; a mere notice of the necessity for exertion; a bugbear to children and fools; only a mere stimulus to men.

Mr. Gammon felt very little difficulty in putting off Mr. Quirk from his purpose of enforcing the payment by Mr. Aubrey of the balance of his account; in demonstrating to him the policy of waiting a little longer. He pledged himself, when the proper time came, to adopt measures of undoubted efficacy—assuring his sullen senior in a low tone, that since his letter had reached Mr. Aubrey, circumstances had occurred which would render it in the last degree dangerous to press that gentleman upon the subject. What that was which had happened, Mr. Gammon, as usual, refused to state. This was a considerable source of vexation to the old gentleman: but he had a far greater one, in the decisive and fatal overthrow of his fondly cherished hopes concerning his daughter's alliance with Titmouse. The paragraph in the "Aurora," announcing Mr. Titmouse's engagement to his brilliant relative, the Lady Cecilia, had emanated from the pen of Mr. Gammon, who had had several objects in view in giving early publicity to the event he announced in such courtly terms. Happening on the morning on which it appeared, to be glancing over the fascinating columns of the Aurora, at a public office, (the paper taken in at their own establishment being the Morning Gossip;) he made a point of purchasing that day's Aurora; and on returning to Saffron Hill, he inquired whether Mr. Quirk were at home. Hearing that he was sitting alone, in his room—in rushed Mr. Gammon, breathless with surprise and haste, and plucking the paper out of his pocket—"by heavens, Mr. Quirk!"—he almost gasped, as he doubled down the paper to the place where stood the announcement in question, and put it into Mr. Quirk's hands—"this young fellow's given you the slip, after all! See!"—The moment that my back is turned,"

Mr. Quirk having with a little trepidation adjusted his spectacles, perused the paragraph with a somewhat flushed face. He had, in fact, for some time had grievous misgivings on the subject of his chance of becoming the father-in-law of his distinguished client, Mr. Titmouse; but now his faintest glimmering of hope was suddenly and completely extinguished, and the old gentlemen felt quite desolate. He looked up, on finishing the paragraph, and gazed rather ruefully at his indignant and sympathizing companion.

"It seems all up, Gammon, certainly—do n't it?" said he, with a flustered air.

"Indeed, my dear air, it does! You have my sincerest!"

"Now, come, t' other end of the thing, Gammon! You know every promise of marriage has two ends—one joins the heart, and t' other the pocket; out heart, in pocket—so have at him, by Jove!" He rose up and rubbed his hands as he stood before the fire. "Breach of promise—thundering damages—devilish deep purse—special jury—broken heart, and all that! I wish he'd written her more letters! Adad, I'll have a shot at him by next assizes—a writ on the file this very day! What d'ye think on t', friend Gammon, between ourselves?"

"Why, my dear air—to tell you the truth—ar' n't you really well out of it? He's a miserable little upstart—he'd have made a wretched husband for so superior a girl as Miss Quirk."

"Ah—ay! ay! She is a good girl, Gammon—there you're right; would have made the best of wives—my eyes, (between ourselves!) how that'll go to the jury! 'Gad, I fancy I see 'em—perhaps all of 'em daughters of their own."

"Looking at the thing calmly, Mr. Quirk," said Gammon, gravely—apprehensive of Mr. Quirk's carrying too far so very absurd an affair—"where's the evidence of the promise? Because, you know, there's certainly something depends on that—eh?"

"Evidence! Deuse take you, Gammon! where are your wits? Evidence! Lots—lots of it! A' n't there I, her father? A' n't I a competent witness? Wait and see old Caleb Quirk get into the box. I'll settle his hash in half a minute."

"Yes—if you're believed, perhaps."

"Believe be—! Who's to be believed, if her own father is n't!"

"Why, you may be too much swayed by your feelings!" "Feelings be—! It's past all that; he has none—so he must pay, for he has cash! He ought to be made an example of!"

"Still, to come to the point, Mr. Quirk, I vow it quite leaves me—this matter of the evidence."

"Evidence? Why, Lord bless my soul, Gammon," quoth Quirk, testily, "have n't you had your eyes and ears open all this while? 'Gad, what a crack witness you'd make! A man of your—your intellect—serve a friend at a pinch—and in a matter about his daughter? Ah, how often you've seen 'em together—walking, talking, laughing, dancing, riding—writ in her album—made her presents, and she him. Evidence? Oceans of it, and to spare! Secure Subtle—and I would n't take £5000 for my verdict!"

"Why, you see, Mr. Quirk," said Gammon, very seriously—"though I've striven my utmost these six months to bring it about, the artful little scamp has never given me the least thing that I could lay hold of, and swear to."

"Oh, you'll recollect enough, in due time, friend Gammon, if you'll only turn your attention to it; and if you'll bear in mind it's life and death to my poor girl. Oh Lord! I must get my sister to break it to her, and I'll send sealed instructions to Mr. Weasel, shall we, say t' Lynx or Lynx ay, Lynx; for he'll then have to fight for his own pleadings; and can't turn round at the trial and say, 'this is not right,' and 'that's wrong,' and, 'why did n't you have such and such evidence?' Lynx is the man; and I'll lay the venue in Yorkshire, for Titmouse is devilish dialiked down there; and a special jury will only be too glad to give him a desperate slap in the chops! We'll lay the damages at twenty thousand pounds! Ah, ha! I'll teach the young villain to break the hearts of an old man and his daughter. But, egad"—he pulled out his watch—"half past two; and Nicky Crowbar sure to be put up at three! By Jove! I won't do to be out of the way; he's head of the gang, and they always come down very liberal when they're in trouble. Snap! Amminadab! hollo! who's there? Drat them all, why do n't they speak?" The old gentleman was soon, however, attended to.

"Are they here?" he inquired, as Mr. Amminadab entered.

"Yes, sir, all three; and the coach is at the door, too. Nicky Crowbar's to be up at three, sir."

"I see—I know—I'm ready," replied Mr. Quirk, who was presently seated in the coach with three gentlemen, to whom he minutely explained the person of Mr. Nicky Crowbar, and the place at which it was quite certain that Mr. Crowbar could not have been at half past eight o'clock on Tuesday, the 9th of July, seeing that he happened at that precise time to be elsewhere, in company with these three gentlemen—to wit, at Chelsea, and not at Clapham.

Though Mr. Gammon thus sympathized with one of the gentle beings who had been "rified of all their sweetness," I grieve to say that the other, Miss Tag-rag, never occupied his thoughts for one moment. He neither knew nor cared whether or not she was apprized of the destruction of all her fond hopes, by the paragraph which had appeared in the Aurora. In fact, he felt that he had really done enough, on the part of Mr. Titmouse, for his early friend and patron, Mr. Tag-rag, on whom the stream of fortune had set in strong and steady; and, in short, Mr. Gammon knew that Mr. Tag-rag had received a substantial memento of his connexion with Tittlebat Titmouse. In fact, how truly disinterested a man was Mr. Gammon toward all with whom he came in contact! What had he not done, as I have been saying, for the Tag-rags? What for the Earl of Dreddlington? What for Mr. Quirk, and even Snap? As for Mr. Quirk, had he not been put in possession of his long coveted bond for £10,000? of which, by the way, he allotted £1000 only to the man—Mr. Gammon—by whose unwearied exertions and consummate ability he obtained so splendid a prize, and £300 to Mr. Snap. Then, had not Mr. Quirk also been paid his bill against Titmouse of £5000 and upward, and £2500 by Mr. Aubrey? And, governed by the articles of their partnership, what a lion's half of this spoil had not been appropriated to the respectable old head of the firm? Mr. Gammon did undoubtedly complain indignantly of the trifling portion allotted to him, but he was encountered by such a desperate pertinacity on the part of Mr. Quirk as baffled him entirely, and caused him to abandon his further claim in disgust and despair. Thus the £20,000 obtained by Mr. Titmouse, on mortgage of the Yatton property, was reduced at once to the sum of £5000; but out of this handsome balance had yet to come, first, £800, with interest, due to Mr. Quirk for subsistence-money advanced to his protégé; secondly, £500 due to Mr. Snap, for monies alleged to have been also lent by him to his friend Titmouse at different times, in the manner that has been already explained to the reader—Snap's demand for repayment being accompanied by verbatim copies of between forty and fifty memoranda, many of them in pencil, notes of hand, receipts, I. O. U's, in whose handwriting the figures representing the sums lent, and the times when, could not be ascertained, and did not signify; it being, in point of law, prima facie evidence for Snap, in the event of a trial, simply to produce the documents and prove the signature of his friend, Mr. Titmouse. Titmouse discharged a volley of imprecations at Snap's head, on receiving this unexpected claim, and referred it to Mr. Gammon, who, after subjecting it to a bona fide and very rigorous examination, found it in vain to attempt to resist, or even diminish it; such perfect method and accuracy had Snap observed in his accounts, that they secured him a clear gain of £350; the difference between that sum and £500 being the amount actually and bona fide advanced by him to Titmouse. Deducting, therefore, £1300, (the amount of the two minor demands of £800 and £500 above specified,) there remained, to Mr. Titmouse, out of the £20,000, the sum of £3700; and he ought to have been thankful; for he might have got nothing—or even have been brought in debtor to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap. I say that Mr. Gammon would seem, from the above statement of accounts, not to have been dealt with in any degree adequately to his merits. He felt it so, but soon reconciled himself to it, occupied as he was with arduous and extensive speculations, amidst all the complication of which he never for a moment lost sight of one object, viz.—himself. His schemes were boldly conceived, and he went about the accomplishment of them with equal patience and sagacity. Almost every thing was going as he could wish. He had contrived to place himself in a very convenient fast-and-loose sort of position with reference to his fellow-partners; one which admitted of his easily disengaging himself from them, whenever the proper time arrived for taking such a step.

He was absolute and paramount over Titmouse, and could always secure his instant submission, by virtue of the fearful and mysterious talisman which he ever and anon flashed before his startled eyes. He had acquired great influence, also, over the Earl of Dreddlington—an influence which was constantly on the increase; and had seen come to pass an event which he judged to be of great importance to him—namely, the engagement between Titmouse and the Lady Cecilia. Yet was there one object which he had proposed to himself as incalculably valuable and supremely desirable—as the consummation of all his designs and wishes; I mean the obtaining the hand of Miss Aubrey—and in which he had yet a fearful misgiving of failure. But he was a man whose courage rose with every obstacle; and he fixedly resolved within himself to succeed, at any cost. "It was not alone his exquisite appreciation of her personal beauty—her grace, her accomplishments, her lovely temper, her lofty spirit, her high birth—objects all of them dazzling enough to a man of such a powerful and ambitious mind, and placed in such circumstances in life as Gammon. There were certain other considerations, intimately involved in all his calculations, which rendered success in this affair a matter of capital importance—nay, indispensable. Knowing, as I do, what had passed, at different times, between that proud and determined girl, and her constant and enthusiastic lover, Mr. Delamere, I am as certain as a man can be of any thing that has not actually happened, that, though she may possibly not be fated to become Mrs. Delamere, she will certainly never become—Mrs. Gammon. Loving Kate as I do, and being thoroughly acquainted with Gammon, I feel deep interest in his movements, and am watching them with great apprehension—she, lovely, innocent, unsuspecting; he, subtle, selfish, unscrupulous, desperate! And he has great power in his hands: is he not silently surrounding his destined prey with unperceived but inevitable meshes? God guard thee, my Kate, and reward thy noble devotion to thy brother and his fallen fortunes! Do we chide thee for clinging to them with fond tenacity in their extremity, when thou art daily importuned to enter into that station which thou wouldst so adorn?"

Gammon's reception by the Aubreys, in Vivian street—kind and courteous though it had surely been—had ever since rankled in his heart. Their abstaining from a request to him to prolong his stay, or to renew his visits, he had noted at the time, and had ever since reflected upon with pique and discouragement. Nevertheless, he was resolved, at all hazards, to become at least an occasional visitor in Vivian street. When a fortnight had elapsed, without any further intimation to Mr. Aubrey concerning the dreaded balance due to the firm, Gammon ventured to call in, for the purpose of assuring Mr. Aubrey that it was no mere temporary lull; that he might divest his mind of all uneasiness on the subject; and of asking whether he (Gammon) had not told Aubrey truly that he both could and would restrain the hand of Mr. Quirk. Could Mr. Aubrey be otherwise than grateful for such active and manifestly disinterested kindness? Again Gammon made his appearance at Mrs. Aubrey's tea-table—and was again received with all the sweetness and frankness of manner which he had formerly experienced from her and Miss Aubrey. Again he called, on some adroit pretext or another—and once heard Miss

Aubrey's rich voice and exquisite performance on the piano. He became subject to emotions and impulses of a sort that he had never before experienced: yet, whenever he retired from their fascinating society, he felt an aching void, as it were, within—he perceived the absence of all sympathy toward him; he felt indignant—but that did not quench the ardor of his aspirations. "It is hardly necessary to say, that on every occasion Gammon effectually concealed the profound and agitating feelings which the sight of Miss Aubrey called forth in him; and what a tax was this upon his powers of concealment and self-control! How he laid himself out to amuse and interest them all! With what racy humor would he describe the vulgar absurdities of Titmouse, the stately eccentricities of the Dreddingtons. With what eager and breathless interest was he listened to?"

No man could make himself more unexceptionably agreeable than Gammon; and the ladies really took pleasure in his society; Kate about as far from any notion of the real state of his feelings as of what was at that moment going on at the antipodes. Her reserve toward him sensibly lessened; why, indeed, should she feel it, toward one of whom Dr. Tatham spoke so highly, and who appeared to warrant it? Moreover, Mr. Gammon took special care to speak in the most unreserved and unqualified manner of the mean and mercenary character of Mr. Quirk—of the miserable style of business in which he, Mr. Gammon, was compelled, for only a short time longer, he trusted, to participate, and which was really revolting to his own feelings; in short, he did his best to cause himself to appear a sensitive and high-minded man, whose unhappy fate it had been to be yoked with those who were the reverse. Mr. Aubrey regarded him from time to time with silent anxiety and interest, as one who had it in his power, at any instant he might choose, to cause the suspended sword to fall upon him; at whose will and pleasure he continued in the enjoyment of his present domestic happiness, instead of being incarcerated in prison; but who had hitherto evinced a disposition of signal forbearance, sincere good-nature, and disinterestedness. They often used to speak of him, and compare the impression which his person and conduct had produced in their minds; and in two points they agreed—that he exhibited anxiety to render himself agreeable; and that there was a certain something about his eye which none of them liked. It seemed as though he had in a manner two natures; and that one of them was watching the efforts made by the other to beguile!

While, however, the Fates thus frowned upon the aspiring attempts of Gammon toward Miss Aubrey, they smiled benignantly enough upon Titmouse, and his suit with the Lady Cecilia. The first shock over—which no lively sensibilities or strong feelings of her ladyship tended to retract, she began insensibly to get familiar with the person, manners, and character of her future lord, and reconciled to her fate. "When people understand that they must live together," said a very great man, "they learn to soften, by mutual accommodation, that yoke which they know that they cannot shake off; they become good husbands and wives, for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duties which it imposes." The serene intelligence of Lady Cecilia having satisfied her that "it was her fate" to be married to Titmouse, she resigned herself to it tranquilly, calling in to her assistance divers co-operative reasons for the step she had agreed to take. She could thereby accomplish at all events one darling object of her papa's—the re-union of the long and unhappily-severed family interests. Then Yatton was certainly a delightful estate to be mistress of—a charming residence, and one which she might in all probability calculate on having pretty nearly to herself. His rent-roll was large and unencumbered, and would admit of a handsome jointure. On her accession to her own independent rank, the odious name of Titmouse would disappear in the noble one of Lady Drelin-court, peeress in her own right, and representative of the oldest barony in the kingdom. Her husband would then become a mere cipher—no one would ever hear of him, or inquire after him, or think or care about him—a mere moth in the sunbeam of her own splendor. But, above all, thank Heaven! there were many ways in which a separation might be brought about—never mind how soon after marriage—a step which was becoming one quite of course, and implied nothing derogatory to the character, or lessening to the personal consequence, of the lady—who indeed was almost, as of course, recognized as an object of sympathy, rather than of suspicion or scorn. These were powerful forces, all impelling her in one direction—and irresistibly. How could it be otherwise with a mere creature of circumstance like her? Notwithstanding all this, however, there were occasions when Titmouse was presented to her in a somewhat startling and sickening aspect. It sometimes almost choked her to see him—ridiculous object!—in the company of gentlemen—to witness their treatment of him, and then reflect that he was about to become her—lord and master. One day, for instance, she accompanied the Earl in the carriage to witness the hounds throw off, not far from Yatton, and where a very brilliant field was expected. There were, in fact, about two hundred of the leading gentlemen of the county assembled—and, dear reader, fancy the figure Titmouse must have presented among them—his quizzing-glass screwed into his eye, and clad in his little pink and leathers! "What a seat was his! How many significant and scornful smiles, and winks, and shrugs of the shoulders did his appearance occasion among his bold and high bred companions! And only about four or five minutes after they had gone away—this unhappy little devil was thoroughly found out by the noble animal he rode; and who equally well knew his own business, and what he had on. In trying to take a dwarf wall, on the opposite side of an old green horse-pond by the road-side, he urged his horse with that weak and indecisive impulse which only disgusted him; so he suddenly drew back at the margin of the pond: over head and heels flew Titmouse, and descended plump on his head into the deep mud, where he remained for a moment or two, up to his shoulders, his little legs kicking about in the air.

"Who's that?" cried one—and another—and another—without stopping, any more than the Life Guards would have stopped for a sudden individual casualty in the midst of their tremendous charge at Waterloo—till the very last of them, who happened to be no less a person than Lord de la Zouch, seeing, as he came up, the desperate position of the fallen rider, reined up, dismounted, and, with much effort and inconvenience, aided in extricating Titmouse from his fearful, yet ludicrous position—and thus preserved to society one of its brightest ornaments. As soon as he was safe—a dismal spectacle to gods and men—his preserver, not disposed, by discovering who Titmouse was, to supererogatory courtesy, mounted his horse, leaving Titmouse in the care of an old woman whose cottage was not far off, and where Titmouse, having had a good deal of the filth detached from him, remounted his horse and turned its head homeward—heartily disposed, had he but dared, cruelly to spur, and kick, and flog it; and in this pickle—stupid, and sullen, and crestfallen—he was overtaken and recognised by Lord Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia, returning from the field!

This was her future husband—

Then again—poor lady Cecilia!—what thought you of the following, which was one of the letters he addressed to you?—Well might Miss Aubrey exclaim, "how I should like to see their correspondence!"—

When poor Lady Cecilia received this letter, and had read over only half a dozen lines of it, she flung it on the floor, and threw herself down on the sofa, in her dressing-room, and remained silent and motionless for more than an hour; and when she heard Miss Macspleuchan knock at her door for admittance, Lady Cecilia started up, took the letter from the floor, and put it into her dressing-box, before admitting her humble companion.

A succession of such letters as the above might have had the effect upon Lady Cecilia's "attachment" to Titmouse, which the repeated affusion of cold water would have upon the thermometer; but the Fates favored Mr. Titmouse, by investing him with a character, and placing him in a position calculated to give him personal dignity, and thereby redeem and elevate him in the estimation of his fastidious mistress—I mean that of candidate for a seat in Parliament, for the representation of a borough in which he had a commanding influence.

BARNABY RUDGE

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XII.

There was a brief pause in the state-room of the Maypole, as Mr. Haredale tried the lock to satisfy himself that he had shut the door securely, and, striding up the dark chamber to where the screen inclosed a little patch of light and warmth, presented himself, abruptly and in silence, before the smiling guest.

If the two had no greater sympathy in their inward thoughts than in their outward bearing and appearance, the meeting did not seem likely to prove a very calm or pleasant one. With no great disparity between them in point of years, they were, in every other respect, as unlike and far removed from each other as two men could well be. The one was soft-spoken, delicately made, precise, and elegant; the other, a burly, square-built man, negligently dressed, rough and abrupt in manner, stern, and, in his present mood, forbidding both in look and speech. The one preserved a calm and placid smile; the other, a distrustful frown. The newcomer, indeed, appeared bent on showing by his every tone and gesture his determined opposition and hostility to the man he had come to meet. The guest who received him, on the other hand, seemed to feel that the contrast between them was all in his favor, and to derive a quiet exultation from it which put him more at his ease than ever.

"Haredale," said this gentleman, without the least appearance of embarrassment or reserve, "I am very glad to see you."

"Let us dispense with compliments. They are misplaced between us," said the other, waving his hand, "and say plainly what we have to say. You have asked me to meet you. I am here. Why do we stand face to face again?"

"Still the same frank and sturdy character I see!"

"Good or bad, sir, I am," returned the other, leaning his arm upon the chimney-piece, and turning a baughty look upon the occupant of the easy-chair, "the man I used to be. I have lost no old likings or dislikings; my memory has not failed me by a hair's-breadth. You ask me to give you a meeting. I say, I am here."

"Our meeting, Haredale," said Mr. Chester, tapping his snuff-box, and following with a smile the impatient gesture he had made—perhaps unconsciously—toward his sword, "is one of conference and peace, I hope?"

"I have come here," returned the other, "at your desire, holding myself bound to meet you, when and where you would. I have not come to bandy pleasant speeches, or hollow professions. You are a smooth man of the world, sir, and at such play have me at a disadvantage. The very last man on this earth with whom I would enter the lists to combat with gentle compliments and masked faces, is Mr. Chester, I do assure you. I am not his match at such weapons, and have reason to believe that few men are."

"You do me a great deal of honor, Haredale," returned the other, most composedly, "and I thank you. I will be frank with you—"

"I beg your pardon—will be what?"

"Frank—open—perfectly candid."

"Hah!" cried Mr. Haredale, drawing in his breath a sarcastic smile. "But don't let me interrupt you."

"So resolved am I to hold this course," returned the other, tasting his wine with great deliberation, "that I have determined not to quarrel with you, and not to be betrayed into a warm expression or a hasty word."

"There again," said Mr. Haredale, "you will have me at a great advantage. Your self-command—"

"Is not to be disturbed, when it will serve my purpose, you would say?" rejoined the other, interrupting him with the same complacency. "Granted. I allow it. And I have a purpose to serve now. So have you. I am sure our object is the same. Let us attain it like sensible men, who have ceased to be boys some time.—Do you drink?"

"With my friends," returned the other.

"At least," said Mr. Chester, "you will be seated?"

"I will stand," returned Mr. Haredale impatiently, "on this dismantled, beggared hearth, and not pollute it, fallen as it is, with mockeries. Go on!"

"You are wrong, Haredale," said the other, crossing his legs, and smiling as he held his glass up in the bright glow of the fire. "You are really very wrong. The world is a lively place enough, in which we must accommodate ourselves to circumstances, sail with the stream as glibly as we can, be content to take froth for substance, the surface for the depth, the counterfeit for the real coin. I wonder no philosopher has ever established that our globe itself is hollow. It should be, if Nature is consistent in her works."

"You think it is, perhaps?"

"I should say," he returned, sipping his wine, "there could be no doubt about it.—Well; we, in our trifling with this jingling toy, have had the ill luck, to jostle and fall out. We are not what the world calls friends; but we are as good and true and loving friends for all that, as nine out of every ten of those on whom it bestows the title. You have a niece, and I a son—a fine lad, Haredale, but foolish. They fall in love with each other, and form what this same world calls an attachment; meaning a something fanciful and false like all the rest, which, if it took its own free time, would break like any other bubble. But it may not have its own free time—will not, if they are left alone—and the question is, shall we two, because society calls us enemies, stand aloof, and let them rush into each other's arms, when, by approaching each other sensibly, as we do now, we can prevent it, and part them?"

"I love my niece," said Mr. Haredale, after a short silence. "It may sound strangely in your ears, but I love her."

"Strangely, my good fellow!" cried Mr. Chester, lazily filling his glass again, and pulling out his toothpick. "Not at all. I like Ned, too—or, as you say, love him—that's the word among such near relations. I'm very fond of Ned. He's an amazingly good fellow, and a handsome fellow—foolish and weak as yet; that's all. But the thing is, Haredale—for I'll be very frank, as I told you I would at first—independently of any dislike that you and I might have to being related to each other, and independently of the religious differences between us—and, damn it, that's important—I could not afford a match of this description. Ned and I could not do it. It's impossible."

"Curb your tongue, in God's name, if this conversation is to last," retorted Mr. Haredale fiercely. "I have said I love my niece. Do you think that, loving her, I would have her fling her heart away on any man who had your blood in his veins?"

"You see," said the other, not at all disturbed, "the advantage of being so frank and open. Just what I was about to add, upon my honor! I am amazingly attached to Ned—quite doat upon him, indeed—and even if we could afford to throw ourselves away, that very objection would be quite insuperable. I wish you'd take some wine."

"Mark me," said Mr. Haredale, striding to the table, and laying his hand upon it heavily. "If any man believes—presumes to think—that I, in word, or deed, or in the wildest dream, ever entertained remotely the idea of Emma Haredale's favoring the suit of one who was akin to you—in any way—I care not what he thinks. He lies, and does me grievous wrong, in the mere thought."

"Haredale," returned the other, rocking himself to and fro as in assent, and nodding at the fire, "it's extremely manly, and really very generous in you, to meet me in this unreserved and handsome way. Upon my word, those are exactly my sentiments, only expressed with much more force and power than I could use—you know my sluggish nature, and will forgive me, I am sure."

"While I would restrain her from all correspondence with your son, and sever their intercourse here, though it should cause her death," said Mr. Haredale, who had been pacing to and fro, "I would do it kindly and tenderly if I can. I have a trust to discharge which my nature is not formed to understand, and, for this reason, the bare fact of there being any love between them comes upon me to-night, almost for the first time."

"I am more delighted than I can possibly tell you," rejoined Mr. Chester with the utmost blandness, "to find my own impression so confirmed. You see the advantage of our having met. We understand each other. We quite agree. We have a most complete and thorough explanation, and we know what course to take.—Why don't you taste your tenant's wine? It's really very good."

"Pray who," said Mr. Haredale, "have aided Emma, or your son? Who are their go-betweens, and agents—do you know?"

"All the good people hereabouts—the neighborhood in general, I think," returned the other, with his most affable smile. "The messenger I sent to you to-day, foremost among them all."

"The idiot? Barnaby."

"You are surprised? I am glad of that, for I was rather so myself. Yes. I wrung that from his mother—a very decent sort of woman—from whom, indeed, I chiefly learnt how serious the matter had become, and determined to ride out here to-day, and hold a parley with you on this neutral ground. You're stouter than you used to be, Haredale, but you look extremely well."

"Our business, I presume, is nearly at an end," said Mr. Haredale, with an expression of impatience he was at no pains to conceal. "Trust me, Mr. Chester, my niece shall change from this time. I will appeal," he added in a lower tone, "to her woman's heart, her dignity, her pride, her duty—"

"I shall do the same by Ned," said Mr. Chester, restoring some errand-faggots to their places in the grate with the toe of his boot. "If there is anything real in the world, it is those amazingly fine feelings and those natural obligations which must subsist between father and son. I shall put it to him on every ground of moral and religious feeling. I shall represent to him that we cannot possibly afford it—that I have always looked forward to his marrying well, for a genteel provision for myself in the autumn of life—that there are a great many clamorous dogs to pay, whose claims are perfectly just and right, and who must be paid out of his wife's fortune. In short, that the very highest and most honorable feelings of our nature, with every consideration of filial duty and affection, and all that sort of thing, imperatively demand that he should run away with an heiress."

"And break her heart as speedily as possible?" said Mr. Haredale, drawing on his glove.

"There Ned will act exactly as he pleases," returned the other, sipping his wine; "that's entirely his affair. I would not for the world interfere with my son, Haredale, beyond a certain point. The relationship between father and son, you know, is positively quite a holy kind of bond. Won't you let me persuade you to take one glass of wine? Well! as you please, as you please," he added, helping himself again.

"Chester," said Mr. Haredale, after a short silence, during which he had eyed his smiling face from time to time intently, "you have the head and heart of an evil spirit in all matters of deception."

"Your health!" said the other, with a nod. "But I have interrupted you—"

"If now," pursued Mr. Haredale, "we should find it difficult to separate these young people, and break off their intercourse—if, for instance, you find it difficult on your side, what course do you intend to take?"

"Nothing plainer, my good fellow, nothing easier," returned the other, shrugging his shoulders and stretching himself more comfortably before the fire. "I shall then exert those powers on which you flatter me so highly—though, upon my word, I do not deserve your compliments to their full extent—and resort to a few little trivial subterfuges for rousing jealousy and resentment. You see?"

"In short, justifying the means by the end, we are, as a last resource for tearing them asunder, to resort to treachery—and lying," said Mr. Haredale.

"Oh dear, no. Fie, fie!" returned the other, relishing a pinch of snuff extremely. "Not lying. Only a little management, a little diplomacy, a little—intriguing, that's the word."

"I wish," said Mr. Haredale, moving to and fro, and stopping, and moving on again, like one who was ill at ease, "that this could have been foreseen or prevented. But as it has gone so far, and it is necessary for us to act, it is of no use shrinking or regretting. Well! I shall second your endeavors to the utmost of my power. There is one topic in the whole wide range of human thoughts on which we both agree. We shall act in concert, but apart. There will be no need, I hope, for us to meet again."

"Are you going?" said Mr. Chester, rising with a graceful indolence. "Let me light you down the stairs."

"Pray keep your seat," returned the other dryly; "I know the way." So, waving his hand slightly, and putting on his hat as he turned upon his heel, he went clanking out as he had come, shut the door behind him, and tramped down the echoing stairs.

"Pah! A very coarse animal, indeed!" said Mr. Chester, composing himself in the easy chair again. "A rough brute. Quite a human badger!"

John Willet and his friends, who had been listening intently for the clash of swords, or firing of pistols in the great room, and had indeed settled the order in which they should rush in when summoned—in which procession old John had carefully arranged that he should bring up the rear—were very much astonished to see Mr. Haredale come down without a scratch, call for his horse, and ride away thoughtfully at a footpace. After some consideration, it was decided that he had left the gentleman above, for dead, and had adopted this stratagem to divert suspicion or pursuit.

As this conclusion involved the necessity of their going up stairs forthwith, they were about to ascend in the order they had agreed upon, when a smart ringing at the guest's bell, as if he had pulled it vigorously, overthrew all their speculations, and involved them in great uncertainty and doubt. At length Mr. Willet agreed to go up stairs himself, escorted by Hugh and Barnaby, as the strongest and stoutest fellows on the premises, who were to make their appearance under pretence of clearing away the glasses.

Under this protection, the brave and broad-faced John boldly entered the room, half a foot in advance, and received an order for a boot-jack without trembling. But when it was brought, and he leant his sturdy shoulder to the guest, Mr. Willet was observed to look very hard into his boots as he pulled them off, and, by opening his eyes much wider than usual, to appear to express some surprise and disappointment at not finding them full of blood. He took occasion too, to examine the gentleman as closely as he could, expecting to discover sundry loop-holes in his person, pierced by his adversary's sword. Finding none, however, and observing in course of time that his guest was as cool and unruffled, both in his dress and his temper, as he had been all day, old John at last heaved a deep sigh, and began to think so dust had been fought that night.

"And now, Willet," said Mr. Chester, "if the room's well aired, I'll try the merits of that famous bed."

"The room, sir," returned John, taking up a candle, and nudging Barnaby and Hugh to accompany them, in case the gentleman should unexpectedly drop down faint or dead, from some internal wound, "the room's as warm as any toast in a tankard. Barnaby, take you that other candle, and go on before. Hugh! Follow up, sir, with the easy chair."

In this order—and still, in his earnest inspection, holding his candle very close to the guest; and making him feel extremely warm about the legs, now threatened to set his wig on fire, and constantly begging his pardon with great awkwardness and embarrassment—John led the party to the best bed-room, which was nearly as large as the chamber from which they had come, and held, drawn out near the fire for warmth, a great old spectral bedstead, hung with faded brocade, and ornamented, at the top of each carved post, with a plume of feathers that had once been white, but with dust and age had now grown hoarse-like and funeral.

"Good night, my friends," said Mr. Chester with a sweet smile, seating himself, when he had surveyed the room from end to end, in the easy-chair which his attendants wheeled before the fire. "Good night! Barnaby, my good fellow, you say some prayers before you go to bed, I hope?"

Barnaby nodded. "He has some nonsense that he calls his prayers, sir," returned old John, officiously. "I'm afraid there's n't much good in 'em."

"And Hugh?" said Mr. Chester, turning to him.

"Not I," he answered. "I know his"—pointing to Barnaby—"they're well enough. He sings 'em sometimes in the straw. I listen."

"He's quite a animal, sir," John whispered in his ear with dignity. You'll excuse him, I'm sure. If he has any soul at all, it must be such a very small one, that it don't signify what he does or doesn't in that way. Good night, sir!"

The guest rejoined "God bless you!" with a fervor that was quite affecting; and John, beckoning his guards to go before, bowed himself out of the room, and left him to his rest in the Maypole's ancient bed.

END OF VOL. II.

(3) The present number of BARNABY RUDGE concludes what in London is published as the second volume of Master Humphrey's Clock. The author has accompanied it with the following

PREFACE.

"An author," says Fielding, in his introduction to Tom Jones, "ought to consider himself, not as a gentleman who gives a private or eleemosynary treat, but rather as one who keeps a public ordinary, at which all persons are welcome for their money. Men who pay for what they eat, will insist on gratifying their palates, however nice and whimsical these may prove: and if everything is not agreeable to their taste, will challenge a right to censure, to abuse, and to damn their dinner without control."

"To prevent, therefore, giving offence to their customers by any such disappointment, it hath been usual with the honest and well-meaning host to provide a bill of fare, which all persons may peruse at their first entrance into the house; and having thence acquainted themselves with the entertainment which they may expect, may either stay and regale with what is provided for them, or may depart to some other ordinary better accommodated to their taste."

In the present instance, the host or author, in opening his new establishment, provided no bill of fare. Sensible of the difficulties of such an undertaking in its infancy, he preferred that it should make its own way, silently and gradually, or make no way at all. It has made its way, and is doing such a thriving business that nothing remains for him but to add, in the words of the good old civic ceremony, now that one dish has been discussed and finished, and another smokes upon the board, that he drinks to his guests in a loving cup, and bids them hearty welcome.

For the New World.

THE VOW.*

BY M. E. L.

As I was travelling through a small village in Italy, my attention was arrested by a small mansion, partly in ruins. It appeared to have been once extremely handsome; the marble pillars that had formerly supported a small portico were half crumbling into pieces, and a fountain in the garden was choked with dust. On my return to the Inn at which I lodged, I obtained the following particulars respecting it.

This once lovely cottage was formerly inhabited by a nobleman, his wife, and one daughter. This nobleman was the only son of the Comte de Valancere, whom he had offended by marrying against his will, a beautiful orphan, a poor but distant relation of his family. In the first burst of his rage he had disinherited his son, and ere he was reconciled to him, died, leaving the whole of his immense property to his only nephew, the next heir. His son, the Comte, had taken possession of the cottage, which had been bequeathed to him, by an English gentleman, with whom he had formed an intimate friendship, and who was in vain seeking to recover his lost health, in the mild climate of Italy. He had purchased the cottage, intending to make a long sojourn in Italy, but his hopes of recovering were disappointed, and he had died within a few months of the Comte's father. Here, then, he had resided until his daughter was seventeen years of age. When she was first born, her father had vowed to devote her to a Nunnery, for he was overcome with grief at his father's death, and determined to atone in this manner for his disobedience to his commands. His daughter, the lovely laes, was indeed beautiful; her skin of the clearest brown, her finely chiselled features, and her clustering raven curls—all combined to render her one of the most attractive and fascinating of beings. Often as her father gazed on her beautiful form, or listened to the soft tones of her merry laugh, would he wish he had never bound himself to part from her. It was about this time that an officer of the French army, Captain De Villamont, had become acquainted with the Comte, and was an inmate of the cottage. He was handsome, noble, and chivalric; and his dark eye would sparkle with his enthusiasm as he related the many dangers he had passed, or a shade of sadness steal over his face as he described the dreadful scenes he had beheld. And it was no wonder that Ines loved him; she had never before beheld so noble, so disinterested a character, one so winning in his manners, or so capable of gaining her affections; and she began to dread her future fate more than ever.

Hitherto she had dreamed of it as a thing far off; and as, sooner or later, she knew it must come, and that she was to begin her novitiate within three weeks, she had made up her mind to be reconciled to it. But now her resolutions were all broken; and when De Villamont declared his love for her to her father, he heard for the first time of the life of seclusion she was destined to lead. In vain did they implore him to revoke his vow, neither the tears nor entreaties of Ines, or her mother, could turn him from his purpose. It was then that De Villamont implored her to fly with him, become his bride. "And then," exclaimed he, passionately, "no power can force thee from me." At first she could not consent, but at last she yielded to his persuasions; for better far, thought she, to become the wife of one I shall never cease to love than to take upon me vows I could never fulfil. But more than once her heart smote her as she encountered the kind glance of her mother, or heard the gentle tone of her voice; but when she remembered her father's vow, and knew that in a lone convent cell she would be forever separated from them, she would not, had it been in her power, have retracted her promise.

The night was dark, and gave forebodings of a storm, yet they heeded it not. They were to fly to the river, side, and a small boat would bear them over. Ines had left in her room a note addressed to her mother, in which she assured them naught could have prevailed on her to disobey them had she not been convinced she would never have been contented in a convent, and that her father would never consent to her marriage. It was discovered, however, sooner than Ines expected; and the Comte procured the only boat in the village, and immediately followed them.

Their little boat danced on the stormy waves, and as the Comte and his boatman came within sight, one wave higher than usual washed over them, and a sudden gust of wind overturned their boat; a stifled cry from Ines fell on the ears of her heart-stricken father, and all was still save the angry dashing of the water. The boatmen put all strength to their oars, and came to the spot where they had last beheld the boat; they saw a body rise slowly on the water, and they drew in De Villamont, while clasped in his arms was the lovely Ines!

They reached the cottage, bearing in their arms the lifeless bodies of the lovers. They laid them down, and with a deep sigh De Villamont slowly recovered, while, beside the body of her dead child, sat the mother in all the stupidity of intense grief. She seemed without the power of tears, and her eyeballs rolled wildly around while her long dark locks hung in dishevelled tresses.

The mother never recovered, she was buried beside her child. The Comte's cousin, who had inherited his father's property, was taken suddenly ill, and in his last moments confessed that his uncle had made another will before he died, by which he left his property to his son; but tempted to obtain it himself, he had bribed the witnesses and destroyed the will. The Comte, however, did not long enjoy his riches, but died within a year after his wife and daughter's death.

As for De Villamont, the loss of one he had so tenderly loved, completely unmanned him, and joining his army, he fell, covered with wounds, in the first encounter.

* NOTE.—Our readers will join with us in approbation of this short sketch, when they learn that it is the production of a young lady but fourteen years of age, and that not one word has been taken from or added to her original composition.—ED.

ODE ON THE BURIAL OF SIR J. MOORE.

The celebrated ode on the burial of Sir John Moore, which found so many claimants a number of years ago, and had been ascribed successively to most of our eminent living poets, has at length found its true author. This beautiful piece of elegiac composition, unrivalled for pathos and simplicity by any similar production in ancient or modern times, after enjoying an anonymous fame for twenty-five years—after being attributed to Byron and Campbell—after being claimed by a host of minor rhyme-masters, from the Apollos of Grub-street, to the nameless verse-makers in newspaper corners, was at length attributed, upon what seemed good evidence, to the Reverend Mr. C. Wolfe, an Irish curate, and a man of talent far beyond countryman, we trust that our Contemporaries, if they cannot make room for the whole documents, will, at least, give publicity to the interesting fact which they disclose.

(Then follows the correspondence. We can only make room for Mr. Macintosh's letter.)

"REV. AND DEAR SIR:—The circumstances attending the writing of the lines on the burial of Sir John Moore, so far as I can recall them at this distance of time, are simple and easily told. I had been familiar with the details of the disastrous retreat to Corunna, and felt deeply interested in the fate of the gallant but ill-supported Sir John Moore.

"In the year 1816, while a student at the College of Edinburgh, I happened to lodge with a Mrs. Henry, whose yond his humble situation. From the time when Mr. Wolfe's memoirs were published, till now, he has enjoyed the undisturbed honor of having written that inimitable ode. It appears, however, that Mr. Wolfe's claim was not well founded, and that the writer of his memoirs had planted on the grave of his hero a laurel which ought in justice to have adorned the brow of another, who still lives, and whom we are proud to call a Scotsman. For the vouchers of this discovery, we appeal to the following documents, furnished by a correspondent, the Rev. W. Muir, assistant-minister at Temple, at which parish the author of the Ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore, Mr. A. Macintosh, still holds, and has held for the last twenty-two years, the obscure and ill-requited office of schoolmaster. Though the time that has elapsed since it was written has necessarily increased the difficulties of producing evidence of the authorship, yet, after perusing Mr. Macintosh's very modest letter, and weighing the reasons why he did not sooner assert his claims to a production which had made its unassisted way to universal admiration, we think no candid mind can entertain a doubt that he wrote the verses which now, at the end of a quarter of a century, circumstances have induced him to avow. For the honor of a husband had been a seafaring person, and, if I remember well, lost his life at Corunna while employed in the transport service, at the embarkation of the British troops, Mrs. Henry had a number of letters, which she sometimes took a melancholy pleasure in hearing me read to her, written by friends who had served under Sir J. Moore during the whole of the campaign. One of these, written by an eyewitness, depicted in forcible though homely colors, the water-ment of the devoted chief. It was on perusing this last that I formed the idea of attempting a poetical description of that event. I had been accustomed, from my childhood to feel singularly affected when witnessing the ceremony of a soldier's burial; and I have no doubt that an occasional sight of this kind from the window of my bed-room, which looked out upon the Greyfriars' churchyard, contributed, in the present instance, to draw my thoughts in that direction.

"About this time a young man of the name of Menzies, who had formerly been my schoolfellow, came to Edinburgh to attend the classes at the University, and, owing to our previous intimacy, was frequently in my company. Mr. M. was an enthusiast in every thing relating to the military profession, and would have esteemed it the summit of human ambition to be appointed to a commission in the British army. On seeing the ode in the unfinished state in which it then lay among some other fugitive pieces, he professed himself highly pleased with it, but at the same time suggested some amendments which might be made on it, one or two of which I subsequently adopted. As Mr. M. took a copy of it oftener than once, I have always been of the opinion that it was through his means it afterward found its way into the public prints; although it would have been an easy matter for any person who had access to my lodgings to transcribe it without my knowledge. Whether this was the case or not, unfortunately I cannot positively say. I was soon afterward separated from Mr. Menzies, who died about 1820.

"In the year 1817, I was a member of a small debating society, which met in Catherine-street, when, on one occasion, I read the ode along with two or three other short pieces, in place of the essay which it was customary for each of the members to read in rotation, before opening the debate; but, although I received some general praise, I do not remember that the ode drew any particular notice.

"During my residence in Edinburgh, I had, in common with many other young men attending the University, experienced much kindness from the late Professor Christison. One evening, about this time, when going to call on him, I had put the ode in my pocket, with the intention of submitting it to his remarks, but during our interview I had not the courage to present it. I have frequently regretted my diffidence on that occasion, as I have no doubt that Mr. Christison's exquisite taste would have at once appreciated those merits which the public were afterwards pleased to ascribe to it, and thus brought it into notice at a time when the author could not be disputed.

"In 1818 I left Edinburgh for my present situation. It was a year or two afterwards when I first observed the ode in print. It was in one of the Edinburgh periodicals, with a commendatory note subjoined, stating that it had recently appeared in one of the newspapers.

"About this time the late Captain Clapperton, the African traveller, told me that a friend of his was getting up for publication a selection from the fleeting literature of the day, in which he wished to insert 'The Burial of Sir John Moore,' and as he had been told that I was the author of that piece, wished to have my name adhibited to it, to which I consented. Captain C. shortly after left this place, and I never learned whether the work was published or not.

"I never saw 'Wolfe's Remains' till you put the volume into my hands about two months ago.

"It was, I think, in 1826, that I learned that the author of the memoir of the Rev. C. Wolfe had claimed the ode for that gentleman. I felt somewhat indignant at this; and, with a view to place the matter in its proper light, wrote to the father of Mr. Menzies, who lived in a distant part of the country, requesting him to search among his son's papers for the manuscript of the lines, but to this letter no answer was returned.

"I then saw that I had allowed the proper time for asserting my claim to pass away; and being apprehensive lest the public might be unwilling to believe that a piece which had by this time made some little noise in the world, was the production of an obscure individual like myself, I judge it more prudent to forego my claim than to expose myself to any obloquy on its account.

"I am, reverend and dear Sir, yours very truly,
Temple, January, 1841. A. MACINTOSH.
"To the Rev. W. Muir."

Mr. Macintosh is a native of Athol. After attending the school in Perth, he completed the usual course of education for the Established Church at the University of Edinburgh. In 1818 he accepted of the parish school of Temple, where, for twenty-two years, like many of his laborious and ill-requited brotherhood, with attainment immeasurably superior to their duties and emoluments, he has patiently and contentedly discharged the irksome duties of his useful office.—[Edinburgh Advertiser.

Childhood is like a mirror, catching and reflecting images from all around it. Remember, that an impious or profane thought, uttered by a parent's lip, may operate upon the young heart like a careless spray of water thrown upon polished steel, staining it with rust which no after-scouring can efface.

A GERMAN BEAUTY AT DINNER.

From a new novel just published in London, entitled "Cecil or the adventures of a Coxcomb."

"Our soup consisted of snippings of cabbage served in the water in which they were boiled, with little sweet dumplings floating on the top; our fish was a cold pike, with vinegar sauce garnished with rings of onions. To these, washed down by a gargle of Rhenish ordinaire (which, like the famous Nauemberger, served to indicate where vinegar grows wild), succeeded a dish of exceedingly fat bouilli, accompanied, Germanwise, by four sauce-boats, containing pickled cherries, a purée of onions, another of meer-rellig, and a black nameless compound that looked and smelt marvelously like senna-tea.

"My nerves were somewhat shaken perceiving with what heroic fortitude Wilhelmina not only divided her fish with her knife, but afterwards, immersing the clumsy blade in the vinegar so as to blacken the surface, plunged it fearlessly into her mouth! For a moment I was apprehensive that death might ensue. But as she survived it, so did I. Of the fat bouilli and senna-tea she ate with voracity; and when the third dish was placed on table, consisting of a stew of wild-beer swimming in stewed apricots, and looking like everything that was nastiest in nature, I literally shuddered at the unctuousness of lip with which this ethereal being justified her carnivorous propensities.

"Next came an cierapeise, which she imbibed with equal satisfaction; then, an ill-roasted joint of veal, well-basted with butter; and two or three soup-plates of garden-stuff, that looked as if laded out a weedy ditch. Then wafers—then salad—then leveret, that must have forgotten the date of its own killing;—then cheese, that must have forgotten the date of its own pressing;—then fruit, then zucker brod—then sugar-plums—then coffee—then kirsch; to say nothing of half-a-dozen delicate horred'ausres, such as pickled herring, Brunswick sausage, slices of raw ham, caviar, and other creature-comforts of a similar nature.

"Gott in Himmel!—to see the idol of one's soul fill the lips that Leonardo would have delighted to paint—lips like the half-open bud of a Boursault rose—lips that seemed formed only to emit a murmur of tenderness and joy—the plaint of Margaret—the song of Thekla—to see those lips dilate to receive a vile, circumferential slice of Brauns-weiher Bratwürst. Oh! Tommy Moore—oh! Johannes Secundus—oh! Lord Strangford!—oh! Cameens!—oh, every body else who has ever verified upon those ruby portals of the Temple of Beauty—feel for me!—Es rührt mich der Schlag auf der Stelle!

"The horror of the Arabian husband who beheld his wife Amina steal to the churchyard and indulge in her foul repast of human flesh, could not have exceeded mine. I should as soon have expected the Venus de Medicis or Belvidere Apollo to sup on cheese and onions, as that ethereal creature. My only consolation was the belief that this sylph, this Undine, this fay, this sprite, might perhaps be trifling with my sensibilities, and trying the force of my attachment by the preparation of enormities."

EIGHT-AND-THIRTY!

"Eight-and-thirty is a frightful epoch in the life of a woman of fashion. Hot rooms and cosmetics place it on a level with fifty, in the lady of a country Squire. The struggle between departing youth and coming age is never more awful! A little older, and the case becomes too clear for dispute. At forty, she gives up the field, allowing that time has the best of it. But for the five preceding years, those years during which, though no longer pretty, a woman may be still handsome, the tug of war is terrific. A woman never prizes her beauty half so much as when it is forsaking her; never comprehends the value of raven locks till revealed by the contrast of the first grey hair; never finds out that her waist was slim and her form graceful, till she has been accused of embonpoint.

"Brother coxcombs! if you would have a proper value set upon your homage, pay your court to a woman of eight-and-thirty. The flutter of a little miss of sixteen is nothing to the agitation with which the poor, grateful soul uplifts her head above the waters of oblivion, in which she was succumbing."

SUMMER IN THE HEART.

BY EPES SARGENT.

The cold blast at the casement beats,
The window-panes are white,
The snow whirls through the empty streets—
It is a dreary night!
Sit down, old friend! the wine-cups wait;
Fill! to o'erflowing, fill!
Though Winter howleth at the gate,
In our hearts 't is Summer still!

For we full many Summer joys
And greenwood sports have shared,
When, free and ever-roving boys,
The rocks, the streams we dared!
And, as I look upon thy face—
Back—back, o'er years of ill,
My heart flies to that happy place,
Where it is Summer still!

Yes, though like sere leaves on the ground,
Our early hopes are strown,
And cherished flowers lie dead around,
And singing birds are flown,—
The verdure is not faded quite,
Not mute all tones that thrill;
For, seeing, hearing thee to-night,
In my heart 't is Summer still!

Fill up! the olden times come back!
With light and life once more
We scan the future's sunny track,
From youth's enchanted shore!
The lost return. Through fields of bloom
We wander at our will;
Gone is the winter's angry gloom—
In our hearts 't is summer still!

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1841.

We ask you, reader, to peruse every article in this number of the New World; for we believe that each and all of them—unless we except those which have proceeded from our own unworthy pen—are well deserving of your attention. The sermon on the occasion of General Harrison's death, is full of a pathetic, unstudied eloquence, which cannot fail to touch every heart beating with human sympathies, and alive to its own immortal destiny. The notices of the President's life and death in Washington are far more interesting than kindred articles, which usually find their way into the public prints. The reader will join us in cordial gratitude to the Rev. gentleman, by whom they were kindly prepared.

The drama of Gulzara, or the Persian Slave, was written by a young lady, lovely and accomplished. There is a unity and simplicity in its design and execution, which cannot fail to give sincere pleasure. It is pervaded by rare and delicate thought; many passages are strikingly beautiful—and the impartial critic will think with us that the drama would do credit to a much more experienced writer. Be not deterred from reading it because it is long; but, remembering that it makes no high pretensions and that it was not written for the theatre, give it the justice of a calm perusal.

NOTITIA OF GENERAL HARRISON WHILE IN WASHINGTON.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW WORLD, BY REV. WM. HAWLEY.
Rector St. John's Church, Washington.

HIS INAUGURATION.

The three days previous to his Inauguration, after his arrival in Washington, were mostly spent at the hospitable mansion of the mayor of the city, Col. Seaton, where he received, at all hours of the day, the visits of his friends and fellow-citizens. The urbanity of his manners, the open-hearted frankness, with which he received the congratulations of his friends, deeply impressed all the impartial and disinterested at the capital with the confident assurance that he was about to enter upon the high office, to which he had been called, with a single heart and purpose to discharge and faithfully to execute the important trust.

Numerous strangers, from almost every section of this vast wide-spread Republic, for days and weeks preceding the 4th of March, had been rushing into this metropolis till the crowd had become immense, almost beyond calculation. Every hotel and boarding-house were filled to overflowing, and almost every private residence was crowded beyond convenient accommodation.

The procession of the Inauguration was formed in beautiful order, and as it passed along the streets and avenues to the Capitol—the thronging multitude pressing against each other, seemed to move on like the ocean wave and with the “noise of many waters.” The spontaneous expression of joy and gladness, which ever and anon burst forth from the young and old, the aged matron and blooming maid—together with the waving of handkerchiefs from the crowded windows, proclaimed to the war-worn veteran a welcome to the highest honors of his country. After taking the oath of office, and having delivered his Inaugural Address, he returned to the President's mansion, amid the increased acclamation of nearly forty thousand of his admiring countrymen, who there tendered him their cordial congratulations.

Thus passed away this joyous day of his political triumph, none suspecting that in one short month the whole scene would be changed—that God was preparing to summon him away from the height of his earthly glory, as we trust to a more exalted station at his right hand.

HIS RELIGIOUS CHARACTER.

The next morning (th 5th) Gen. Harrison walked down on the Avenue and purchased a quarto Bible and book of Common Prayer, which he carried home with him and directed the servant to place in his bed-room, where I saw them the night of his death—thereby indicating that he had chosen that holy book for the rule of his faith and guide of his life in the execution of the important trust committed to his charge. In his first letter to Mrs. Harrison after his Inaugural, he states that, after he had returned from the Capitol to the President's mansion as soon as he could command any time, he retired into his room, and fell down upon his knees before his Maker, thanking him for all his mercies, and supplicating his gracious guidance in the faithful discharge of the duties of his high station to his country and his God.

On Sunday morning (the 7th) Benjamin Harrison, Esq., of Va., at the request of the President, called at my house, desiring to know whether he could be accommodated with a pew for himself and family for that day, and expressing a wish to occupy the one recently occupied by Mrs. Madison—which the owner accorded him. In the public worship of the Church he conformed to all the rituals in the audible responses of the service, and with that humility, so expressive of devout feelings and humble devotion, bowed himself on his knees before the majesty of Heaven, and supplicated that mercy of which as a sinner, however exalted his station, he stood so much in need.*

The following day he purchased the pew and regularly attended the service of the church every Sunday morning until prevented by his last fatal sickness.

His high regard for the Sabbath was such that, of late years, he always avoided travelling on that Holy Day unless from absolute necessity; and, during the short period he occupied the President's mansion, he carefully avoided all company on that day and dined at an early hour that he might attend public worship in the afternoon with his family; some of whom belonged to the Communion of the Presbyterian Church. His high estimation for the “people of God,” was most nobly shown in many instances of kindness to his ministers. On a recent occasion he said to a brother clergyman of mine, with whom he had been for some time acquainted, whom ill health prevented from the performance of his clerical duties, and on whom he had within a few weeks conferred a vacant clerkship until his health would enable him to resume the duties of the ministerial office—“I see no company on Sunday and dine in a plain way; but I shall always be happy to see you at my table, for I love to have the clergy with me on Sunday.” In this connection it may be proper to state, that at his own hospitable mansion at North Bend, when the infirm health of Mrs. Harrison would not allow her to attend public worship elsewhere, Gen. Harrison would often obtain the services of the clergyman for the day and remunerate him liberally.

It has also been stated to me by a member of the family that, some years since, he accidentally became acquainted with a young minister of the Methodist church in indigent circumstances, whose native talents and powers of mind promised extensive usefulness if properly cultivated. General Harrison invited him to become a member of his family, and offered him the use of his library, until well prepared for the exercise of his ministry. This young clergyman is now a distinguished and successful laborer in the vineyard of our Lord. Of late years, notwithstanding his having erected, mostly at his own expense, a church, in his immediate vicinity, yet not being able to support a clergyman for the regular services of the church, he was in the habit of leaving home on Saturday afternoon, for the sole purpose of attending the church in Cincinnati—of which the Rev. J. T. Brooke is Rector—twice or thrice a day. He also frequently attended a stated weekly Lecture.

From the day of his Inauguration, it was his invariable practice, to rise with the dawn of day, and, after reading the Scripture, to take a walk for exercise, and seldom did he breakfast or dine, without some old friend or acquaintance partaking of his hospitality.

In this manner his whole time was occupied. Occasionally, if for a moment disengaged from official duties and the press of visitors, he would steal away from his family and visit some of his old acquaintances with all that cordiality and generous good feeling, so characteristic of the warm-hearted soldier and devoted friend.

HIS DEATH.

With this brief notice of past events, we come to the closing scene of the melancholy drama. On Thursday, the 23d of March, in a short interview with him, he complained of being quite unwell; and this indisposition continued to increase until the exposure of his person in the morning of Saturday, brought on a severe chill and fever, which the best medical skill could not arrest. No human power could stay the ravages of his disease.

The community generally in this city, without distinction of party, manifested much anxiety for his recovery, and in great numbers daily and hourly called at his residence with anxious inquiries respecting his sickness and its probable result. The violent and exciting character of his malady seemed in the opinion of the physicians to forbid the usual religious services in his sick room, lest they might produce an unfavorable effect.

On Saturday evening the 3d instant, about 9 o'clock, on approaching his sick-bed, his strength appeared to be rapidly failing, and, as little or no hope could be entertained for his recovery, a few of his friends united with me at his bed-side in that “commendatory prayer for a sick person at the point of departure” to another world, set forth in the service of the Church. About 30 minutes before 1 o'clock, by the watch held in my hand, on the morning of the 4th of April, he gently breathed his departing spirit in the hands of his God and Saviour, and sank to rest without the movement of a muscle of his countenance, a struggle or a groan. Thus, after one short month's elevation to the highest station and honors which earth can bestow, he has passed away, from all the troubles, sorrows, and trials of mortality, I trust and believe, to the possession and enjoyment of an unfading crown of glory in the realms of eternal day. For, whatever may have been his character and conduct in former years, of late an evident change has been observed by his friends in favor of true religion.

* I am authorized, from unquestionable authority, to say, that the closing part of his Inaugural Address, especially that part in which he so reverently expresses his regard for the Christian Religion, was penned by him in the room in which he was born, and where he had often kneeled beside his pious mother, who earnestly supplicated the rich blessing of Heaven on his future life.

On Sunday evening, I saw him in his winding sheet with a countenance mild and placid as when he expired. The next day, after being placed in his coffin, the public were permitted a final farewell look of the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic, the President of nearly twenty millions of people. It is said that not less than ten thousand paid their respects to his lifeless remains.

The sadness and gloom, so obviously marked on all countenances, now spoke the silent language of grief. The victim of death—the eminent personage, who recently occupied the first place in the gift of his country, whispers in the voice of solemn stillness that the great destroyer has come among us; that the mighty conqueror of man in every age, for nearly 6000 years, has winged his flight hither and felled to the earth one who had been distinguished in arms, in the councils of his country, and in all the excellencies of private life.

How exalted the mark! How distinguished the object! How fatal the blow! The arrow was sped by the arm of Omnipotence—the victim fell—he lies beneath the cold earth to rise no more, until the voice of the archangel and the trump of God shall call his reposing dust into spiritual life—for “the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed,” and summoned to the final judgment.

In anticipation of this coming event, and of the awfully momentous consequences involved in it, our deeply lamented, departed friend was not unmindful of the needful preparation. It has come to my knowledge that for some years past his mind has been deeply impressed with the important concerns of eternity, and that he had frequently expressed his confident faith and hopes in the Gospel of the Son of God, and had been for some time desirous of uniting himself in communion with the church, and intended doing so as soon as the recent political excitement should have passed away, whether it terminated favorably to his elevation to the Presidential office or otherwise.

This holy purpose, it is understood, had he survived, was intended to be consummated on Easter Sunday, but was denied him by the interposing hand of God in whom he had placed his trust.

“Life makes the soul dependent on the dust;
Death gives her wings to mount above the spheres;
Life is the triumph of our mouldering clay,
Death of the spirit infinite! Divine!
His God sustains him in his final hour!
His final hour brings glory to his God!
Man's glory Heav'n vouchsafes to call her own.”

In preparing the above statement it has been my object to collect all the incidents and facts that have come to my knowledge respecting the late President while in Washington, no one of which, singly, would be of sufficient importance to establish his Christian character, yet, when combined, agreeably harmonize in manifesting the bent of his mind and the ruling desire of his heart on the subject most interesting to the Christian public.

The numerous communications received from different parts of the country requesting information on the subject of the demise of the late President, rendering it out of my power to answer them all in a manner satisfactory either to them or to myself, has induced this communication for the information of the clergy and the public at large.

May God, in mercy to this nation, overrule and sanctify this painful dispensation of his providence to the welfare and prosperity of his church, the cause of true piety, and the establishment of his kingdom on earth, that his “will may be done on earth as it is in heaven.”

GEN. HARRISON'S DEATH-BED.—We have lately had an interview with a gentleman, who was at General Harrison's bedside when he expired. In the room were present two physicians, and a young lady who was constantly with the President during his illness. Mr. Webster was walking in the hall; Mr. Granger stood at the door of the chamber; Mr. Ewing sat at the foot of the bedstead—a French bedstead—and leaned his head upon the scroll, not looking up and weeping continually. Our friend stood near the bed. General Harrison did not speak or move after nine o'clock. Just before that hour he uttered, brokenly and feebly, these words—“I wish you to understand the principles that govern me; I wish them carried out: I ask nothing more.”

It will be noticed that the words in Italics differ from what has been reported; but our informant says that the words were heard only by the two physicians, by one of whom they were immediately put upon paper. They were uttered not as if the President imagined himself addressing his successor; but as if he were in a Cabinet Council and conversing with his Secretaries. From wandering expressions, scarcely audible, and previously uttered, it was evident that the President's mind lingered upon his high duties—he seemed to dream that he was discharging them in conference with his Cabinet.

For some hours previous to his death, he had evidently not been in the possession of his faculties; the only evidence he gave of being sensible was while Dr. Hawley was praying. During the space occupied in this act of devotion, the General seemed to suppress his sighs and groans—demonstrations of pain which had till then been unintercepted frequent. After the conclusion of the prayer, his groans of anguish were again audible. At twenty minutes before eleven, the lady who stood by the bed-side, holding his hand, felt it grow cold; the pulse had ceased and could not again be traced. She dropped the icy hand—and the General lay utterly still, with his eyes closed, till the last glimmering spark of existence had gone out.

The friend, from whom we have derived these facts, was cognizant of every thing that occurred during the President's illness—from the Saturday morning when he put himself under the care of a physician, till the Sunday morning, when he died. The expressions attributed to him touching the removal of office-holders, &c., &c., are wholly untrue. He said nothing of the kind. Of this, the lady who was near him day and night, is positive. Indeed he did not converse at all on business—he attended to neither public nor private business—his thoughts did not seem to recur to such topics, and their introduction was strictly prohibited. Indeed, so rigid were the physicians in their decrees, that they would not, through fear of exciting their patient, even admit the clergyman, Dr. Hawley, till all hope had been surrendered. The General made no allusions to his family, of a serious character—he expected soon to recover, and of course felt no anxiety on their account.

But there was a subject on which he seemed to feel great anxiety, and which constituted nearly the sole matter of conversation—and that was religion. He expressed a regret that he had not previously come into the communion of the church in Washington, and expressed his determination to do so the moment he recovered.

The sermon of Mr. Van Rensselaer, published in the New World of last Saturday, was very satisfactory to the friends of the President, and has elicited general approbation. It is in truth an excellent discourse. During that portion of it, in which it addresses President Tyler, that gentleman seemed much affected, and bowed his head two or three times as if in assent.

RICHARD HAUGHTON.

We have learned with sincere regret, the sudden death of RICHARD HAUGHTON, late the proprietor and editor of the Boston Atlas. Mr. Haughton was preparing to take his departure for England, in the steamer Acadia, when he was seized with a determination of blood to the head, and he fell to the ground in a fit of apoplexy, from which he never recovered. His health has been for some months in a very precarious condition. The excitement of a stirring political career, and frequent inconsiderate exposures in the personal execution of many of his Express enterprises, had entirely broken up a constitution naturally capable of great endurance, and have led to his early death at the age of about forty years.

Mr. Haughton was educated at Yale College, and originally studied with a view to the ministry. The bent of his mind, however, was to politics, and this tendency soon interested and absorbed him to a degree that rendered the return impossible to any other vocation. About eleven years since he started the Atlas newspaper in Boston, and has since devoted himself with unremitting assiduity to the extension of its circulation and the establishment of its character as an organ of the earliest intelligence, and as a consistent advocate of the Democratic Whig policy. He met at first with gradual encouragement, won steadily on the good opinion and esteem of the community in which he was a stranger, commanded the attention and respect of the prominent and influential politicians of the State, surrounded himself with troops of friends as faithful and constant as ever cheered the toils of an editorial career, and ultimately achieved the most honorable and brilliant success.

At the moment he was embarking on a voyage to Europe, to enjoy the fruits of his labor, and to indulge the leisure which he had purchased by the patient toil of years; in the height of his usefulness and reputation, he has been suddenly stricken by death. His loss will be deeply lamented; for it is a loss not only to a numerous circle of affectionate and attached friends, but to the community of which he was a member, and the cause of which he was an unwavering and zealous advocate. We hope that the melancholy event will be suitably noticed by the personal and political friends with whom Maj. HAUGHTON has been long and intimately associated.

A monument at Mount Auburn could not be erected to one more deserving than him who has discharged the elevated trusts of a commanding position in the public press with courage, fidelity, honor and truth.

WILLS AND THE REVISED STATUTES.—The framers, the revisers, and the tinkers of that civil code by which enlightened nations are governed, have been a long time in attaining, or, rather, attempting to attain, their desideratum; the dispensation, namely, of equal justice to all parties in all cases. Perhaps the labors in the common cause of those profound individuals who revise the statutes of the State of New York, have gained as much notoriety and as little credit as the efforts of any modern Solons whatever. Indeed, that, in many cases, they left matters far worse than they found them is little to be wondered at; for such a result is the necessary consequence of the mania for over legislation, which is at once a characteristic and a disgrace of our (so called) deliberative assemblies. And perhaps our State legislators evince an unwonted degree of prudence in declining to reconsider some of the errors of our present statute-book; for if the work of revision were again to commence, there is no knowing where it would terminate: and they may think with Hamlet that it is better to "Bear the ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of."

Nevertheless, the existing statutes that govern and regulate the making of wills are monstrously defective. We have heard one of the most eminent lawyers in the city assert that he could not draw a will which could not be broken. And that others are in the same dilemma is evident from the fact that almost all the wills made by men of fortune in our State for many years past have been contested and broken by the heirs or by the creditors of heirs.

In our opinion this is a subject which calls loudly for reform; and we would respectfully suggest it to the consideration of our Legislature. It is not necessary that we should, by way of giving additional force to this suggestion, give the names of parties who have suffered by this imperfection in our statute-book, for our readers generally are as well informed on that head as we are. But surely a matter of such moment as a father's bequeathing property to his children should be so guarded by legal enactments that his intentions and not the heartless technicalities of a statute may prevail in the distribution of his fortune.

SEIZURE OF HOUSEHOLD GOODS.—We learn from the Albany Evening Journal that, during the past winter, several petitions have been presented to the Legislature praying for the passage of a law to extend the provisions that now exempt certain articles of household furniture &c. from seizure and sale under executions and distress warrants.

These applications commend themselves to attention on a two-fold ground; first, their manifest justice; and, secondly, the fact that they come from a class of the community who do not often get an opportunity to be heard in any direct communication to our Legislature: "the poor we have always with us," but we are not always mindful of their necessities, nor do they always receive from those in power the consideration which those necessities demand.

The law as it now stands is a disgrace to our statute-book, as well as to the legislators who enacted it. It is sickening to read its calculating, heartless details—"one table; six chairs; six spoons; six knives and forks;" &c. The man who drafted that law must have been Shylock's first-born, and a natural son in the bargain!

As the present session of the Legislature is drawing to a close, we emphatically entreat that they will speedily consider these petitions which have been laid before them; and in conclusion of our own remarks, we extract the following from the article in the Evening Journal:

"The extension prayed for we believe would be found extremely salutary in its effects. Hundreds of the poorer classes who are robbed yearly of their household furniture under executions and distress warrants, are driven to intemperance and crime, and their families cast into hopeless beggary and despair. Wretchedness is the parent of sin. The poor man who can retreat from a world of toil to a cheerful fireside and a comfortable home, will rarely seek the haunts of the bar-room or the companionship of infamy. The wife who feels that the mischances of life cannot deprive her of the simple comforts of her home will be more frugal, more industrious and more contented. Her children will be dearer to her—she will take more care of their moral culture and education. The best interests of the community at large demand the amelioration of which we speak. It would benefit alike the debtor and the creditor. The frequent afflictions of the industrious poor eloquently appeal to the Legislature to grant it. Popular feeling will commend and justify it. All parties will unite in effecting it."

PORTRAIT OF BRYANT.—This excellent sketch was drawn by Mr. Heidemann, an artist of great merit—whose lithographic drawings and miniature likenesses upon ivory have been much admired. It was engraved on wood by Butler.

THE SPANISH STEAM-FRIGATES.—The first experimental trip of these beautiful vessels was made on Monday at 10 o'clock A. M. from the Novelty Works' Dock—the ships proceeding down the Bay and outside Sandy Hook, returning again about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The result of the trial was in all respects most gratifying.

The vessels are named, respectively, The Lion and The Eagle; and two finer craft have never been seen in our waters. They were built by Messrs. Brown & Bell, for the Spanish Government; both of one model, and of precisely the same dimensions, which are as follows:

Breadth of beam.....	30 feet 8 in.
do over all.....	49 " 6 "
Length on deck.....	154 "
do over all.....	170 "
Capacity.....	670 tons.

Each vessel can carry fuel for twenty days' consumption, and of course can easily make voyages across the Atlantic. They have round sterns, and are pierced for twelve carronades, besides being arranged to carry each one of the Paixhan guns in the stern. Their figure heads correspond to their names.

These vessels were launched in December last, and have been full rigged and fitted up with their machinery in less than four months.

The engines and all appertaining to the machinery were made by Messrs. Ward, Stillman & Co., of the Novelty Works, and we venture to say that nothing has ever been produced in our country that is equal to them in point of beauty and accuracy of performance. Indeed, the only noise that can be observed during the working of the engine is the opening and shutting off of steam. They are of eighty horse power each.

FUNERAL OBSEQUIES OF THE LATE PRESIDENT.

Yesterday was the day appointed by the city authorities for the funeral obsequies commemorating the death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, the President of the United States. At an early hour, the military began to assemble on the Common—and the different societies, which were assigned places in the procession, proceeded thither from every quarter. Soon after 10 o'clock the head of the military escort left the Common, proceeding down Beacon and School sts. to Washington st., and shortly afterwards the whole procession was in motion.

This was a mournful pageant—and presented a striking contrast with the proceedings on the 10th of September last,* when every countenance was radiant with hope—when flags, symbols of joy and triumph were waving from the windows, the trees, and house-tops—when the mighty host of freemen from every quarter of the Union who followed the significant banners which floated through the streets, were greeted by the smiles of beauty, and the loud and reiterated shouts of congratulating countrymen. It was then a time of rejoicing—it was a time of gladness, and every heart seemed buoyant with hope, for a ray of effulgent light seemed to rest upon the future. But such was not the case yesterday. There were no symbols of joy and gladness; care and sorrow seemed stamped on every face—and although every balcony and window in the streets through which the procession passed, were filled with the lovely daughters of our land, yet there were no greetings of welcome, no sunny smiles and cheering gestures.

But there were symbols of mourning and desolation. The banners were entwined with orange—the music was slow and solemn, the balconies and windows were hung with black, the mournful boom of the minute gun was heard, and the deep voice of the tolling bell, as the procession passed a place of public worship, struck sadness to the heart—and solemnly proclaimed a nation's loss.

It is hardly necessary to say that the utmost order and decorum was observed by the immense multitude of spectators throughout the day—and praise is due the Chief Marshal, Josiah Quincy, Jr., for the admirable skill with which every thing was conducted. The escort, too, consisting of the company of Lancers, and a number of companies of Light Infantry, numbering from 1000 to 1200, the whole under the command of Major General Winthrop, deserves much credit for its imposing appearance, and the precision and correctness of the military proceedings. It is difficult to estimate correctly the number of persons who joined in the procession—we have heard it variously estimated at from 8 to 12,000—the line was between two and three miles in length.

The procession moved slowly through many of the principal streets of the city, and as it crossed the Common, it passed through a double line of the pupils of both sexes of our Public Schools, who were arranged under the direction of their instructors; they were all neatly dressed, and wore emblems of mourning. This was a most interesting sight; one which will not soon be forgotten. It was more than three hours after the line of march was taken up before the escort reached Faneuil Hall. At two o'clock this place, hallowed by associations of the most grateful and sacred character, was filled to overflowing, and the doors were closed, while not a fourth part of those who assisted in the ceremonies were able to obtain admittance. We have often seen cause to regret that Boston could not boast of possessing a hall large enough to accommodate some six or eight thousand, at least, of those of our citizens, who assemble on extraordinary occasions. At this time the services within the hall were peculiarly solemn and impressive and at the same time intensely interesting.

Faneuil Hall was decorated with black; even the windows were shrouded with mourning drapery, and the gas lights in the beautiful chandelier, seemed to throw a dim and uncertain, but sufficient light on the scene. A platform, covered and hang with black, was erected in the further part of the Hall, and above it, beneath the bust of John Adams, was placed a magnificent portrait, by Hoyt, of William Henry Harrison.

The music was of a superior character, and exceedingly solemn. The exercises commenced with a dirge by the band; which was followed with a voluntary by the choir. Then appropriate selections from the Holy Scriptures were read, and prayers were offered, by Rev. Dr. Stone. After which the choir sang with a thrilling effect the following

ORIGINAL HYMN,

BY REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

Robed in sackcloth, dark and deep,
And with ashes on our head,
FATHER, we have come to weep
Round thy cold and lowly bed.
Hear, never shall the drum,
Never shall the savage yell
To disturb thy slumber come—
O, thou sleepest but too well!
Sleepest from thy home afar;
O'er that home the closing day
Hangs the holy evening star—
CHIEFTAN, such thy setting ray!
To thy glory in the West
Lifted were a Nation's eyes;
PATRIOT, thou hast sunk to rest,
Thou hast set, no more to rise.

* The Bunker Hill Celebration.

RULER, thou hast left a place
Loflier than a monarch's throne ;—
CHRISTIAN, through thy Father's grace,
One is given thee near His own.

RUFUS CHOATE commenced the eulogy at half past two o'clock, and occupied the attention of the audience for fifty minutes. It was a splendid effort of genius, and fully equalled the most sanguine expectations of the numerous auditors. The orator was listened to with almost breathless attention—and as he stood on the platform, with his eye kindling with excitement, his countenance overshadowed with grief, and in his deep toned, musical voice, commemorated in language which breathed the very soul of eloquence, the virtues of the man whose loss a whole nation deplores, touched upon the prominent incidents of his eventful life, and described his manifold public services, our thoughts reverted to the history of the past, when the deeds of the brave and virtuous dead, were descanted on in soul-stirring language by the most gifted orators of Greece and Rome.

The orator judiciously omitted to give a biographical sketch of the late President, as the incidents of his life must be familiar to every one; but he alluded to his brilliant services in the field, under the gallant Wayne, at the battle of the Miami Rapids, and his subsequent civil career, abounding in usefulness, in the Western territories, with whose welfare and prosperity his very existence seemed to be identified. He alluded particularly to two important acts of his life, viz: His conduct in relation to the Indians, when the Prophet and Tecumseh were striving to establish a great Indian confederacy which threatened desolation to the settlers on the frontier, and which resulted in the glorious battle of Tippecanoe, that prostrated all the plans of the Prophet, and restored tranquility along the border. The other was his agency in Congress in 1789, in establishing a mode of disposing of the public lands in Ohio, which would take them out of the hands of the rich speculator, and enable every industrious man to become a landholder, and cherish a deep interest in the soil.

The orator dwelt not upon the battles which Gen. Harrison had fought, on the various public services which he had rendered, and which were recorded in the pages of history—but he said much in relation to his general character, which had been severely tested by the ordeal, which he had just passed through. He spoke of his practical usefulness—of his sound good sense—of his discretion, his wisdom, and his incorruptible honesty. His goodness of heart, his benevolence, were portrayed in vivid colors, and also that justice which formed a noble trait in his character, and which, said the orator, promised an administration as impartial as the gifts of God. He described the republicanism of his principles—the simplicity of his life—and his true AMERICAN feelings, which were not bounded by rivers or imaginary lines, but which took in all.

Mr. Choate paid a deserved tribute to his intellectual attainments, to the decision and energy of his character, which proved that he was equal to any of the important emergencies in which he had been placed in the course of his useful and eventful life,—but he said that there was one trait in his character which stood out in bold relief—and that applauding millions of grateful citizens would hereafter designate him by the title of the GOOD PRESIDENT. He had not been selected by the people as a candidate for the highest office in their gift, for the battles he had fought, for his towering genius, or for his skill as a politician—but because he was a good and just man, who feared God, and dearly loved his country.

Mr. Choate said there were times when it was good for a nation, as well as an individual, to be afflicted—and he trusted that the death of our venerated President, which was lamented as a national calamity by all parties, would tend to soften the asperity of party feeling, and promote a spirit of union and harmony, which must be gratifying to every patriotic bosom.

But we dare not give even an outline of Mr. Choate's address on this deeply interesting occasion. It will doubtless be laid before the public, in an enduring form, when it will be seen that, besides the noble sentiment and patriotic lessons which it inculcates, it contains many passages of deep pathos, and others of surpassing delicacy and beauty. It was a production worthy of the fame of the orator, and of his excellence as a man—and no one can listen to an address, such as was delivered yesterday in Faneuil Hall, without feeling proud of his country's institutions, and departing for his home a better and a wiser man.

After the Eulogy was pronounced, the following Anthem was sung by the choir in a style which excited the admiration of every person present.

ANTHEM.

Child of mortality whence comest thou?
From the dark womb of earth,
I first deriv'd my birth,
And when the word goes forth, that is my home.
Child of a transient day, there shalt thou rest?
No, when this dream is o'er,
Then the freed soul will soar,
To where sorrow comes no more, realms of the blest.
Heir of eternity, teach me the road.
Trust a Redeemer's love,
Faith by obedience prove,
And share in courts above, Christ's own abode.
There in th' ethereal plains,
Join in the angelic strains.
Jesus forever reigns, glory to God.

The services were concluded by an appropriate Prayer and Benediction from Mr. Adams, pastor of Essex street Church.

It is hardly necessary to say that the shops and other places of business were generally closed throughout the day. The people looked and acted as became the solemnity of the occasion, and the whole proceedings were of a character in the highest degree honorable to our citizens.

MAINE LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature of Maine adjourned on Saturday last, after a session of three and a half months.

Governor Kent has been nominated by the Whig members for another term, and has consented to be a candidate.

Washington Correspondence.

Washington, April 15, 1841.

The new President is now established in the Executive mansion. He held a Cabinet council there to-day (the first that has taken place there since the death of Gen. Harrison). They remained in session more than two hours. The subjects before them were the state of our relations with Great Britain, generally; and more particularly the dispatches to be sent from the Department of State to London, and the correspondence with the British Minister.

Now, I hope, none of your readers will expect me to communicate the purport of these. Under the two preceding Administrations there was a laxity of the rules prescribed by international etiquette which, I trust, will never be countenanced again. While negotiations were yet inchoate, it frequently occurred that the substance of a Secretary's letters, or a foreign minister's replies, or the communications of one of our National representatives abroad got out, through such channels as gave the publication almost an authorized and official character. This gave, in several notable instances, great umbrage to foreign governments; and with just reason. For they found that many things which had been communicated in confidence had been published to all America; and, consequently, to all Europe. Mr. Webster will correct the practice; and our diplomatic affairs will be strictly confidential, except when the publication of them is compatible with the interest of the nation, and the decorum due to the other governments. There is a morbid curiosity, I know, to learn all that transpires here in official quarters. The respectable portion of the press should not minister to this depraved appetite, by giving circulation to idle rumors. Whatever is known, or may be properly communicated, you shall hear; but your readers, I trust, will look to me for facts not fabrications.

It is the practice, on the accession of a new President, to take an inventory of every article of furniture, all the appointments of the Rooms of State, the plate, &c., &c. appertaining to the Executive Mansion. This is due to the people,—to him who has occupied the House—and to him who succeeds to it. It is necessary as a preservation against waste and losses by servants, and otherwise. Mr. John Tyler, Jr., went through this task of inventory, to-day, accompanied by Col. Copeland and Mr. Benjamin Harrison, Jr., and the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

President Tyler will make himself, emphatically, "PRESIDENT OF THE PEOPLE."

The Whig party are eminently fortunate in having elected precisely this man to the second office of the government.

To his principles no objection can be taken even by the Opposition. On the contrary, their leading organs say they coincide with their own; and they furnish the public with long articles which, if they prove any thing, show most incontestibly, that these journals and the party whose organs they are, ought, in good faith, to support President Tyler, until at least he does something with which they may fairly quarrel.

The sole ground of complaint thus far is, that he places the utmost confidence in General Harrison's Cabinet. Candid people will hardly think such a thing to be a fair ground of quarrel. It looks too much as if certain leaders wanted to bring about a different state of things, to inure to their own advantage. If they were honest and sincere, they would rather rejoice that a man of their principles (as they call Mr. TYLER) has succeeded in obtaining the suffrages of the American people.

The Secretary of the Navy returned to the city, last evening, from his visit to North Carolina.

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1841.

A new crowd is beginning to assemble in Washington—new faces are seen at the principal hotels, in Pennsylvania Avenue, (when the sun deigns to shine out,) and in all places of public resort. There is a quite new set come on,—all, of course, to pay their respects to PRESIDENT TYLER, with the most perfect disinterestedness! I am sorry to say that the office-seeking mania is, by no means, diminished; but in justice to the mass of the Whig party, I must add, it is chiefly confined to the eleventh hour conformists—the most sturdy beggars being among those who went with the administration of GEN. JACKSON and MR. VAN BUREN until they were successively thrown off, as unfit for further service. They are gentlemen of that easy public virtue who never pay their principles the compliment of standing by them when their interests are in the way, and now profess to be as zealous for Mr. TYLER as they were for Mr. VAN BUREN a short time ago.

The success which attended the impertunate solicitations of some of the conformers, during General Harrison's brief term, has inspired this class with bright hopes and high aspirations. One (who, in a neighboring city, has been the recipient of government bounty for eighteen years—who, in the days of Mr. Adams, was an Adams man—in the days of Jackson, a hot Jackson man—in the days of Mr. Van Buren, a Van Buren man, until Mr. Van Buren took it into his head, one day, to turn him out)—asks now only for the office of ASSISTANT POST-MASTER GENERAL!

and, the best of the joke is, boasts that he is as sure of it, as if the commission were in his pocket. He being a MARTYR, absolutely—a victim of Proscription—after having snugly enjoyed the distinction and, what was better, the lucre of office under the last four Administrations, and supported them all with wonderfully facile compliance, until the knowing gentleman from Kinderhook, happened to find him out.

What particular claim these conformers have to the notice of the Administration, it would be difficult to tell. But they make up, by importunity, for what they want in desert;—and importunity—the daily supplication—the fawning demeanor—and the beggar's petition style of pleading, cannot be put on by the honest and meritorious portion of any party.

The ladies of Gen. Harrison's family left Washington to-day. They were attended by Col. Copeland, a nephew of the General's.

It is remarkable that none of the late President's blood relatives applied or was presented for any office, while so many, mere hangers-on, so urgently sued, and pressed, and almost demanded, on the claim or pretence of personal friendship, or old acquaintance, or other familiar relationship. The country will be glad to learn that, since the death of General Harrison, the best disposition has been manifested to provide honorably and advantageously for the General's family. His son-in-law, who would have been his private Secretary, (Mr. TAYLOR) has been appointed to the office of Postmaster of Cincinnati. One of his sons has been appointed to an honorable and lucrative office in a new and rising Territory. His two grandsons will be placed at West Point. The salary of President for one year, perhaps, for two years, will be voted by Congress, for the benefit of the family. The departed patriot will be honored and remembered by the people in every suitable manner. But the nation, and the men and the head of the government should not be expected to admit the pretensions of all who found them on their personal relations toward the General, and his kindness and partiality, and who ask for the highest offices—foreign missions and the like—without any qualifications whatever for them.

The Old World.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE. ARRIVAL OF THE COLUMBIA.

The steamship COLUMBIA, Capt. Judkins, arrived at Boston at 7 o'clock on Monday evening, in fifteen days and eight hours from Liverpool, which port she left at 10 A. M. on the 4th instant. She reached Halifax at 1 P. M. on the 17th and sailed at 7 on the same evening for Boston. She encountered strong and adverse gales during nearly the whole passage.

The political intelligence is not important. The war fever against this country, which sprung up at the arrival of the news of McLeod's arrest and the subsequent proceedings of the Lockport "sovereigns," had been almost entirely dispelled by later advices from this country, including a confidential assurance from Mr. Fox, that our government was disposed to act with just magnanimity, and an anxious desire for the preservation of peace.

There is nothing later from China or India.

The affairs of the Mohamedan empire are by no means settled. Jealousies and feuds still exist between the Sultan and the Pacha of Egypt. The former has declared that he reserves to himself the right to appoint to the Pachalic of Egypt any member of the Pacha's family whom he may prefer. The latter as frankly gives notice that he will submit to no such exercise of authority.

A great robbery of plate has been committed at Windsor Castle. About one hundred weight of costly silver, furniture and ornaments were stolen. The robbers have probably been detected.

The Great Western, which was advertised to leave Bristol on the 2d for this port, was kept back for want of passengers. She then advertised to leave for Halifax and Boston on the 2d, but with no better fortune. She finally advertised to leave on the 8th; but it was apprehended that Cunard's Britannia, which was to leave Liverpool on the 10th, would leave her aground again.

The Britannia, Capt. Cleland, arrived at Liverpool on the 31st ult., in fourteen days and eighteen hours from Boston.

The President, from this city, had not arrived at Liverpool on the 4th, though she had been out over twenty-four days. The Orpheus packet ship, which sailed in company with her, arrived on the 1st, and the Virginian, which sailed three days later, had also arrived. The President must "give it up."

The new packet ship Patrick Henry, arrived at New-York from Liverpool in fifteen days.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, April 3, 1841.

The public never appeared to be more expectant and excited for receipt of news, than it was for the arrival of the steamers President and Britannia, which it was supposed would bring something decisive in regard to the relations between the two countries. The tenor of the news by the Britannia is considered decidedly favorable and pacific, and no apprehensions of hostilities are now entertained. Funds immediately rose half per cent., and to-day are one per cent. higher than previous to the receipt of the news. Money is abundant, and discounts have been made at  $4\frac{1}{2}$  a 5 per cent. the past week.

You will probably observe a great change in the tone of the press here toward America.

American credit has, I am sorry to say, received a great check, in consequence of the recent suspensions and consequent financial difficulties on your side, which I will not say it will never recover from, but it will be many years before confidence will be re-inspired. Of all injuries, a pecuniary one is the last forgiven, and the recent suspension of the United States Bank, and developments attendant upon it, certainly give cause of complaint to those who have invested in it. Here, the connexion of the United States government with the Bank has not been by many supposed to be dissolved, and they view the insolvency of the institution as a national affair.

Shares are £5 10s. to £5 15s., and there have been many operations within these prices. Perhaps one cause is the abundance of money, leading parties to seek investment, and rendering them unwilling to call in loans and force holders of shares to realize to pay off advances.

It is known that the bonds of the Bank, falling due on the 15th inst. will not be paid, but this does not alter the general confidence in the opinion that the shares must be worth £5—a corollary from this would be if not worth £5, they are worth nothing.

Shipments to the United States have been ever for some time; the home trade is in a languid state, and some distress in this trade is foreboded.

The quarter's average of Bank of England to 30th March is as follows:

LIABILITIES.	ASSETS.
Circulation.... £16,537,000	Securities.....£22,328,000
Deposits.....7,212,000	Bullion.....4,339,000
£23,749,000	£26,667,000

Exchange on Paris last night's post, for three day bills, 35 40, a great improvement, and generally foreign exchanges show improvement.

The markets generally in London are not very brisk; prices appear well supported. Tea's, company's, 1 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. cash. Tea market very firm. The cotton market at Liverpool appears in rather a gloomy way. Purchases are only made as the actual wants of manufacturer's require. Several of the principal only working short time.

Sales for the week ending last evening, 18,700 bales principally American, at a decline of 1-8d per lb.

Great anxiety is felt for the safety of the President Steamer, which left New York on the 11th March. The Orpheus, sailed two hours after, has arrived at Liverpool, the Sampson, at Deal, sailed 12th, and this morning we learn that the Sheffield, sailed 14th, is in at Liverpool.

Insurance this morning on the President £10 10 per ct.

POLITICAL AND OTHER ITEMS.

The London Times states that government received despatches from Mr. Fox by the Britannia steamer, and that those despatches leave no doubt of an amicable and immediate settlement between the United States and Great-Britain, as far as regards the question of McLeod. Mr. Fox had received a communication to that effect from the American government, couched in the most conciliatory language. We think (adds the Times) that the public mind may be at rest on this point.

The Liverpool Mail of April 1st contains the following speculative remarks respecting their connection with us and China:—

We understand that government have received despatches from Mr. Fox, the British Minister resident at Washington, intimating that his demand for the release of Mr. McLeod has been received in a most conciliatory spirit by the new President and the American Cabinet, and that the strongest assurances have been given him that the unfortunate and much injured gentleman will be safely restored to his friends, and ample compensation made him for the insult he has sustained and the sufferings he has endured.

All this is satisfactory enough, as far as Mr. McLeod is concerned; but what reparation is to be made to England for the past, and what indemnity given for the future, in a matter deeply affecting the honor of this country and the laws of civilized nations? We cannot see how the release of Mr. McLeod alters the complex nature of the question at issue. If the State of New York is permitted to claim the right of arresting, imprisoning, and trying for his life, every Canadian subject of her Majesty, who, in the discharge of his duty, may fire a musket at an American citizen acting piratically, or assisting pirates on the line, no man's life or liberty would be safe for a moment upon a disturbed frontier. After all, we are only at the beginning of this business.

EARTHQUAKE AT AMMERAPORA.—This city is said to have been almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, which happened on the night of the 23d of March, 1840; 360 persons were killed. The shock lasted two or three minutes, and extended from north to south. The cities of Ava and Tragan are also said to have been destroyed, with many neighboring villages.

DUBLIN, March 31.—Yesterday morning the vessel called the Energy left the port of Limerick, with 195 emigrants for Quebec, all of the laboring or farming class, who seemed transported (with fresh hopes of success in another land. This day the Berneo sails with 300 passengers for the same port. Tomorrow the Ninian will sail with 196; and on Friday the Breeze, with 206 more. The whole number amounts to nearly 900 souls, all bound for Quebec.

GOVERNOR OF NEW BRUNSWICK.—Downing Street, March 25.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint Lieutenant-Colonel Sir William George Colebrooke, Knight, to be Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick and its dependencies.

FATAL COLLISION ON THE LEEDS AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY.—A dreadful accident occurred on the afternoon of yesterday week, near Moston, about four miles from Manchester, owing to the misconduct of a superintendent of engineers, who became a victim to his own carelessness and neglect of orders. This unfortunate man (Charles Innis) had been assisting with an extra engine and tender the four o'clock passenger train from Manchester up the first incline at Moston; and instead of returning, according to regulation, by another rail, he backed his engine to return on the same line. The consequences were dreadful. The luggage-train which left Manchester at half-past four suddenly came in sight, when within 200 yards of him, at great speed, just where there is a sharp curve in the line, and the shock which ensued was so fearful that, according to the description of an eye-witness, the tender of the engine which Innis was piloting was broken into fragments, such as might be gathered up in a basket. Innis himself was thrown off, and died of his injuries in about half an hour; the fireman was severely hurt; and the damage done to the engines, tenders, and carriages was very great. The coroner's jury, in accordance with these facts, found that the deceased fell a victim to his own carelessness.—[Liverpool paper.]

FRANCE.—The fortification of Paris is still proceeding, against the wishes of a great majority of the people. The government is embarrassed in its finances, and announces a new loan of 450,000,000 francs.

ANARCHICAL MOVEMENT AT MARSEILLES.

Accounts from Paris to April 1, state that the amendment of the commission, curtailing the expenses of the fortifications of Paris, and substituting a simple for a bastioned wall, was rejected in the Chamber of Peers on Wednesday, by 148 votes against 91. This is tantamount to passing the original bill, which was no doubt voted on the first.

For some days the vigilance of the authorities was excited by several extraordinary meetings held by the republican leaders, and by the men affiliated to the secret societies in the south of France. It was accordingly inferred that they intended some machination, and anonymous letters and half-disclosures, made by some of the conspirators who were frightened at the project in which they were to be actors, led to the discovery of the plot, which had for its object to set fire to the vessels in the harbor, and while the population would be engaged in extinguishing the conflagration, the conspirators were to have plundered the Bank, the offices of the Receiver General, &c.

The day, or rather night chosen for the execution of this abominable project was the 23d. They expected to be joined by the laborers on the Marseilles canal, who had been tampered with to that effect.

The authorities, however, adopted measures to prevent the co-operation of the latter. Gendarmes were stationed at the meeting of the roads leading to the canal, and police agents in disguise kept a watch on the house which was to serve as the general rendezvous of the conspirators. This house was the tavern known by the name of Le Polonais. About 11 o'clock at night they began to arrive by bands of five and six at the house, and in the course of a short time the tavern and the adjoining enclosure were occupied by between 250 and 300 individuals. The police, aided by the armed force, had taken such efficient measures that not one of them could have escaped, when a mounted gendarme having approached a group of five, who were coming down by the lane des Crotes, received a discharge of three pistols, to which he replied, and that moment orders to act were given.

The report of the shots unfortunately spread the alarm among the conspirators, and before the troops of the line could come up, they were seized with a general panic, and fled in every direction. The police found the doors of the tavern closed, and when they were burst open by the Sappers, not an inmate was discovered in it. But the soldiers, accompanied by the commissaries of police, having set out in pursuit of the fugitives, arrested fourteen, who were still armed with pistols, poniards, sabres, &c.

During this expedition, the police arrested three other individuals, belonging to a band which presented itself at the tavern of l'Ascension, at the extremity of the Boulevard des Trois Jours, another rendezvous of the conspirators.

Yesterday four more were arrested. The prisoners belong to the lowest class of society. With the exception of one, who is 54 years of age, they are all under 30, and only one of them is a native of Marseilles."

SPAIN.

Accounts from Madrid come down to the 21st instant. The proceedings of the Cortes has been chiefly confined to the formal opening of the session.

Letters from Valencia, of the 13th inst., announce that Captain-General Seoane had issued orders for the demolition of all the fortresses in the province. The people of Chiva had sent a deputation to the General, praying him to spare the fort of that town; but they had experienced a refusal. Later accounts state that the disturbances which called for this interference had not ceased in Valencia.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

The recent advices from Alexandria state that both the Pasha and Commodore Napier had left that city; the Pasha for Cairo, to visit Ibrahim Pasha, and the Commodore for Marmora.

Before his departure, Mehmet Ali had sent a letter to the Grand Vizier in Constantinople, objecting strongly to the conditions with which the Porte had burdened the cession of the hereditary Pashalic of Egypt. He required the following modifications of those conditions; that the Governor of Egypt should enjoy the right of choosing his successor himself; that this successor should not be obliged to proceed to Constantinople to receive his investiture from the Porte; that the superior offices of the Egyptian Government should be appointed by himself and his successors, and not by the Sultan; that he should be exonerated from paying the tribute fixed by the Sultan, during a limited period, in order to apply the entire of the public revenues to ameliorate the condition of the inhabitants of Egypt and that he should not be obliged to admit a Committee of Surveillance, mentioned in the Imperial hatti-scheriff as about to be sent to Egypt.

Ibrahim Pasha's retreat from Syria appears to have been far more disastrous than it was first supposed to be. Ibrahim himself was so borne down by illness that his death was expected; and the public in Egypt were already speculating upon the probable effect which his removal would have in facilitating the final settlement of the Eastern question. Of 40,000 men, which formed the strength of his army when it left Damascus for Egypt, only 20,000 survived the march; and an unenumerated crowd of women and children also perished. Among the latter were 200 or 300 boys, whom Ibrahim Pasha had seized as hostages for the unmolested retreat of his army.

The Druse and Maronite Sheiks, for whose safe return to Syria the Napier convention stipulated, had reached Alexandria, with their attendants, on their way to Syria.

Advices from Constantinople to the 8th ult. announces the receipt of Mehmet Ali's letter of remonstrance to the Grand Vizier. The ministers and high functionaries of the Porte immediately assembled in extraordinary council, and the representatives of the European Courts were consulted. The result of the conference is not stated; but it is understood that the Porte would await a reference to the Four Powers. Lord Ponsonby is said to have admitted that the conditions demanded of Mehmet Ali were more stringent than Great Britain expected they would be.

A firman from the Porte to Mehmet Ali, dated February 13th, has been published. Alluding to a former firman conveying under certain conditions the hereditary government of Egypt, the Sultan offers to confirm the appointment of the higher officers of government already in occupation. The same firman forbids the detention of persons in the provinces who have been retained as hostages for the payment of troops, and the mutilation of men for the guard of the harem.

Letters from Beyrout to the 20th February, state that the rebuilding of the city was proceeding with activity. The South of Syria was still unsettled, and the plague was raging in Acre and the vicinity. A party of English sappers and miners still remained at Beyrout.

The Turkish Albanian troops had been recalled from Syria, and Government threatened to punish the perpetrators of outrages committed near Beyrout.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

Small patterns, stripes and checks will be fashionable this season, in mourning dresses: and for the promenade, poplins, brochees, watered silks, Parmure prairie, in small brochee flowers, on light green ecru, or lilac grounds; orientales, pou de soie, fleur-de-lis; velvet ailes de mouche, is the prettiest novelty, and derives its name from possessing the softness of velvet with lightness and variety of its tints; the armure recaille is also admired. Tight sleeves cannot be considered very general, in light materials they will not be admitted; flounces are not much in favor, skirts continue to be made long, and the bodies are still pointed. Fancy bead buttons are much used on all ball dresses, and it is expected they will be fashionable on redingots this season. For ball dresses, crapes, gauzes, watered silks, with double and treble skirts, guimp trimmings, marabouts, and flowers ornament them, the corsage a la Greque, and the short sleeves full trimmed. Black has been very fashionable in Paris, whether in velvet, satin, watered silk, crape, or lace dresses, ornamented with diamonds or flowers. Redingots of silk are trimmed with folds, edged by a narrow fringe, or with small chicorées. Scarfs of the same material as the dress, are much admired in Paris, the ends are fringed, and the folds are confined on the shoulders; the are worn in silk, mousseline de laines, &c. Scarfs of shaded silk, orange glacee, are trimmed with point d'Alencon; black lace scarfs, as well as those of point lace, mechin, muslin, china crape, and faulard, are all in fashion.

A new shaped berthe has appeared, with four points, one reaches to the point of the body, the others are on the shoulders and back.

Berets, toques of black velvet, with marabout, turbans, remille, round hats a la creole, a la belle peule; turbans of gauze, embroidered in gold, with crowns of velvet sprigged with gold or cachemire, with scarfs of point lace and tassels, Algerien. Coiffures Madoana, a la Louis XIV., small toquets de page, hats a la marquise, are all now in demand.

Straw bonnets are preparing in Paris, a jours with lires of velvet, others with filets of chenille; also close capotes of Leghorn and paille de riz. Capotes of crape are very fashionable just now in Paris, in pink, green, lilac, with marabouts of the same color, or wreaths of roses, mixed with heart's-ease and reeds.

A MAGNIFICENT PROJECT.—The Journal of Commerce says that four steam-ships are to be built forthwith, in this port, to be employed in navigating the Atlantic Ocean, and to be each of the capacity of two thousand five hundred tons. Persons who understand the plan, have no doubt that in speed and every good quality, these ships will be found quite superior to any of the vessels hitherto employed in this service. The cost will be about three millions of dollars. The projectors of the plan proposed to the late and present Administration to confer on the government the right to take these ships in case of war, at a fair valuation, if only the Administration would procure such a modification of the present post office law, as to allow the owners to collect an inward postage on letters. The law now requires all letters brought by vessels to be deposited in the post office at two cents each. This most important proposition, upon a plan which would furnish a Navy without cost in peace, and of the greatest possible efficiency in time of war, we are sorry to say, neither the past or present Administration has found time to determine.

LATER FROM CANTON.—The ship Panama, Capt. Benjamin, arrived on the 16th inst. with a cargo of Teas. She left Macao on the 6th January, and brings news three weeks later than our previous advices. The Panama sailed under a special permit from Admiral Bremer, Commander-in-chief of her Majesty's naval forces in India and China.

The news brought by this vessel is not of a very important character. The negotiations, already so protracted between the two belligerent powers, are not yet terminated; nor does anything appear to indicate a speedy issue, either of peace or war.

Omitting some tedious details of suspended and renewed negotiations, all of which have been without result, we give the following extracts as the substance of what is interesting in the papers:

By the Syden, from Chusan the 19th, and the Scotland the 20th December, we have received intelligence to that date, which, however presents no features of much interest. Everything remained in the same state as before; such of the troops as had not been too far reduced by illness, were recovering under the influence of a fine climate and a good supply of fresh provisions, while many cases of illness of long standing still ended fatally.

The American Vice Consul, with a pass from the Chinese authorities, about a week since proceeded to Bogue in a Chop boat, and had an interview with H. M. Plenipotentiaries. Although we suppose that this interview had reference to the departure of the two American ships above referred to, its result has not become known, no official communication having been made by the Vice Consul on the subject of his countrymen at Canton since his return.

From the Canton Press of Jan. 2.

On the 26th of December, it was generally reported, that no communications having been received from Keshen at the prescribed time, the Bogue forts would be attacked on the Monday following. On the Sunday, however, a dispatch was received, in consequence of which, as we know from official sources, "the negotiations were resumed," and from Captain Elliot's presence in Macao, we presume that another term has been agreed on for a final answer. Considerable astonishment has been caused by the news that the two American ships Panama and Kosciusko, which entered the port on the day the blockade came in force, and have since taken in a cargo of teas at Whampoa, have been allowed by the Commodore to break the blockade and proceed to sea.

Every reader must be struck by the want of energy and decision that has marked the conduct of the Expedition, and by the wretched state of the Commissariat at Chusan, in consequence of which neglect a great number of lives have been lost. Of 3353 men that had been landed in good health at Chusan, on the 5th of July, there had died, up to the 21st November, 421; 402 invalids have been sent to Manila, and about 400 to India—a loss in all of 1200 men, more than one-third in four months and a half! What the state of the negotiations carried on here at present may be, is of course not known, they have already been prolonged upward of five weeks, and delay after delay seems to be without regret granted to the Chinese.

In addition to the above, we find the following letter addressed by the Captain of the Panama to the editors of the Courier:

Gentlemen: At the time the Panama left, the Chinese had hauled the junks loaded with stone, on the first bar, preparatory to sinking in the channel, and for fear that they would accomplish their object before I could get out, I was forced to come down to the river without a pilot or chop—waited at second bar several days for a chop, in order to come out. When I left, the junks were hauled in line, intending to sink them as soon as the English attacked the Bogue Forts, and this event was expected to take place the day after my departure. (Signed) D. P. BENJAMIN, Commanding Panama.

A DROUGHT IN MISSOURI.—The Lexington (Mo.) Express of the 20th February says: "There has not been a drop of rain during the whole winter, and only about four inches of snow altogether. Our streets and roads are dry and in fine order. To take the season through, we never observed a milder or more delightful one, even in the Old Dominion."

THE FIRE AT NORTH BEND.—Great uneasiness was caused by the rumor that General Harrison's dwelling at North Bend had been destroyed by fire on the 11th inst. The Cincinnati Gazette, of the 13th, learns from direct information received in that city, that the building had been on fire, but only the upper story of the west wing sustained any material damage. The roof and this were destroyed, but without, we understand, the loss of any furniture, or seriously inconveniencing the afflicted family.

SIR ALLAN MACNAB.—The Hamilton Gazette of the 5th instant, states that Sir Allan Macnab has been dismissed from the office of Queen's Counsel, and that James E. Small, Esq. had arrived at Hamilton with instructions to conduct the Crown prosecutions throughout the Western Circuit. Sir Allan had expressed his disapprobation of the policy pursued by the present Canadian Administration, and had been severe in his remarks upon the character of the Governor General.

THE RICHMOND WHIG says, in reference to the paragraphs which have gone the rounds about President Tyler's successions to offices for which he was not elected: How this world is given to lying. Excepting the fact, that Gov. Tyler succeeds to the Presidency by the death of Gen. Harrison, there is not one particle of truth in it. He was not made Governor by the death of his predecessor; he was not elected to the Senate as stated.

MRS. HARRISON had reached Cincinnati on her way to Washington the morning on which the intelligence of the President's death reached there. She bears her bereavement better than, in her infirm state of health, could have been hoped. Most of her family are near her, to support and comfort her.

VALUE OF A "BRAVE OLD OAK."—In Munroe county, (New-York,) the stump and roots of an old oak were recently sold for boat knees for $50. The body made 4840 staves, worth $39. Four logs sold for $10, and the top limbs made seven cords of wood. The whole tree sold on the ground for over $100.

THE correspondent of the Savannah Republican writes as follows from Florida, under date of the 4th inst.:

"An express has this morning arrived at Pilatka from Fort King, stating that the Indians had exhibited a hostile attitude this day within one mile of Fort King. A party of seven warriors, suddenly emerging from the hammock, attacked a small party of soldiers who were out hunting, fired upon them, and killed private Thompson, company H, 2d Regiment Infantry, and another individual, a private citizen. This occurrence took place at 12 M. A detachment of the command at Fort King immediately left in pursuit. Another item to add to the pleasing prospect of closing the war. These Indians are supposed to be of the same party which left Fort Clinch yesterday about the time the express started from that station for Fort King. It is now the full of the moon, and you may expect shortly to insert in your columns an article headed 'bloody massacre.'"

General Harrison, in his last out-door exercise, was engaged in assisting the gardener in adjusting some grape vines. The gardener remarked that there would be but little use in trailing the vines, so far as any fruit was concerned, as the boys would come on Sunday, while the family was at church, and steal all the grapes; and suggested to the General, as a guard against such a loss, that he should purchase an active watch-dog. "Better," said the General, "to employ an active Sabbath school teacher; a dog may take care of the grapes, but a good Sabbath school teacher will take care of the grapes and the boys too."

TO THE PUBLIC.

The Publisher of THE NEW WORLD announces that he has made an arrangement with the publisher of the THE BOSTON NOTION, by which, all those who wish to subscribe for the Boston Notion and The New World together, can have both journals for one year on paying or remitting, postage-free, $5 in advance. As the two papers do not publish the same stories in continuation, and, as they will endeavor to avoid issuing the same matter, it is thought that this arrangement will be acceptable to those who would like to take in two periodicals whose ample dimension enable them to contain all the good floating popular literature of the day.

The New World is now publishing Samuel Warren's (author of Passages from the Diary of a late Physician) magnificent story, TEN THOUSAND A-YEAR; Charles Dickens's (Boz) BARNABY RUDGE; W. Harrison Ainsworth's GUY RAVEN; and Henry Cockton's STANLEY THORN.

The Boston Notion is publishing Captain Marryat's new novel THE POACHER; W. H. Ainsworth's OLD ST. PAUL'S, and Henry Cockton's GEORGE ST. GEORGE JULIAN.

Besides these SEVEN novels, to be obtained at the small rate of $5 per annum, the Boston Notion and the New World publish a vast number of selected and original articles from the pens of the first authors in the literary world, as well as a much greater quantity of editorial matter than is usually contained in weekly papers; all valuable public documents—proceedings of Congress and the State Legislatures, and copious compends of intelligence from the four quarters of the globe.

Remittances to be made in current bills to GEORGE ROBERTS, State street, Boston—or to

J. WINCHESTER, Ann-street, New York.

Those who are desirous of reading the affecting and beautiful Sermon by the Rev. Cortlandt Van Rensselaer—which was delivered in Washington before President Tyler, the members of his Cabinet, &c.—published in last week's New World, are informed that a few copies were withheld by us from the general sale, and may be had, if soon applied for.

The Brother Jonathan newspaper of last week, having issued a garbled and incorrect report of a part of an eloquent discourse delivered on Sunday April 11th at the Church of Messiah by the Rev. Orville Dewey, and, having moreover advertised that report as the Sermon itself, thus misleading the public and taking false advantage of Dr. Dewey's high reputation—we shall, on Saturday of next week, publish the true discourse from the author's own manuscript. We applied for a copy of this Sermon in anticipation of its delivery; our request was refused on the ground that, though to be preached on the occasion of the President's death, it was one of a series. The publication in the Brother Jonathan, however, changed Dr. Dewey's determination—and we shall now have the satisfaction to lay before the public this excellent discourse.

POSTMASTERS are requested to aid in the circulation of the NEW WORLD, to whom a commission of 25 per cent is allowed on the subscription price of three dollars, if remitted in notes on which there is no discount in this city. Local Agents are wanted in places where we have one and our friends are solicited to assist us in procuring the service of active and responsible persons. All information and specimens will be supplied by addressing the publisher post paid. All new subscribers, who pay one year in advance, will have a copy sent them of the LEVIATHAN.

Original Discourses.

ON DEATH.

Preached on Sunday, April 11th, 1841, at the Church of the Messiah, New-York.

BY THE REV. ORVILLE DEWEY, D.D.

Hebrews 9: 27. It is appointed unto men once to die.

Among the ordinances which were designed to exert a leading influence on human virtue and improvement, I have lately mentioned death. It was then my intention to bring this subject into the series of discourses which I am addressing to you on human life. But an event has been announced to us during the last week, which, arresting the attention of a whole people, seems to press upon us that great theme, as the appropriate topic of our present meditation—the death of the President of the United States. "How are the mighty fallen!" we may say, "and the princes are brought to nothing."

I have not, however, chosen for my text any passage designed to mark out this event in particular, or to point to it as the principal subject of my present meditation. I shall be led to notice it, indeed, but in connection with a more general theme; and that is, death, as an appointment for human good.

It is most important, if it be possible, to bring that dread and solemn event into this relation. Most men do not see it in this light—do not see it as a good appointment. Death is the awful shadow upon earth; the fixed doom which makes all other calamity light and phenomenal; the fact that strikes a deeper shaft into the world than any other fact. The world trembles at it; grows pale before it; as it trembles and grows pale before nothing else. Nay and with reflecting persons, I think, the feeling that they must die, is usually the feeling of some stern necessity. "Now let me depart—it is good to go hence"—is a language sometimes heard in this world; but it is rare. That dark veil at the termination of the view—there for ever suspended—casts a shade over the whole of life.

1. Now to meet this state of feeling, let me observe in the first place, that death is an appointment of God, founded in the original constitution of things, and of our nature. It is not said that God hath doomed, but that he hath appointed all men once to die. I know that death is commonly regarded as the consequence, the punishment, the doom of sin; and it is supposed that the Scriptures teach this doctrine. But one or two observations will relieve this point from all difficulty, and leave us in possession of a far more rational view of the subject. In the first place, many of those passages which are supposed to refer to this subject—and especially that in which it is said that "death entered into the world by sin"—are regarded by learned commentators as speaking of death, not literally, but figuratively—i. e. of misery; the meaning being that misery has entered into the world by sin, and so misery hath come upon all men because all have sinned. In the same way has been interpreted the language of the original sentence, "in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;" i. e. thou shalt be miserable; for Adam did not literally die.

But in the next place, it is more important to observe, that even if this language be taken literally, it does not support the position that simple departure from this life is a penal sentence. There is an essential distinction to be made between death and simple departure from this world. Departure, the mere termination of organic life, must have been a part of the original system and intent of the Creator. It is that to which the human body tends by its essential constitution. It is as much in the natural course of things as childhood, youth, manhood, or old age. The earth, too, it is evident, was not made for the permanent abode of men. Only one of its generations at a time can draw subsistence from it. Its accumulating generations could not even stand upon it. One generation, therefore, must give place to another. That is, it must depart; it must die. In this sense, therefore, death did not come into the world by sin. It was a part of the original plan of the world. But now, again, this departure may doubtless assume a particular character in consequence of sin. It may be a death, dark, fearful; distressful both to body and mind. Vice, for instance, brings on disease, and disease produces death; and this death, thus premature and agonizing, is the fruit of sin. And doubtless, in many ways, and in every way, death must be a more afflictive event, both to the sufferer and to survivors, in consequence of our spiritual defects.

But still, departure, and bereavement too, must have been a part of the original plan. It is obvious—it is too plain to insist upon—that a world which is hourly witnessing the birth of thousands, must witness also the departure of thousands every hour; that there could be no place for life, if there were no provision for death. In the ordinary course of things, we find that the overcrowded dwelling must part with some of its inmates to build other dwellings; that the over-populous nation must send out colonies to other lands. And so, were none to die, the families and colonies of the earth would soon possess it all; and the world would cry out upon death for help. Nay, and death would inevitably come; and it would come amidst horrors now unknown—amidst the agonies of famine, and the suffocation of fullness. The whole world would soon become like that celebrated prison in Calcutta, where one or two hundred of English soldiers and officers were thrown, to pant for breath for a few hours, and then to gnash upon each other with the rage of insanity, till they died.

II. More wisely and mercifully has it been appointed that death should approach us. But it is not in this view alone that I say this; nor was it on this chiefly that I proposed to insist. Death, I say, in the second place, is a part of the discipline of life. I do not now go back to the question, why we were made such as we are; but being such as we are, I say, that the world would not exist in its present moral order without the prospect of death. It may be thought by some that that prospect is too little contemplated to exert much influence. It is true, no doubt, that we do not contemplate it so much nor so distinctly as we ought; and yet I must say, that we all think of it more, I believe, than many preachers seem to imagine. I cannot help saying that, to my view, they both overrate the merit, and underrate the amount, of such reflections. But, not to insist at present upon these direct meditations, there are thoughts of death which steal inensibly into our minds, and mingle with our other thoughts, and impart a tone of sobriety to our pursuits.

The learned Bishop Warburton, assuming—though falsely assuming, as I think—that the Hebrews had no knowledge of a future life, has gone into a very elaborate argument, to show that Moses must have had a divine commission, attested by miracles. For he maintained that without the expectation of future retribution, nothing but a special and miraculous interposition could suffice to hold a people in the bonds of moral order. How much more necessary to this end is death! What could keep in any bounds the swellings of ambition, pride, cruelty, luxury, and licentiousness, did not death interpose its dread barrier? It is commonly called the king of terrors, as if in that character it were to be deprecated. But I say not so. Its terrors are chiefly for those who most need them. And well is it that that shadowing king of terrors stands in the path, and says to self-indulgence, "remember!" and to oppression, "be ware!"—else were not the earth habitable. What would become of kingdoms and nations, if the royal voluptuaries and tyrants, that often reign over them, saw no dark admonitory doom before them. "Louis XV.," says one, "had always the kindest abhorrence of death. * * * He would not suffer it to be spoken of—avoided the sight of church-yards, funeral monuments, and whatsoever could bring it to mind. * * * But figure his thought," pursues the writer, "when death is now clutching at his own heart-strings, unlooked for, inexorable! Yes, poor Louis, Death has found thee. No palace-walls, nor life-guards, gorgeous tapestries, nor gilt buckram of stiffest ceremonial, could keep him out; but he is here—here at thy very life-breath—and will extinguish it. Thou, whose whole existence hitherto was a chimeric and a scenic show, at length become a reality; sumptuous Versailles bursts asunder like a dream, into void immensity; Time is done, and all the scaffolding of time falls wrecked, with hideous clangor, around thy soul; the pale kingdoms yawn open; and there thou must enter, naked, all unkinged, and await what is appointed thee." "The heathen Emperor asks of his soul, 'Into what places art thou now departing?' The Catholic king must answer, 'To the judgment-bar of the most high God!' Yes, it is a summing-up of life, a final settling, and giving in the account of the deeds done in the body; they are done now, and lie there unalterable; and do bear their fruits, long as eternity shall last."

"And yet," continues the writer, "let no meanest man lay flattering unction to his soul. Louis was a ruler; but art thou not also one? His wide France—look at it from the fixed stars, (themselves not yet infinitude)—is no wider than thy narrow brick-fold—thy wharf, or thy warehouse is—where thou also didst faithfully, or didst unfaithfully. Map! 'symbol of eternity, imprisoned into time!' it is not thy works, which are all mortal, infinitely little, and the greatest no greater than the least, but only the spirit thou workest in, that can have worth or continuance!"

Thus solemn and needful are the teachings of death to the high and powerful; nor only to these, but to all men. And should any one ask why the allotted term of man's existence on earth is so brief, I still answer, that, in this respect, too, I see in death, a ministration to human improvement. The advancement of the world depends upon the earlier vigor and flexibility of life. I say not upon young men and women—for that seems to me to be one of the follies of our time—but upon the age between twenty-five and sixty. After that, opinions become settled, habits fixed; and the world may not look for new ideas, innovating enterprises, or enthusiasm to prosecute them. Inventions, reforms, are seldom to be seen in old age. Age has, indeed, its part to act; to guide the zeal and restrain the rashness of the young. Its experience and wisdom are to be respected; far more, I think, than they are at this day; but old men are not the working men of the world. What, then, is the ordinance that is to meet this condition of humanity? The scythe of Death mows down the generations, that it may provide for a more vigorous growth—cuts away the aged trees, that younger and fairer ones may shoot up in their stead—removes fixtures, that it may prepare for improvements. Thus the world is continually recruited with fresh vigor, and is pervaded by an imaginative and flexible enterprise; and thus its arts are advanced; its fields are cultivated with increasing skill; its houses are built on improved plans; its science and literature are constantly rising; and its religious systems are slowly making progress from their rude, barbarian infancy to matured and millennial perfection. Death, then, grim and fearful as it is accounted, is, like decay in nature, the constant enricher, improver, and beautifier of the world. I would not give up the world to take its final character and fate, from the generation that is now upon it. If the wicked Ammon had not died, the young Josiah could not have come to the kingdom. No, let the successive generations rise, and bear on the ark of God higher and higher, till it becomes the throne of the world!

I look upon this world, then, as a school for the training of beings for another life; and I look upon this school as simply temporary. Death does not break it up, but only ends it. Thus you see schools all over the land, and some are entering and others are leaving them at every moment. So do I look upon this world, and upon all the worlds around us, as schools.

The dismissal from this school, the world, to another, is surely a solemn event: I have no design to represent it otherwise. How often is this felt, in rising from one earthly school to another! Then an examination is to be sustained, which passes judgment upon the whole previous course. To many a young man what a serious time is this! How earnestly and anxiously does he labor to prepare himself! And if he has idled away the precious years of study, how difficult, if not impossible, does he find it, at last, to repair the error! How deeply does he feel that his preparation should have engaged his whole previous time!

Thus is death a teacher that fills the world with its presence. It penetrates through the whole of life—penetrates every relation of life. It brings the sense of obligation to a point from which there is no escape—brings the great moral conflict of life to a solemn issue. Blank negation as it is, it is the most positive and solemn ministration to the world. There are those, indeed, who can act upon a far higher thought; but, to the world at large, it is a ministration most necessary.

Let us consider it a little farther in this light, and in some further applications.

What a solemn tone does death put into the voice of the past? It is not blank vacuity that speaks to us, but death. This world has been the dwelling-place of innumerable beings, just like ourselves. It is the great realm of death; and becomes at once hallowed and monitory, by the grandeur and awfulness of that dominion. The image of the past thus stands upon the tablet of memory, the certainty of death. And this certainty is a most necessary element of the lesson. If there were any possibility of shunning that destiny, the lesson were lost. But no: man may shuffle aside many things, but he cannot escape death. All else may be repaired, restored, put back where it was before; but that which passes beneath the seal of death, is unchangeable, irrevocable, fixed in eternal certainty.

How impressive, how monitory—I had almost said, how irresistible, is this teaching! Cast back your thoughts to the period of a century ago, and who then filled the spheres of life which we at this moment occupy? The representatives of each one of us! In whatsoever relation we stand, in whatsoever pursuits we follow, in whatsoever positions, social or commercial, we now hold. Such as we are, they were. They were fathers, they were mothers, they were children, they were brothers and sisters, they were friends and associates; but the places that knew them well, know them no more; the familiar voices that called to them, and they answered, are silent; they thought only to live—they thought not to die: life was their reality, and they lost it; death was their dream, and they found it; all the days that they lived were thirty, forty, fifty, or eighty, or ninety years, and they died." There was the man of wealth, with his plans and projects, his anxieties and toils, his ships and merchandises, his house and lots many; he gathered, and he builded; he builded houses for his children, and portioned them; he had much goods laid up for many years, and he said to his soul, "Soul! take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry;" but the day came at last, or the night came, in which it was said, "this day—this night, thy soul shall be required of thee!" There was the man of fashion and of pleasure; he possessed and he expended, or he was lavish of that which was not his own; he was anxious for notice, and intrigued for success; he put on gay habiliments, and hurried to the feast and dance; the theatre knew him; the revel saw him; the giddy whirl of pleasure heard his footsteps; but what—lo! what is this! A marble silence—a coffin—a pall! he stirs not beneath its awful fold—he hears not the voice of his gay companion, that says “poor fellow! he is gone!” There was the man of professional ambition; he studied, and gained stores of learning; he studied arguments, and expounded them; he wrote books, and published them; he got fame, and men said that he was “a great man.” Where are his sayings and his doings now? his cases and his tenures? his new theorems, his controversies, his speeches? Perhaps you will find them among mouldering pamphlets in the library of some Historical Society. Perhaps they linger yet in the breath of men’s speech as a bygone fame. It was my fortune to witness the awful change that passed over such a one, in this very city—one whom a shaft rises to commemorate, by this very way-side, in yonder grave yard. One week I saw him in all the splendor of his eloquence; the next week, as I walked in this street, I saw a funeral procession!—and there were borne the remains of one, who was called the Cicero of his order!

So passes away this world, and we pass away with it. Such as we are, those, who have gone but a little before us, were. And such as they are, we soon shall be. Nothing can stay our course. No hoard of gold, nor crown of honor, nor crowd of cares, nor pressure of engagements, nor throbbing visions of coming prosperity, nor momentous crisis of affairs, can ward off the inevitable hour. The Grecian Epaminondas, when he was told that a distinguished general had died while the battle was raging, exclaimed, “Ye gods! how can a man find time to die at a moment like this!” But every man must find a time to die. Ay, thou man of blood!—Tamerlane or Alaric—Cæsar or Napoleon—whose ruthless sword has drunk the blood of thousands—who wert deaf to the groans and pleadings of human misery—whose delight was in wounds and carnage—who hast crushed ten thousand human hearts beneath thy blood-stained car!—thou hast, in God’s wonderful forbearance, found a time to kill; but thou hast also, in God’s great justice, found a time to die! And over thy grave, whether it be in some proud mausoleum, or by some lonely island shore, many shall moralize and say, “Ill wear’d ambition, how much art thou shrunk!

Where that this body did contain a spirit,
A kingdom for it was too small a bound;
But now—two pieces of the vilest earth
Is room enough.”

And thou, too, who dost make war upon society!—not with bloody weapons and battling armies, but with wiles and intrigues and killing vices—thou who makest innocence thy victim, or pollution thy companion, or hast lured manly youth to thy carousals and thy deadly cup—thou upon whose skirts is the blood of souls; and when the heart-broken parent or the injured brother upbraids thee or pleads with thee, dost answer with a brow of wrath, or a lip of smiling scorn—thou, too, vile seducer! base corrupter of the young—thou, too, must die! thy time must come; and abused and loathing society shall be well rid of thee.

And thou, too, hoarder of ill-gotten gains! who liest as an incubus upon the heart of society—who liest like a huge and sluggish boa-constrictor, gorged with thy prey, or watching for other victims—who, with thy sleek coat and smooth brow, hast a deadly fang within thee—whose breath is poison, and whose fold is destruction—who art a burden to many and blessing to none—who mightest beautify the world around thee, and dost only leave desolation and slime in thy path—thou, too, shalt die! Die, did I say? Art thou not dead already!—dead to every living interest and affection of the world? Yes; thy soul is buried in thy coffers; and the world cares no more for thee, no more asks for generous aid of thee, no more looks for good at thy hand, than if thy body were already nailed down in thy coffin.

Need not these men, my brethren, such tremendous words to be spoken to them? But, thanks be to God, it is not over the bad alone that we are obliged to take up our lamentation, mingled with horror and reproach at their vices, nor to these alone that we are obliged to address the solemn teachings of the pulpit. The good, too, have died—those who were useful, and promised to be useful in their day and generation—and their memory dieth not; but lives, and lends energy and courage to the purposes of all that are good and faithful like them.

And in such wise, I think, I may speak of him who has just sunk from the highest seat of magistracy into the arms of death. I pretend not to speak of his private character, with which I am little acquainted; but one thing, in his public course, has struck me, and I think, has struck all men of all parties; and that is, that he seems to have entered upon his high office with a great, strong, robust intent to do right. That he was perfectly correct in all his views of the public policy, that he was perfectly just to all who differed from him, is more than I feel obliged to say—more than can well be said of any man; but he appeared to me to have been an honest man. And that image of honesty, in an old man, resolved not to expose the integrity of his public conduct by the disturbing chances of a re-election, has won much, I think, upon the heart of the nation.

Alas! he is gone. To many the event, doubtless, has seemed untimely; and they have been tempted to say with the Grecian general, “Alas! that he should die at an hour like this.” But the time came for him to die, and he is gone! Oh! it is not the small calculation of political chances, but it is the great image of death, that is set before an amazed and confounded people. And by what a tremendous contrast is it set before them! But yesterday, troops of friends, admiring crowds, the waving of banners, and the swell of music on the breeze; and that old man’s step was firm, and his eye kindled at the scene; but in an hour unlooked for, the unseen angel descended within the guarded walls, and that firm step faltered, and heavy night settled upon that kindling eye—the tongue uttered a few faithful words for the government and the country—and all is over! Lo! the proudly waving banner folds itself into the still winding sheet; and the noise, the shouting, the tumult, the swelling music, sink hushed into the silent sepulchre. Dread admonition of frailty and mortality! May it not come in vain to those who stand in our high places! May it not come in vain to an amazed people!

Yes, my brethren, this visitation, and every visitation of death, is ordained for our instruction and improvement. “Man appoints,” it has been said, “but God disappoints.” Man may lay plans, and devise means, and may seem to have attained his end; but Heaven prostrates all; not in recklessness, or in wrath, but for man’s advantage. It will teach him by a world of vicissitude and of vanishing appearances, and especially by that great change which consummates all changes, to fix his heart upon a good which is spiritual, unchangeable, immortal.

In fine, death has not broken into the realm of life, as a monster whose only mission is to rage, and rend, and destroy. It is not a dread penalty which was kept in reserve for the contingency of man’s transgression. No; it is an event, evidently laid down in the plan of our being; wisely and kindly “appointed” unto man, as a part of his mortal dispensation. It is not a destroyer of man’s highest interest, but the very contrary. It buildeth up the noblest virtue, and sets around it the most necessary defences. I have seen a family, and more than one such, all whose members lived on together for many years, in peace and prosperity. And when death came into that charmed circle, and sundered that dear and precious bond, I have seen that family, amidst tears and sighs, feeling that it was placed in a new and good school; a school of reflection and of spirituality, of new sympathy and tenderness; a school of holy and immortal teachings. Yes; the teachings of Heaven were all around that family. And so, sooner or later, do they come to us all. Let them not come in vain. Let death be to us the teacher of eternal truth—the minister and the pledge of an immortal life!

A Discourse

ON THE DEATH OF

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON,

LATE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

Pronounced on the morning of April 11, 1841,

BY REV. GEORGE W. BETHUNE,

Minister of the Third Reformed Dutch Church, Philadelphia.

There is no teacher of unerring truth but the Lord our God, and our meditations in his House of Prayer should ever be upon lessons which He hath given. It is not only from his written Word that those lessons may be learned. He speaks to us in the voice of Nature, for all his works are eloquent of instruction; and in the doings of his Providence every event is ordered by his sovereign Will, to remind us that “He is God, and beside Him there is none else.” “There are diversities of operations, but it is the same God, which worketh all in all.” Each is a revelation of that Divine Wisdom, in which the awakened soul may hear “deep calling unto deep.” Yes! often, when the Bible seems written for the careless heart in vain; when Nature, with all her varied wonders, fails to lead us upward to her Maker and ours; God, by some stupendous act of Providence, compels us to tremble before his mysterious Presence, and own the majesty of his resistless Might. At such a time, we need not search his holy pages for a theme. God gives the text, and it becomes us humbly to bow, and learn as “God the Lord doth speak.”

His terror is upon us now. As though an archangel had blown his trump, an oracle has come forth to us from the high place of our land. A wail of lamentation, like that of all Israel weeping in Ramah, when they buried Samuel the Lawgiver; a cry of dismay, such as burst from their despairing hosts when the Ark was lost, has gone up from this vast nation. The storm-cloud, whose portentous shadow suddenly darkened all our borders with fear, has broken upon our heads. Our many-hearted prayer has not been heard. Even as the beseeching accents were upon our lips, the bolt fell—had fallen. The chosen head of his countrymen; the foremost citizen of all, where all are free; the hope, the trust, the very idol of millions; the hero, the patriot, the statesman, the venerable father, when as yet his foot had but touched the Capitoline height where authority welcomed him; when the acclamations, that hailed with thundering response his earnest promises of determined faith to his country’s welfare, had not died away among the far mountains of the confederacy; before his aged frame, borne down less by years than honors, had slept one calm sleep from the weariness of grateful joy; hath ceased from among us, for God hath taken him. The laurel and the civic wreath, that but a few days since mingled their foliage with the hoariness of his illustrious head, are lying yet green upon his bier. His lips, scarce cold from the fervor of classic eloquence,* and yet more recently hallowed, as we trust, with answered prayer, shall speak no more till the morning of the resurrection. His ear, that had thrilled with a nation’s praises, and, as we trust, in his parting moments, with the voice of holy preparation for a meeting with God; that was never before insensible to the voice of his country, hears not her moanings around his tomb. His kindly heart, that throbbled high with noble purposes, is still. “The shield of the mighty is vilely cast away,.....as though he had not been anointed with oil.” “All they that are about him bemoan him, and all they that know his name say, How is the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod!” “For, behold, the Lord, the Lord of Hosts hath taken” from us.....“the mighty man, and the man of war, the judge.....and the prudent, and the ancient, and the honorable man, and the counsellor.....and the eloquent orator.”

The calamity is ours, but for him (I speak of this life, leaving the decisions of eternity where they are veiled from mortal sight,) it is well. His death has been glorious. History hath scarce an equal instance. The most lofty station, the most noble office man can confer on man, was his; but one difficult as it is eminent, which none has ever yet borne,

* The preacher frankly confesses that he is not one of those who thought the classical references in which our late President so much delighted, ill-timed or out of taste. The better writers of our language have abounded in them, and it is a matter of regret that such allusions are not more frequent. There is a gracefulness about the incidents of Greek and Roman story as they have come down to us, which adorns, while their example instructs. The charge of pedantry is easily made by those who would conceal, by a sneer, their own ignorance of what every well-read man should know, and their inability to that which every student must feel. No man understands the present, who cannot compare it with the past.

and, until political parties among us learn a more honorable charity than any of them have manifested, I verily believe none ever can bear, without meeting harsh and unjust judgment from the prejudice of opponents. Indeed, we may say, such is the vastness of its care, the variety of interests to be watched over and adjusted, and the multitude of opinions to be met, no mortal could fill that magistracy without exciting the doubts and the censures of even honest, intelligent men. But now, when hope in him was at the highest; before envy had found a joint in his harness for a dart; or suspicion fixed one shadow on his course; or the horde of office-seeking sycophants, who crushed him between the door-posts of his new home by their indecent pressure, had turned in malignant disappointment to bark at the hand from which they sought bread, but that could not, would not feed them all; he has gone to his rest with all his honors fresh around him. He, at least, was not made to feel the sting of ingratitude and unmerited reproach, as every one of those honorable patriots who sat in that chair before him, aye, even Washington himself, felt it. The disturber of his memory must now seem guilty of strange sacrilege, as though he robbed a grave.

But my duty, to-day, is not eulogy. It is to entreat you, in the name of God, to profit by the lessons He teaches us in this act of his providence.

WHAT A SEVERE REBUKE DOES THIS SAD EVENT GIVE TO POLITICAL BIGOTRY AND RASH INVICTIVE AGAINST THE MOTIVES OF THOSE WHO DIFFER FROM US IN OPINION!

Standing, in our imagination, this morning beside the grave of our departed patriot, who, even of those that struggled most against his rise, can look down upon his sleeping dust, nor feel a pang of keen reproach, if ever he might have touched his honest heart, or cast an word that hath done his honor wrong, or breathed a hasty insult upon his time-honored name? And vile, yes, very vile is he, whose resentments the grave cannot still.

Whence this sacredness which death throws over the memory of character and life? Is it because the dead are defenceless, and return not an answer again? Is it because God hath come in between us and our fellow-creatures, and vindicated his right to be judge alone? Is it because, in the humiliations of the sepulchre, we see the frailty of that nature we share with the departed, our own aptness to err, and how liable we are to be misjudged? O my friends, why should we wait for death to teach us charity, when it is too late to practice it, and repentance hath become remorse? Why not remember that the living require our candor and forbearance? Nay, that we need their candor and forbearance? Why reserve all our gentleness of judgment for the dead, who are beyond the reach of our absolution? They were once as the living, and the living shall soon be as they. It is, indeed, enough to bring us back to a better trust in human nature, to witness such a spectacle of union in sorrow and honor for our departed chief among those, who, a little while since, were divided into earnest and opposing factions; but oh! would it not be far more ennobling, to see the living pledging themselves to the living over the fresh earth of his grave, that henceforth, though they may honestly differ in their doctrines and policy, they will yet believe in the uprightness of each other’s belief? How hateful does censorious bitterness and sneering suspicion look in the face of your opponent? Yet such is your deformity in his sight, when you revile his principles and rail against his friends. When, oh! when shall this rancor, this cruel persecution for opinion’s sake, this damning inquisition after false motives, this fratricidal rending of heart from heart, because our mental vision is not the same—this exiling of the honorable from the honorable, because they have not the same abilation in their Shibboleth—this waste of wealth, of mental power and untiring zeal, which our country and our whole country should enjoy—when shall it cease? Must it be perpetual? I know that the words of a poor preacher are weak against this strong and vast spreading evil; but as I love my country, and God knows I love her from my inmost heart, and never more than in this hour of her sorrow, I must speak. I cannot believe that I have a right to hate and despise my brother because he reads another book than my own, or that he should hate and despise me, because conviction forces me to cling to mine.

HOW STRIKING IS THIS PROOF OF OUR DEPENDENCE UPON GOD!

A vast number of our people were looking up to him, who is gone, as a saviour and deliverer from the pressure of heavy national distresses. Their confidence in his honest purpose to do all that untiring zeal could do to achieve such a result, was, I firmly believe, not misplaced. What would have been the efficiency of the means employed, it would be going beyond permitted limits for me to hazard an open conjecture. I fear, however, that the cause and cure of our troubles lie deeper than the ability of any administration, however able or patriotic, to reach. No government can save us, except we be true to ourselves in frugality, industry, and sterling morality. I speak not as a politician, but as a teacher of that Word which keeps the record—“In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread;” and, “he who hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him;” and yet again, “the borrower shall be servant to the lender.” But, certainly, there was large expectation and enthusiastic hope in the skill and faithfulness of him, for whose sudden and melancholy loss we wear these badges of mourning. Your own hearts will tell you, whether, with such expectations from the distinguished instrument, there was mingled sufficient trust in Him, who is Sovereign over all, and without whose blessing all the wit of man must fail. If there hath been an idolatry of the creature, God hath vindicated his own right to be our confidence and our stay. How in a moment, when we least thought of it, has he dashed many hopes in pieces! He gave his messenger the warrant, and a nation’s prayers and tears could not stay the determined blow. The work was as surely done beneath the proud roof of a nation’s love, as within the humble cabin on the far western border. We are in the hand of God, our lives, our fortunes, our rulers. We are in the hand of God. O let us cast ourselves humbly upon his promise, and seek his favor through Jesus Christ his Son, that the hand of God may be a Father’s hand that blesses while he chastens.

HOW SOLEMN IS THE WARNING FOR US ALL TO PREPARE TO MEET OUR GOD!

It has been idly said, that "Death loves a shining mark." He is indeed busy with the great, but not less busy with the obscure and mean. "The insatiate archer" has an arrow for each of us. "To the same complexion we must come at last." "The like event happeneth to us all." He hath occasions which are more remarkable, and rarely, indeed never in this land, hath he struck such terror by a single shaft until now. We looked not for his coming to that honored threshold, now everhung with the melancholy signs of his dark presence. The old soldier, it was fondly thought, had won new vigor from the people's blessing:

For yet his lusty age seemed fresh and green,
His hoary head nobly erect was seen,
Nor needed he on stronger staff to lean.*

But he is gone. Death's next message may be to me, to you. Are we ready? O, my hearer, let us not amuse ourselves with dreamy imaginings. The change is awful from time to eternity. It is as awful to meet the summons on our humble beds, as though we were canopied with purple; alone, as though surrounded by groups of pale friends. We know not when he may come, but when he doth meet us, it is to bring us suddenly before our God. While the Chief Magistrate lay in the agonies of death, with a nation weeping around him, how many, of whom the world knew little, were in the same dread article? As they passed the mysterious gate the inequalities of earth were left behind. One moment beyond this life, and it will avail us nothing whether we may have been rich or poor, honored or unknown. Our eternity shall be begun, an eternity of changeless blessedness, or of changeless woe. If we be lost, who can sufficiently deplore the amazing ruin? and as we look back on life, how poor shall the whole world appear to have been, compared to the undying anguish of the soul? If we be saved, who can estimate the weight of glory God shall bestow upon our immortal spirits? and as we look back on life, how light shall the utmost suffering here appear to have been, compared to eternal raptures before the face of God? Is it wise then to run such a desperate risk as this? Is it rational to pervert and abuse a very small part of our being, and so render all the future miserable? Ought we not rather to prepare ourselves for our tremendous trial, and prepare at once, that whether death come upon us at noon or evening, at midnight or at dawn, he find us watching?

HOW IMPORTANT, THEREFORE, THAT WE CHOOSE AND FOLLOW THE RELIGION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST!

With what interest was the inquiry made, whether our venerable President died a Christian? and that, not by Christians only, but men who are but too indifferent to their own religious safety! What horror would have been added to our present gloom, if indeed he had died and "left no sign" of trust in the cross? What unspeakable consolation to hear so many cheering testimonies, that he was prepared to take up his cross and follow Christ in the open walk of a Christian profession? Wherefore is this anxiety about his religious character, but because a hope on the promise of Christ was, after all that could be heaped upon him by admiring millions, the only treasure, dignity and delight, he could carry with him into the eternal world. Better the lisping child that loves Jesus, the very least in the kingdom of God, than the mightiest of the sons of men without such faith!

Come with me, my hearers, who are accustomed to enter carelessly the house of God and listen with easy indifference to the words of the preacher, as though they reached not the pride of your position, nor suited the range of your thoughts; let me take you with me to the death chamber of him we now mourn. Pale and worn, the hero, whom his country delighted to honor, lies upon his fevered bed. The statesmen whom he had called to assist him in the toils of government are watching around him with tearful eyes, but it is not upon their faces he looks with the most earnest interest. The cares they shared with him are past. Only one sentence more shall prove his love of country strong in death. But he looks for the meek countenance of the minister of God. His words are the accents the dying man wishes to hear, and he seeks to follow the simple prayer which is breathed by his side; the book which has just fallen from his failing hand, is the volume which tells of "Christ the Resurrection and the Life, in whom if a man believe, though he die, yet shall he live." That Word is the only lamp that gleams through the valley of the shadow of death, whose gloom is already upon him. Another moment—and the spirit hath past.

Tell me now, doth not the cross put to shame all honors else? Is there not a dignity in the hope of the Gospel above all other pride? a victory in its power above all the boasts of valor? There is no immortality beside. O then let that death scene preach to you and to us all, that, laying aside every meaner pursuit, we may seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

May the blessing of that kingdom sustain her widowed heart, whom a nation's sympathy can never compensate for the loss of a husband.

Even so grant, Lord Jesus. Amen.

Juv. Sat. III. 96, 7, 8.

TO MAKE NAMES GROW IN FRUIT.—When peaches and nectarines are about half ripe, cover the side exposed to the sun with strips or specks of wax, in any desired shape or form, which hinders the sun from coloring the parts covered; and, when the fruit is ripe, and the wax removed, it will be found marked in the manner desired.

DRUNK AND SOBER.—We saw a hog lying in the gutter the other day, and in the opposite one was a well-dressed man (?). The first had a ring in his nose—the latter a ring on his finger. The man was drunk—the hog was sober. "A hog is known by the company he keeps," thought we—so thought Mr. —, and off he went. Speaking of going off puts us in mind of a quia we once owned. It went off one night, and we have not seen it since.

EDUCATIONAL REQUIREMENTS

OF THE

HOMŒOPATHIC PHYSICIAN.

It is erroneously supposed by many intelligent persons in this country, that Homœopaths do not belong to the medical profession, or are not recognized as physicians by the laws of the land.

This mistake should be rectified. It has arisen in part, no doubt, from the ill offices of those of our profession of the old schools who, though associating with us in the medical colleges and societies, are willing to sacrifice truth at the shrine of prejudice. There are a few quacks who pretend to practice medicine in our mode, with precisely the same kind of falsehood as thousands of pretenders and mountebanks offer their services to the public as Allopathic physicians; but all those who are recognized at all as adherents of Homœopathy by Hahnemann and his disciples, are legally licensed as physicians, and after being thus admitted to the profession, have pursued the other and further researches which belong peculiarly to our school. The quack of either school should be equally rejected by both as a worthless impostor, whose disinclination to the humble toils, by which honest men of the ignorant classes acquire a subsistence, has led him to assume the insignia of a profession whose every avenue is overshadowed by the most sacred trusts and responsibilities. Devoid alike of conscience and of knowledge, the quack crawls with lying pretences to both, into the chambers of sorrow and death, a poor, blind, palsied spectator of sufferings which call for the sagacious masters of the sublime art of healing, in tones to which Christianity and civilization respond with holy solicitude.

Well and truly did the venerable Hufeland say, in his last great testament to the medical profession:

"Every sick man is a temple of nature."

The echo of footsteps which are lawful in the sacred precincts of that temple fills the bosom of the conscientious physician with painful emotion. His brow is corrugate with premature lines of a care which the world knows not. He expects to give an account of his work; he knows that his work is fraught with profound results. By what unhallowed license does the venal quack, the son of idleness and ignorance, usurp the place of the true priest at the altar of science and humanity!

The false pretender to homœopathic knowledge and skill is, in our estimation, by so much the more deserving of exposure and contempt, as our method is more difficult of acquirement and more beneficent in its proper administration than that of our Allopathic brethren. Not that we would be understood to palliate the inhuman offence of a mere pretender to their method in the slightest degree, but that we hold his offence to be more aggravated and injurious to society who lays false claim, not only to the important branches of our science, which both schools assiduously cultivate in common, (surgery and midwifery,) but also to the possession of the pharmacology and therapeutic philosophy which we have acquired, in addition to the researches of the old school.*

We shall now proceed to demonstrate the necessity of a higher grade of scientific and literary acquirements on the part of the Homœopathic practitioner, than is for practical purposes required of the Allopathist. It must be premised that we are now speaking exclusively of the art of healing diseases, irrespective of the appliances of surgery as a distinct art, i. e. of operative surgery.

It will scarcely be contradicted, that if Hippocrates could rise from the tomb with no other and no less skill than that which he possessed at the time of his death, more than two thousand years ago, he would be employed by our Allopathic brethren for themselves in preference to any living professor of the art. The same choice would probably hold good in favor of several of the great succeeding masters, as of Galen, Celsus or Avicenna; and perhaps also of a few of the more modern, as Sydenham, Frederick Hoffmann and Stahl.

Yet these all flourished before descriptive anatomy was at all perfected, before morbid anatomy was cultivated, before botany was a science; long before chemistry was known as an exact science, or even as a reputable art—and when physiology was enveloped in more than utopian mysticism.

The preference of these masters to any of our own times, would, we believe, be most fully justified by the results, if it were not embarrassed by the few cases in which mere blind chance has thrown specific (Homœopathic) remedies into the common stock, as bark in intermittents, mercury in syphilis, &c.

How then can it be said that pathology, as taught in the schools, is progressive, or how prove, that the pathology of the Allopathists makes real application of these important modern discoveries to the cure of diseases?

The truth is, that the Allopathist makes a most ingenious resumé of these sciences in his pathology, but it is a vain and fruitless process; he cannot cure the sick one whit the better for being a better anatomist, chemist, botanist or physiologist, than his colleague who knows but little and practices none of these sciences. He may write exactly, talk learnedly, be indeed a luminary in the company of savans, while his humbler neighbor who never reads a book of any science, dissects either plant or animal, or knows a chemist's retort from a musical instrument, may nevertheless far outstrip him in the fearful combat with actual disease. If this be true, if indeed we have stopped within the acknowledged limits of every day's experience, if it be true that the practical man of the least exact knowledge be the safest or luckiest physician, what respect is due to the manner in which the school make use of anatomy, physiology, botany and chemistry, to construct a science of curing the sick? The common practitioner only begins to be eminently successful, when he begins to retire from the science of Allopathia; to forget the pathology of the schools, to forget the sharp lines of anatomy, and when the day dreams of philosophies of living processes, have melted into undistinguishable oblivion in his memory.

* We beg it to be understood most distinctly, that the members of our school in this city are all of them members of the Medical Society of this country; and that to become so they necessarily have pursued a proper course of studies, sustained an examination for the doctor's diploma of license, and have placed such document on record in the County Clerk's office. An infamous pretender is the single exception in New York, and his imposture has been properly exposed in one of our most respectable newspapers.

Then, when the transcendental stils of the theorists are awkward to him, he takes to plain walking in the paths of experience; and, though he still theorize some to form a kind of mnemonic net work for his empiricism, he makes his hypotheses the servants of his experience, however they may contradict each other, and so gains in real skill as he advances in years. Not so with the scientific Allopathist. Like Brown, Rassori, Broussais, he follows his theory, a blind leader of the blind; wise and studious, and profoundly ambitious—his career is only limited by ill results, by the thick coming deaths which hang around it, and never stayed till he falls by his own weapons of relief!

Our case is, certainly, clearly, demonstrably the reverse of this disheartening picture. We must make real, correct, living and unceasing application of anatomy and physiology, of botany and chemistry; we may not forget them or any part of them, without treason toward our patients, our school and our consciences. 1. ANATOMY, for example, is indispensable to the Homœopathist: not the far off, half forgotten lessons of the college hall of dissections, but the anatomy which distinguishes the tissues, which awakens us to the distinctions between the ganglionic and the cerebral nerves, which keeps us aware of the discrete processes of life in the human system, which sharpens our attention to the natural groups of primary sympathies, and of their more and more extended relations till we are able to conceive somewhat of the whole living phenomenal complex.

This sharp, descriptive and philosophic anatomy, such as Morgagni began and Bichat left us, is indispensable to us, because without such science we cannot detect as readily and perfectly as we ought the analogy between the drug diseases and the natural diseases—the similarity between symptoms, whether singly considered or taken in primary, binary and ternary groups; and upon the right detection of such analogies or similarities, the success of a science of healing depends.

Anatomy and physiology aid us materially in establishing in our minds the true diagnosis; that is, in finding whether the locality of the principal sufferings of the two diseases, the artificial and the natural, be identical. This is a conditio sine qua non to the safe, easy and durable cure of the natural disease: and it is so much the better when the secondary or consensual sufferings also correspond as to locality as well as all other conditions.

We do not make use of anatomy to aid us in the vain art of conjecturing the nature of disease, to inflate our pride of pathologic invention; for between anatomy, as an exact art, and these visionary pursuits, there can never be the slightest affinity; exact science and gratuitous hypothesis cannot be interwoven, no more than alchemy and chemistry, or the practice of signatures and the true mode of discovering the virtues of drugs can be made to coalesce.

It is, we think, most unjustly commented on Hahnemann's Organon, by nearly all Allopathic writers on the subject, and by some of the uneasy neologists of his own school, (such as Rau and Griesselich,) that the important moment of locality is disregarded or grossly underrated. All that can possibly elucidate the semeiology of disease belongs most naturally, and we may say par excellence, to Hahnemann's method. It follows as a corollary to the first maxim of his therapeutics, that descriptive anatomy and morbid anatomy, used legitimately, are of the utmost interest and importance in determining the existence of an apt and real similarity between the effects of drugs and the phenomena of disease; for though the sufferings in two given cases be similar in all other respects, yet they are materially dissimilar if their interior locality can be known to be unlike; the absence of this moment destroys the analogy essential to a favorable result.

The force of Hahnemann's argument on this, bears against the erroneous purpose which these researches are made to subserve by our Allopathic brethren—the attempt to detect the inscrutable essence of diseased vital action, to disclose for objective annihilation the causa proxima morbis. He cannot, with fairness, be understood to oppose the gathering of any sign, circumstance, or condition which our senses, aided in every proper way, may help us to recognize, because these belong to and form a part of the totality of the phenomena, upon which we found our plan of cure, and from which we make the choice of remedies.

Anatomy, therefore, is to be thoroughly studied and constantly cultivated, by the practical Homœopathist, as indispensable to success.

2. Botany, likewise, is an indispensable part of his education. Vegetable dissections are as important to him, in many instances, as the animal. Many of our remedies are derived from plants in a particular stage of their development, and their juices must be expressed immediately after they are taken from mother earth.

The ability to discriminate with certainty the plant, we may seek from any and every other in the universe, (an ability which this beautiful science confers,) is often of the utmost importance to a fellow being in his darkest moment of peril; and in such case it is not conscientious or safe to depend on the ordinary apothecaries, even if they profess to have the very preparation we require; nor is it always prudent to rely on remedies sent to us from distant lands by those of our own school. We should be able to go to the fields, the woods, or the morasses, and lay our own hand upon the specific means which the beneficent and unerring Creator has planted for these hours of need, and stamped with the infinite signet of living truth.

Cases of this kind have occurred to us and to some of our colleagues in New-York. We have thus gathered and successfully applied the VERATRUM, APOCYNUM, RHEU, DROSER, CONIUM, STRAMONIUM and THUJA.

No physician is entitled to the confidence of the sick as a Homœopathist who is not a tolerable proficient in the science of botany. By it he is not only furnished for single emergencies of the kind we have stated, but he can always replace many of his remedies afield and of undoubted purity, if a sudden and devastating epidemic should overtake the community in which he resides. By it he is always able to remove the painful doubt as to truthfulness of a large portion of his drugs, or as to the accuracy and purity of their preparations.

The Allopathist, on the contrary, has no such needs of botanic knowledge. Of the vegetable drugs he gives enormous doses, chiefly with a view to their being expelled immediately, by vomiting or purging, or profuse sweating; and it makes but little difference whether any single one be active or inert, since if it fail entirely, it is just as well to supply its place with salts or calomel, or some compound of various drugs possessing the desired quality.

The Allopathist, therefore, has no such pressing need of this science. He does not prescribe with reference to the universal forces of drugs, but with reference to their power to excite vomiting, purging, or sweating, or to the allaying of pain by one or two properties only. It therefore is of quite minor importance to him whether, in a given case requiring either of these effects, say purging for example, a drug be recent, pure and efficient in all respects, or the contrary, as some one of the many purgatives it is his custom to give with it, is very likely to produce the required effect; and if the whole compound fail entirely, it can very readily be followed by some other purgative compound. Accordingly, botany forms no part of the ordinary courses of instruction in the colleges of physic at the present day; and no candidate for license is rejected for any lack of botanical knowledge, however great; which certainly would not be the case if the Allopathists were in any event obliged to make indispensable use of such knowledge. Whatever an Allopathist, while he is a student, may learn of botany for its own sake as a delightful science, finding no practical need of it in his subsequent career, he invariably suffers it slowly to pass away from him for ever. The practical botanists of our country are not practitioners of physic in any respect but the name.

The respectable Shaker herbalist, of New Lebanon Springs, monopolizes at present all practical botany for the medical profession of this empire State.

3. Languages. All really educated physicians are able to read medical essays in the Latin tongue, and have at least some little acquaintance with the Greek. In our medical schools this knowledge is not required as it is in most of the European schools (though by all means it should be made an indispensable pre-requisite by law.) But in addition to the Latin and Greek, the student of Homœopathia must understand the German and French languages, and particularly the German, very perfectly.

The first and most important records of our school—the effects of drugs on the healthy human body—were made in German, and the testimony is much of it of such a character as effectually to preclude the possibility of ample and perfect translation. A Homœopathist cannot prescribe with the accuracy which a good conscience requires unless he is able to imbue his mind most perfectly with the meaning of every expression adopted by those by whom the drugs in each case were originally tested under Hahnemann's instructions. The sufferings and sensations described by these individuals constitute the essential basis of pure materia medica, and consequently of the Homœopathic art of choosing medicines for the sick. Translations cannot convey the whole truth; and all extant truth, must be known by every conscientious follower of Hahnemann, in every case, before he will presume to prescribe the course to be pursued.

Translations can only at the very best confer a second hand and seriously defective impression of pharmacodynamics, and therefore they make at best but a second-rate and seriously defective Homœopathist.

Inasmuch as at the present day, considerable contributions to the archives of our art are being made in Paris, Geneva, Lyons, Montpellier, and in several places elsewhere in Europe, by French physicians, and those of other countries who use the French language with ease and accuracy, it is of almost equal importance to the Homœopathist to be a perfect master of the French as well as the German. Indeed no man should be trusted as a Homœopathist who is not known to be thoroughly versed in these languages of the school.

Having thus hastily sketched a few of the outlines of the requirements of our school, and glanced at the reasons why in it the most scientific is the most successful physician, (the reverse of which is the rule in the old school at the present day,) it remains that we explain why mere laymen do occasionally succeed in effecting real and durable cures of serious maladies by the use of our method. This would seem to be an argumentum fortiori against us of a similar quality to that used by us in this paper respecting the unscientific practitioners of the old mode; but proper examination of the two cases will clearly show that the analogy is only apparent—by no means positive and real. The practitioner of the old mode is successful in proportion as he forgets or disregards the essential of his school—the reasoning a priori, respecting proximate causes, and relies upon mere clinical memory—in proportion as he ceases to be scientific (as that school must term it,) and becomes purely empirical.

Whereas the practitioner of the new mode must be useful to the sick in proportion as he becomes better acquainted with anatomy descriptive and morbid, with physiology, with botany, and with the records of the effects and results of drugs and remedies contained in the German and French languages.

The unscientific man may, it is very true, now and then luckily find a well defined case, one in which the symptoms are so plainly covered by the records of a drug as not to admit of mistake; and thus perform a cure which will fill the patient with surprise and gratitude. But he is not a whit the more competent or more apt to succeed as a physician, than is the maker of gunpowder competent and apt as a chemist. The quack cannot discriminate where discrimination is at all necessary. Take, for example, a case in which twenty-five symptoms are present. If a drug be found, the effect of which cover all these symptoms in all respects perfectly, it will necessarily be chosen by the quack as certainly as by the physician; but if, as frequently happens in cases of great peril, several drugs be found to cover a majority only of the symptoms, and no one of them covers the whole case, the quack is utterly at a loss, and is just as likely to administer those drugs in the list which have no real relation to the case, and cannot possibly do good, as he would be to apply those which the physician would know to be remedies, and promptly select and apply them as such for reasons which the quack could by no means appreciate.

In truth, the quack must in a great majority of his cases be wholly at fault, and at least as frequently apply drugs which fail to cure, and therefore prove injurious as he applies the actual remedies, and that too, when the latter are plainly and clearly indicated by the records and rules of practice.

In one case the practitioner is guided by a general memory as to the effects of vomiting, purging, bleeding, blistering, &c., in cases he has seen, which have some few points of resemblance; whilst in the other, reliance can only be placed upon the specific powers of drugs independent of all evocations of the important fluids, and therefore generalities cannot be trusted.

Books and sciences are forgotten with impunity by Allopathists in much of their practice, whereas in no case can we dispense with either.

It is well known that even Hahnemann, after more than half a century spent in learning the specific materia medica, does not attempt to prescribe for any new case without faithfully consulting his own records and those of all his school afresh.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

After a national commotion, commensurate with the magnitude of the boon that was sought for, the great BILL FOR GIVING EVERY BODY EVERYTHING had passed into a law, and the people were frantic with joy. Its first fruits were of a sort that satisfied the public expectation; viz. three or four earls were turned into marquises, and two or three marquises into dukes, and deservedly; for these great men had far higher titles to the gratitude and admiration of the country, in exacting this second Magna Charta from King John—than the stern old barons in extorting the first from King John—namely, they parted with vast substantial political power, for only a nominal quid pro quo, in the shape of a bit of ribbon or a strawberry leaf. Its next immediate effect was to cleanse the Augean stable of the House of Commons, by opening upon it the floodgates of popular will and popular opinion; and having utterly expelled the herd of ignorant and mercenary wretches that had so long occupied and defiled it, their places were to be supplied by a band of patriots and statesmen, as gifted as disinterested—the people's own enlightened, unbiased, and deliberate choice. Once put the government of the country—the administration of affairs—into hands such as these, and the inevitable result would be, the immediate regeneration of society, and the securing the greatest happiness to the greatest number. It was fearfully apparent that, under the old system, we had sunk into irredeemable contempt abroad, and were on the very verge of ruin and anarchy at home. So true is it, that when the things come to the worst, they begin to mend. In short, the enlightened and enlarged constituencies began forthwith to look out for fit objects of their choice—for the best men; men of independent fortune; of deep stake in the welfare of the country; of spotless private and consistent public character; who, having had adequate leisure, opportunity, inclination, and capacity, had fitted themselves to undertake, with advantage to the country, the grave responsibilities of statesmen and legislators. Such candidates, therefore, as Mr. Titmouse became naturally in universal request; and the consequence was, such a prodigious flight of Titmice into the House of Commons—but whither am I wandering? I have to do with only one little borough—that of Yatton, in Yorkshire. The great charter operated upon it, by extending its boundary—Griston, and one or two of the adjacent places, being incorporated into the new borough. I have ascertained from a very high quarter—in fact, from a deceased Cabinet Minister—a curious and important fact; that had Mr. Titmouse failed in recovering the Yatton property, or been of different political opinions, in either of these cases, the little borough of Yatton was doomed to utter extinction: a circumstance which shows the signal vigilance, the accurate and comprehensive knowledge of local interests and capabilities evinced by these great and good men who were remodeling the representation of the country. And little did my hero suspect that his political opinions, as newly-installed owner of Yatton, formed a topic of anxious discussion at more than one Cabinet meeting, previous to the passing of the Great Bill! As its boundary was extended, so the constituency of Yatton was enlarged, the invaluable elective franchise being given to those most in need of the advantages it could immediately procure; and the fleeting nature of whose interest, naturally enhanced their desire to consult the interests of those who had a permanent and deep stake in its welfare. Though, therefore, the change effected by the new act had so considerably added to the roll of electors, it had not given ground for serious apprehension as to the security of the seat of the owner of the Yatton property. After a very long and private interview between Gammon and Titmouse, in which something transpired which may be referred to hereafter, it was agreed that—(the New Writs having issued within one week after the calmed and sobered new constituencies had been organized—which again had been wisely effected within a week or two after the passing of the act)—Mr. Titmouse should instantly scare away all competition, by announcing his determination to start for the borough. As soon as this was known, a deputation from the new electors in Griston waited upon Mr. Titmouse—to propose the terms on which their support was to be obtained. Titmouse was somewhat startled—but Gammon saw in it the legitimate working of the new system; and—nothing was ever better managed—nobody in any mischievous secret—no one compromised; but the result was, that one hundred and nine plumpers were secured in Griston alone for Mr. Titmouse. Then Gammon appointed Messrs. Bloodsuck and Son the local agents of Titmouse; for whom he wrote an address to the electors—and, Titmouse promising to have it printed forthwith, Mr. Gammon returned to town for a day or two. Nothing could have been more skilful than the address which he had prepared—terse, and comprehensive, and showy, meaning every thing or nothing—(dolens semper versatur in generalibus, was an observation of Lord Coke's) on which Gammon kept his eye fixed in drawing up his "address." Yet it came to pass that on the evening of the day of Gammon's departure, a Mr. Phelim O'Doodle, a splendid billiard-player, and also one of the first members returned—only a few days before—for an Irish borough in the Liberal interest, chanced to take Yatton in his way to Scotland from London; and being intimate with Mr. Titmouse, from whom he had borrowed a little money a few months before, to enable him to present himself to his constituency—they sat down to canvass the merits of the Address which the astute but absent Gammon had prepared for Titmouse. They pronounced it "devilish dull and tame;" Mr. O'Doodle compared it to toddy, with the whiskey omitted: and availing himself of Gammon's draft as far as he approved of it, he drew up the following Address, which put Titmouse into an ecstasy; and he sent it off the very next morning for insertion in the Yorkshire Stingo. Here is an exact copy of that judicious and able performance:

"To the worthy and independent Electors of Yatton:

"GENTLEMEN: His Majesty having been pleased to dissolve the late Parliament, under very remarkable and exciting circumstances, and, in the midst of the transports of enthusiasm arising out of the passing of that second Great Charter of our Liberties, the Act for Giving Everybody Everything, to call upon you to exercise immediately the high and glorious privilege of choosing your representative in the New Parliament, I beg leave to announce myself as a candidate for that distinguished honor. Gentlemen, long before I succeeded in establishing my right to reside among you in my present capacity, I felt a deep interest in the welfare of the tenants of the property, and especially of those residing in the parts adjacent, and who are now so happily introduced into the constituency of this ancient and loyal borough. I trust that the circumstance of my ancestors having resided for ages within this borough, will not indispose you to a favorable reception of their descendant and representative. Gentlemen, my political opinions are those which led to the passing of the Great Measure I have alluded to, and which are bound up in it. Without going into details which are too multifarious for the limits of such an address as the present, let me assure you, that though firmly resolved to uphold the agricultural interests of this great country, I am equally anxious to sustain the commercial and manufacturing interests; and whenever they are in conflict with each other, I shall be found at my post, zealously supporting both, to the utmost of my ability. Though a sincere and firm member and friend of the Established Church, I am not insensible to the fearful abuses which at present prevail in it; and I am bent upon securing the utmost possible latitude to every species of Dissent. While I am resolved to uphold the interests of Protestantism, I think I best do so, by seeking to remove all restrictions from the Catholics, whom I am persuaded will sacredly abstain from endeavoring to promote their own interests at the expense of ours. Gentlemen, the established religion is most likely to flourish when surrounded by danger, and threatened by persecution; it has an inherent vitality which will defy, in the long run, all competition. Gentlemen, I am for Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform, which are in fact the Three Polar Stars of my political conduct. I am an advocate for quarterly Parliaments, convinced that we cannot too often be summoned to give an account of our stewardship,—and that the frequency of elections will occasion a wholesome agitation, and stimulus to trade. I am for extending the elective franchise to all, except those who are actually the inmates of a prison or a poor-house on the day of election. I am an uncompromising advocate of civil and religious liberty all over the globe; and, in short, of giving the greatest happiness to the greatest number. Gentlemen, before concluding, I wish to state explicitly, as the result of long and deep inquiry and reflection, that every constituency is entitled, nay bound, to exact from a candidate for its suffrages the most strict and minute pledges as to his future conduct in Parliament, in every matter, great or small, that can come before it; in order to prevent his judgment being influenced and warped by the dangerous sophistries and fallacies which are broached in Parliament, and his integrity from the base, sinister, and corrupt influences which are invariably brought to bear on public men. I am ready, therefore, to pledge myself to anything that may be required of me by any elector who may honor me with his support. Gentlemen, such are my political principles, and I humbly hope that they will prove to be those of the electors of this ancient and loyal borough, so as to warrant the legislature in having preserved it in existence, amidst the wholesale havoc which it has just made in property of this description. Though it is not probable that we shall be harassed by a contest, I shall make a point of waiting upon you all personally, and humbly answering all questions that may be put to me: and should I be returned, rely upon it, that I will never give you occasion to regret your display of so signal an evidence of your confidence in me. I have the honor to be, Gentlemen, your most obedient and humble servant,

"T. TITMOUSE.

"Yatton, 3d December, 18—."

"Upon my soul, if that do n't carry the election hollow," said O'Doodle, laying down his pen, and mixing himself a fresh tumbler of brandy and water, "you may call me bog-trotter to the end of my days, and be — to me!"

"Why—a—ya—as! 'pon my life it's quite a superior article," quoth Titmouse; "but—eh! d'y'e think they'll ever believe I writ it all? Egad, my fine fellow, to compose a piece of composition like that—and suppose those dear fellows begin asking me all sorts of thingemobs, eh? You could n't stay and go about with one a bit?"

"Faith, Titty, an' your mighty wide awake to the way of doing business, ah, ha! Murder and thieves! what does it signify what you choose to say or write to them? they're only pisintry; and—the real point to be looked at is this—all those that you can command, of course you will, or send 'em to the right about; and those that you can't—that's the new blackguards round about—buy, if it's necessary, faith!"

"It's —!—It is, 'pon my soul!" whispered Titmouse. "Oh? Is it in earnest you? Then you're M. P. for the borough; and on the strength of it I'll replenish!" and so he did, followed by Titmouse; and in a pretty state they, some hour or two afterward, were conducted to their apartments.

It is difficult to describe the rage of Gammon on seeing the address which had been substituted for that which he had prepared, with so much caution and tact; but the thing was done, and he was obliged to submit. The Address duly appeared in the Yorkshire Stingo, and was also placarded literally all over the borough, and distributed about, and excited a good deal of interest, and also much approbation, among the new electors. It was thought, however, that it was a piece of supererogation, inasmuch as there could be no possible doubt that Mr. Titmouse would walk over the course.

In this, however, it presently proved that the quidnuncs of Yatton were very greatly mistaken. A copy of the Yorkshire Stingo, containing the foregoing "Address," was sent, on the day of its publication, by Dr. Tatham to Mr. Aubrey, who had read it aloud, with feelings of mingled sorrow and contempt, on the evening of its arrival, in the presence of Mrs. Aubrey, Miss Aubrey, and, by no means an unfrequent visitor, Mr. Delamere. The Aubreys were sad enough; and he endeavored to dissipate the gloom that hung over them, by ridiculing, very bitterly and humorously, the pretensions of the would-be member for Yatton—the presumed writer (who, however, Kate protested, without giving her reasons, could never have been Mr. Titmouse,) of the precious "Address." He partially succeeded. Both Aubrey and he laughed heartily as they went more deliberately over it; but Kate and Mrs. Aubrey spoke very gravely and indignantly about that part of it which related to the Established Church and the Protestant religion.

"Oh dear, dear!" quoth Kate, at length, with a sudden burst of impetuosity, after a considerable and rather melancholy pause in the conversation; "only to think that such an odious little wretch is to represent the dear old—What would I not give to see him defeated?"

"Pho, Kate," replied her brother, rather sadly, "who is there to oppose him? Pickering told me, you know, that he should not go into the House again; and even if he felt disposed to contest Yatton, what chance could he have against Mr. Titmouse's influence?"

"Oh, I'm sure all the old tenants hate the little monkey, to a man."

"That may be, Kate, but they must vote for him, or be turned out of"—

"Oh, I've no patience, Charles, to hear of such things!" interrupted his sister, with not a little petulance in her manner.

"Do you mean to say, that you should like to see a rival start to contest your dear old borough with Mr. Titmouse?" inquired Mr. Delamere, who had been listening to the foregoing brief colloquy in silence, his eyes fixed with eager delight on the animated and beautiful countenance of Miss Aubrey.

"Indeed I should, Mr. Delamere," cried Kate, eagerly adding, however, with a sudden sigh, looking at her brother; "but—heigh-ho!—as Charles says, how absurd it is to fret one's self about it—about a thing we can't help—and—a place one's no more any concern with!" As she said this, her voice fell a little, and her eyes filled with tears. But her little sally had been attended with consequences she had little dreamed of. Mr. Delamere took leave of them shortly afterward, without communicating a word of any intentions he might have conceived upon the subject to any of them. But the first place he went to, in the morning, was a great banker's, who had been appointed the principal acting executor of the Marquis of Fallowfield, a very recently deceased uncle of Delamere's, whom his lordship had left a legacy of £5000; and 't was to get at this same legacy that was the object of Delamere's visit to Sir Omnium Bullion's. For some time the worthy baronet—who had not then even proved the will—would not listen to the entreaties of the eager young legatee: but the moment that he heard of the purpose for which it was wanted, Sir Omnium being a very fierce Tory, and who had lost his own snug borough by the Bill for Giving Everybody Everything, instantly relented. "There, my fine fellow, sign that," said Sir Omnium, tossing to him an "I. O. U. £5000," and drawing him a cheque for the amount: wishing him, with all imaginable zeal and energy, good speed. His eager excitement would not allow him to wait till the evening, for the mail; so, within a couple of hours' time of effecting this delightful arrangement with Sir Omnium, he was seated in a post-chaise and four, rattling at top-speed on his way to Yorkshire. SuffICIENTLY astonished were Lord and Lady de la Zouch, when he presented himself to them at Fotheringham. Infinitely more so, when he named the object of his coming down, and with irresistible entreaties sought his father's sanction for the enterprise. 'T was very hard for Lord de la Zouch to deny any thing to one on whom he doated as he did upon his son. Moreover, his lordship was one of the keenest politicians living; and as for elections, he was an old campaigner, and had stood several desperate contests, and spent immense sums upon them. And here was his son, to use a well-known phrase, indeed a chip of the old block; Lord de la Zouch, in short, really felt a secret pleasure in contemplating the resemblance to his early self—and after a little demur he began to give way. He shook his head, however, discouragingly; spoke of Delamere's youth—barely two-and-twenty; the certainty of defeat, and the annoyance of being beaten by such a creature as Titmouse; the suddenness and lateness of the move—and so forth.

More and more impetuous, however, became his son.

"I'll tell you what, sir," said Lord de la Zouch, "it strikes me that this extraordinary, and expensive, and hopeless scheme of yours, is all the result of—eh? I see—I understand. It's done to please—Pray, sir, how long, before you left town, had you seen Miss"—

"I pledge my word, sir, that neither Miss Aubrey, nor Mr. nor Mrs. Aubrey—whom, however, I certainly saw the very night before I started, and conversed with on the subject of Mr. Titmouse's address—has interchanged one syllable with me on the subject of my starting for the borough; and I believe them to be at this moment as ignorant of what I am about as you were the moment before you saw me here."

"It is enough," said his father, who knew that his son, equally with himself, had a rigorous regard for truth on all occasions, great and small.

"Well—I—I—certainly, we shall be laughed at for our pains; it's really a madcap sort of business, Geoffry; but"—Lord de la Zouch had given way—"I should not like to have been thwarted by my father on an occasion like the present: so, let it be done, as you've set your heart upon it. And," he added, with a smile, "pray, sir, have you considered what I shall have to pay for your sport?"

"Not one penny, sir!"

"Ay!" exclaimed his Lordship briskly—"How's that, sir?"

Then Delamere told him of what he had done; at which Lord de la Zouch first looked serious, and then burst into laughter at the eagerness of old Sir Omnium to aid the affair. "No, no," said his lordship, "that must not stand; I won't have any risk of Sir Omnium's getting into a scrape, and shall write off to request him to annul the transaction—with many thanks for what he has done—and I'll try whether I have credit enough with my bankers—eh, Geoffry?"

"You are very kind to me, sir, but really I would rather"—

"Pho, pho—let it be as I say; and now, go and dress for dinner, and, after that, the sooner you get about your 'Address' the better. Let me see a draft of it as soon as it is finished. Let Mr. Parkinson be sent for immediately from Griston, to see how the land lies; and, in short, if we do go into the thing, let us dash into it with spirit. And hark 'ee, sir—as to that address of yours, I'll have no despicable trimming, and trying to catch votes, by vague and flattering"—

"Trust me, sir! Mine shall be, at all events, a contrast to that of my—honorable opponent."

"Go straight ahead, sir; nail your colors to the mast. Speak out in a plain, manly way, so that no one can misunderstand you. I'd rather a thousand times over see you beaten out of the field—lose the election like a gentleman—than win it by any sort of trickery, especially as far as the profession of your political sentiments and opinions is concerned. Bear yourself so, Geoffry, in this your maiden struggle, that when it is over, you may be able to lay your hand on your heart, and say, 'I have won honorably.'—'I have lost honorably.' So long as you can feel and say this, laugh at election bills—at the long faces of your friends—the exulting faces of your enemies. Will you bear all this in mind, Geoffry?" added Lord de la Zouch.

"I will, I will, sir," replied his eager son; and added, with an excited air, "Won't it come on them like?"

"Do you hear that bell, sir?" said Lord de la Zouch, moving away. Delamere bowed, and with a brisk step, a flushed cheek, and an elated air, betook himself to his dressing-room, to prepare for dinner.

Shortly after dinner, Mr. Parkinson made his appearance, and, to his infinite amazement, was invested instantly with the character of agent for Mr. Delamere, as candidate for the borough! After he and the Earl had heard the following address read by Delamere, they very heartily approved of it. Mr. Parkinson took it home with him; it was in the printer's hands that very night, and by seven o'clock in the morning, was being stuck up plentifully on all the walls in Griston, and, in fact, all over the borough:—

"To the Independent Electors of the Borough of Yatton."

"Gentlemen,

"I hope you will not consider me presumptuous, in venturing to offer myself to your notice as a candidate for the honor of representing you in parliament. In point of years, I am, I acknowledge, even younger than the gentleman whom I have come forward to oppose. But, indeed, for the fact of his being personally a comparative stranger to you, I should have paused long before contesting with him the representation of a borough on which he has unquestionably certain legitimate claims. The moment, however, that I read his Address, I resolved to come forward and oppose him. Gentlemen, the chief, if not the only ground on which I come forward is, that I disapprove of the tone and spirit of that Address, and hold opinions entirely opposed to all those which it expresses, and which I consider to be unworthy of any one seeking so grave a trust as that of your member of Parliament. As for my own opinions, they are in all essential respects identical with those of the gentlemen who have, during a long series of years, represented you, and especially with those of my highly honored and gifted friend Mr. Aubrey. Gentlemen, my own family is not unknown to you, nor are the opinions and principles which for centuries they have consistently supported, and which are also mine.

"I am an affectionate and uncompromising friend of our glorious and venerable Established Church, and of its union with the State; which it is my inflexible determination to support by every means in my power, as the most essential mode of securing civil and religious liberty. I am disposed to resist any further concessions either to Roman Catholics or Dissenters, because I think that they cannot be made safely or advantageously. Gentlemen, there is a point at which toleration becomes anarchy; and I am desirous to keep as far from that point as possible.

"I earnestly deprecate putting our Agricultural or Commercial and Manufacturing interests into competition with each other, as needless and mischievous. Both are essential elements in the national welfare; both should be upheld to the utmost: but if circumstances should unhappily bring them into inevitable conflict, I avow myself heart and soul a friend to the Agricultural interest.

"Gentlemen, I know not whether it would be more derogatory to your character, or to mine, to exact or give pledges as to my conduct on any particular measure, great or small, which may come before Parliament. It appears to me both absurd and ignominious, and inconsistent with every true principle of representation. One, however, I willingly give you—that I will endeavor to do my duty, by consulting your interests as a part of the general interests of the nation. I trust that I shall never be found uncourteous or inaccessible; and I am confident that none of you will entertain unreasonable expectations concerning my power to serve you individually or collectively.

"Gentlemen, having entered into this contest, I pledge myself to fight it out to the last; and, if I fail, to retire with good humor. My friends and I will keep a vigilant eye on any attempts which may be made to resort to undue influence or coercion; which, however, I cannot suppose will be the case.

"Gentlemen, this is the best account I can give you, within the limits of such an Address as the present, of my political opinions, and of the motives which have induced me to come forward; and I shall within a day or two proceed to call upon you personally: and in the meanwhile I remain,

"Gentlemen,

"Your faithful servant,

"GEOFFRY LOVEL DELAMERE."

"Fotheringham Castle,

7th Dec. 18—"

Two or three days afterward, there arrived at Mr. Aubrey's, in Vivian Street, two large packets, franked "DE LA ZOUCH," and addressed to Mr. Aubrey, containing four copies of the foregoing "Address," accompanied by the following hurried note:—

"MY DEAR AUBREY,—What think you of this sudden and somewhat Quixotic enterprise of my son? I fear it is quite hopeless—but there was no resisting his importunities. I must say he is going into the affair, (which has already made a prodigious stir down here,) in a very fine spirit. His Address is good, is it not? The only thing that I regret is, his entering the lists with such a little miscreant as that fellow Titmouse—and, moreover, being beaten by him.—Yours ever faithfully and affectionately,

"DE LA ZOUCH."

"P. S.—You should only see little Dr. Tatham since he has heard of it. He spins about the village like a humming-top. I hope that, as far as his worldly interests are concerned, he is not acting imprudently. Our dear love to the ladies. (In great haste.)

"Fotheringham, 8th Dec. 18—"

This letter was read with almost suspended breath by Mr. Aubrey, and then by Mrs. and Miss Aubrey. With still greater emotion were the printed enclosures opened and read. Each was held in a trembling hand, and with color going and coming. Miss Aubrey's heart beat faster and faster; she turned very pale—but with a strong effort recovered herself. Then taking the candle, she withdrew with a hasty and excited air, taking her copy of the Address with her to her own room; and there burst into tears, and wept for some time. She felt her heart dissolving in tenderness toward Delamere: it was some time before she could summon resolution enough to return. When she did, Mrs. Aubrey made a faint effort to rally her; but each, on observing the traces of each other's recent and strong emotion, was silent, and with difficulty refrained from bursting again into tears.

Equally strong emotions, but of a very different description, were excited in the bosoms of certain persons at Yatton Hall, by the appearance of Mr. Delamere's Address. 'T was Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck, (Junior)—a middle-sized, square-set young man, of about thirty, with a broad face, a very flat nose, light frizzly hair, and deep-set grey eyes—a bustling, confident, hard-mouthed fellow,—who, happening to be stirring in the main street of Griston early in the morning of the 8th Dec. 18—, beheld a man in the act of sticking up Mr. Delamere's Address against a wall. Having prevailed on the man to part with one, Mr. Bloodsuck was within a quarter of an hour on horseback, galloping down to Yatton—almost imagining himself to be carrying with him a sort of hand-grenade, which might explode in his pocket as he went on. He was ushered into the breakfast room, where sat Mr. Gammon and Mr. Titmouse, just finishing breakfast.

"My stars—good-morning! gents,—but here's a kettle of fish!" quoth Mr. Bloodsuck, with an excited air, wiping the perspiration from his forehead; and then, plucking out of his pocket the damp and crumpled Address of Mr. Delamere, he handed it to Mr. Gammon, who changed color on seeing it, and read it over in silence. Mr. Titmouse looked at him with a disturbed air; and, having finished his mixture of tea and brandy, "Eh—eh—eh, Gammon!—I—say"—he stammered—"what's in the wind? Pon my soul, you look—eh?"

"Nothing but a piece of good fortune, for which you are indebted to your distinguished friend, Mr. Phelim O' Something," replied Gammon, bitterly, "whose Address has called forth an opponent whom you would not otherwise have had."

"Hang Mr. O'Doodle!" exclaimed Titmouse; "I, 'pon my precious soul, I always thought him a-a fool, and a knave. I'll make him pay me the money he owes me!" and he strode up and down the room, with his hands thrust furiously into his pockets.

"You had perhaps better read this Address," quoth Mr. Gammon, with a blighting smile, "as it slightly concerns you;" and handing it to Titmouse, the latter sat down to obey him.

"That cock won't fight, though, eh?" inquired Mr. Bloodsuck, as he resumed his seat, after helping himself to an enormous slice of cold beef at the side table.

"I think it will," replied Gammon, thoughtfully; and presently continued, after a pause, "it is useless to say any thing about the haughty, intolerant Toryism it displays; that is all fair; but is it not hard, Mr. Bloodsuck, that when I had written an Address which would have effectually"—

"Mr. Phelim O'Doodle owes me three hundred pounds, Gammon, and I hope you'll get it for me at once; 'pon my soul, he's a most cursed scamp," quoth Titmouse, furiously, looking up with an air of desperate chagrin, on hearing Gammon's last words. That gentleman, however, took no notice of him, and proceeded, addressing Mr. Bloodsuck—"I have weighed every word in that Address; it means mischief. It's evidently been well considered; it is calm and determined—and we shall have a desperate contest, or I am grievously mistaken."

"E—eh? E—h? What, Gammon?" inquired Titmouse, who, though his eye appeared to have been traveling over the all-important document which he held in his hand, had been listening with trembling anxiety to what was said by his companions.

"I say that we are to have a contested election for the borough; you won't walk over the course as you might have done. Here's a dangerous opponent started."

"What? 'Pon my soul—for my borough? For Yatton?"

"Yes, and one who will fight you tooth and nail."
 "Pon—my—precious soul! What a cursed scamp!
 What a most infernal black—Who is it?"

"No blackguard, sir," interrupted Gammon, very sternly; "but a gentleman every way equal to yourself," he added, with a cruel smile, "the Honorable Mr. Delamere, the son and heir of Lord de la Zouch."

"By jingo! you don't say so! Why, he's a hundred thousand a-year," interrupted Titmouse, turning very pale.

"Oh, that he has, at least," interposed Mr. Bloodsuck, who had nearly finished a tremendous breakfast; "and two such bitter Tories you never saw or heard of before—for like father like son."

"Egad! is it?" inquired Titmouse, completely crestfallen. "Well! and what if—eh, Gammon? Is it?"

"It is a very serious business," quoth Gammon.

"By Jove! isn't it a cursed piece of impudence! What? Come into my borough? He might as well come into my house! Isn't one as much mine as the other? It's as bad as housebreaking—but we're beforehand with him with those prime claps at Gr—" Mr. Bloodsuck's teeth chattered; he glanced toward the door; and Gammon gave Titmouse a look that almost paralyzed him.

"They'll bleed freely!" said Bloodsuck, with a desperate effort to look concerned—whereas he was in a secret ecstasy.

"Lord de la Zouch could not have entered into this thing if he had not some end in view which he considers attainable—and as for money—"

"Oh, as for that, ten thousand pounds to him is a mere drop in a bucket."

"O Lord! O Lord! and must I spend money too?" inquired Titmouse, with a look of ludicrous alarm.

"We must talk this matter over alone, Mr. Bloodsuck," said Gammon, anxiously—"shall we go to Grilston, or will you fetch your father hither?"

"Pon my soul, Gammon, those cursed Aubreys, you may depend on't, are at the bottom of all this!"

"That there's not the least doubt of," quoth Bloodsuck, as he buttoned up his coat with a matter-of-fact air; but the words of Titmouse caused Mr. Gammon suddenly to look first at one, and then at the other of them, with a keen, penetrating glance; and presently his expressive countenance showed that surprise had been succeeded by gloomy thoughtfulness.

There had not been a contested election at Yatton, till the present one between Mr. Delamere and Mr. Titmouse, for upwards of twenty-four years; its two members having been till then, owing to the smallness of the constituency, their comparative unanimity of political sentiment, and the dominant influence of the Yatton family, returned pretty nearly as a matter of course. When, therefore, quiet little Yatton (for such it was, albeit somewhat enlarged by the new act,) became the scene of so sudden and hot a contest as that which I am going to describe, and under such novel and exciting circumstances, it seemed, in a manner, quite beside itself. The walls were everywhere covered with staring, glaring placards—red, blue, green, yellow, white, purple—judiciously designed to stimulate the electors into a calm and intelligent exercise of their important functions. Here are a few of them:

"Vote for TITMOUSE the MAN of the PEOPLE!" "TITMOUSE and CIVIL and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY!" "TITMOUSE and PURITY of ELECTION!" "TITMOUSE and NEGRO EMANCIPATION!" "TITMOUSE and CHEAP ALE!" "Vote for TITMOUSE, and No MISTAKE!" "TITMOUSE and QUARTERLY PARLIAMENTS, VOTE BY BALLOT, and UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE!"

[Twas thus that the name of my little friend, like that of many others of his species, was attached to great public questions, after the manner of a kettle tied to a dog's tail; and a pretty clatter it made!]

But there were others of a more elaborate and impressive character.

"Electors of Yatton!! Be not deceived!!! The enemy is among you! Do you wish to reap the full fruits of the glorious boon lately conferred on you? Rush to the poll, and VOTE for TITMOUSE. Do you wish to see them torn from your grasp by a selfish and beastly aristocracy? Get a pair of handcuffs, and go and vote for—MR. DELAMERE!!!!"

"Quere. If a certain Boroughmongering Peer should command his son to vote for the REPEAL of the Great Bill which enfranchised the inhabitants of Grilston, Succombe, and Warleigh—would not that son obey him? How is this, Mr. DELAMERE!"

"Twas not, to give the devil his due, Mr. Titmouse's fault that his placards did not contain any vulgar and presumptuous personalities against his opponent; but it was entirely owing to Mr. Gammon's want of the requisite wit and spirit. He felt, in fact, that such a candidate as Mr. Delamere, afforded but few salient points of attack, in respect either of his person, his position in society, or his conduct. He, also, had his placards—"VOTE for DELAMERE!" "DELAMERE and INDEPENDENCE!" "VOTE for DELAMERE, the FARMER'S FRIEND!" "DELAMERE, and the CONSTITUTION in CHURCH and STATE."

Both the candidates established their head-quarters at Grilston; Mr. Delamere at the "Hare and Hounds" Inn, Mr. Titmouse at the "Woodlouse." Over the bay-window of the former streamed a noble blue banner, with an emblazonment of the Bible and Crown, and the words, "CHURCH, KING, and CONSTITUTION—OLD ENGLAND FOR EVER!" Over the latter hung an immense yellow banner, with three stars, so—

(being the "Three Polar Stars" spoken of in Mr. Titmouse's Address,) and the words—"PEACE! RETRENCHMENT!! REFORM!!!" in immense gilt letters. The walls and windows of each were, moreover, covered with varicolored placards—but I shall not weary the reader by attempting to describe in detail the humors of a country election, which have employed already thousands of able and graphic pens and pencils. Surely, what else are they than he sticks and straws that float along the eddying and roughened surface? The whole mass of water is moving along; and our object should be rather to discover its depths, its force, and direction. Principles are in conflict; the fate of the nation is involved in a popular election. Such matters as I have alluded to, are but the laughable devices resorted to, in order to delude the grinning vulgar, and disguise the movements of those calm and calculating persons who are playing the deep game of politics. Under cover of a ludicrous hubbub, might be observed, for instance, in this little borough—subject to certain petty local disturbing forces—a deadly struggle for ascendancy between the monarchical and the democratical principle; between rampant innovation and obstinate immobility; between the wealthy few and the poor many; between property and ability. If anything like this were the case, how many of the electors—new or old—of Yatton—(who may perhaps be compared to chessmen in the hands of long-headed players,—knew any more about the matter than a private soldier at Waterloo thought of, comprehended, or appreciated, the complicated and mighty schemes of a Wellington or Napoleon, whose bidding he was doing, or of the prodigious consequences attached to the success or failure of either? Some people talk vehemently about the "paramount necessity for educating the lower classes." It is, indeed, of incalculable importance that they should be instructed; but is it not of still greater importance that the UPPER CLASSES should be instructed, if only on account of their being the holders of that PROPERTY, in greater or less proportions, with its inseparable power and influence, which, directly or indirectly, determines all the movements of the state! Could such a state of things as universal suffrage be supposed to exist, consistently with the preservation of social order—of society—it would still be impossible to extirpate or effectually to counteract the influence of property, in whose hands soever it may be placed. Pluck out of the vilest of the bellowing bullies surrounding the hustings, him (of course a non-electors) most conspicuous for his insolence and brutality; suppose him suddenly or gradually become the owner of a great, or a small property, with the influence it gives him over customers, tenants, dependents; do you suppose that he will not at once, either gently or roughly, according to his temper, begin to exercise his power, (that which is so dear to the heart of man,) by dictating the exercise of the elective franchise in favor of those political opinions which he may happen to favor? Is not this the man to instruct, and the better in proportion to the extent of his real influence? Except in those brief and horrid intervals of social convulsion, in which δικα και παρὰ νόμον στραταί—however popularized and extended may apparently be the system of electing parliamentary representatives, those who really return members to Parliament will—whether themselves actually electors or not, and whether directly or indirectly—be the holders of property, in villages, in towns, in cities, in boroughs and counties. The influence of property is inevitable as that of gravitation: and losing sight of this, people may split their heads in vain, and chatter till the arrival of the Greek kalends, about extending further and further the elective franchise, shortening Parliaments, and voting by ballot. Whether it ought to be so, signifies little, when we know that it is, and will be so;—but now it is time to return to the Yatton election; and if I be but this once forgiven, I will not diverge again in a hurry from the main course of events. Lord de la Zouch, who resided some eight or ten miles from Yatton, soon discovered, as also did sundry other very able and experienced electioneering friends, taking an interest in his son's success, that the movements of the enemy were directed by a strong and skilful hand; and which never could be that of Mr. Titmouse. However slight and faint may be the hopes of success with which a man enters into an interesting and important undertaking, they soon begin to increase and brighten with eager action; and it was so with Lord de la Zouch.

He was not long in tracing the powerful, but cautiously concealed agency, of our friend Mr. Gammon. One or two such dangerous and artful snares were detected by the watchful and practised eyes of his lordship and his friends, just in time to prevent Delamere from being seriously compromised, as satisfied them that good Mr. Parkinson, with all his bustle, energy and heartiness, was dreadfully over-matched by his astute opponent, Mr. Gammon; and that in the hands of Mr. Parkinson, the contest would become, as far as Delamere was concerned, a painful and ridiculous farce. A council of war, therefore, was called at Fotheringham Castle; the result of which was an express being sent off to London, to bring down immediately a first-rate electioneering agent—MR. CRAFTY—and place in his hands the entire management of Mr. Delamere's cause. Mr. Crafty was between forty and forty-five years old. His figure, of middle height, was very spare. He was always dressed in a plain suit of black, with white neck-kchief, and no collars; yet no one that knew the world, could mistake him for a dissenting minister! He was very calm and phlegmatic in his manner and movements: there was not a particle of passion or feeling in his composition. He was a mere thinking machine, in exquisite order. He was of marvellous few words. His face was thin and angular. His chin and temples formed an isosceles triangle; his chin being very peaked, his forehead very broad. His hair was dark, and cut almost as close as that of a foot-soldier—and this it was that helped to give his countenance that expression at once quaint and unaffected, which, once observed, was not likely to be soon forgotten. His eye was blue, and intensely cold and bright—his complexion fresh; he had no whiskers; there was a touch of sarcasm about the corners of his mouth. Everything about him bespoke a man cold, cautious, acute, matter-of-fact. "Business" was written all over his face. He had devoted himself to electioneering tactics; and he might be said to have reduced them, indeed, to a science. No one could say whether he was of Whig or Tory politics; my impression is, that he cared not a straw for either. This is the man who was to be pitted against Gammon: and these two gentlemen may be perhaps looked upon as the players, whose backers were—Delamere and Titmouse.

Mr. Crafty soon made his appearance at Yatton; and seemed, in a manner, to have dropped into Mr. Delamere's committee-room from the clouds. His presence did not appear quite unexpected; yet no one seemed to know why, whence, or at whose instance he had come. He never went near Fotheringham, nor even mentioned the name of its noble owner, who (between ourselves,) contemplated the success of Crafty with feelings of calm exultation and confidence. Mr. Delamere's "committee" was instantly disbanded, and no new one named. In fact, there was to be none at all: and Mr. Titmouse's friends where, for a while, led to believe that the enemy were already beginning to beat a retreat. A quiet banker at Grilston, and a hard-headed land-surveyor and agent of the same place, were alone apparently taken into Mr. Crafty's confidence. Mr. Parkinson, even, was sent to the right about; and his rising pique and anger were suddenly quelled by the steadfast and significant look with which Mr. Crafty observed, in dismissing him—"It won't do." Adjoining, and opening into the large room in which, till Mr. Crafty's arrival, Mr. Delamere's committee had sat, was a very small one; and in it Mr. Crafty established his head quarters. He came, accompanied—though no one for a while knew it—by three of his familiars; right trusty persons, in sooth. One of them always sat on a chair, at the outside of the door leading into Mr. Crafty's room, over which he kept guard as a sentinel. The other two disposed themselves according to orders. Mr. Gammon soon felt the presence of his secret and formidable opponent, in the total change—the quiet system—that became all of a sudden apparent in the enemy's tactics: his watchful eye and quick perception detected, here and there, the faint vanishing traces of a sly and stealthy foot—the evidences of experienced skill; and one morning early he caught a glimpse of Mr. Crafty, (with whose name and fame he was familiar,) and returned home with a grave consciousness that the contest had become one exceedingly serious: that—so to speak—he must instantly spread out every stitch of canvas. In short, he made up his mind for mischief, as soon as he gave Lord de la Zouch credit for being resolved to win; and felt the necessity for acting with equal caution and decision. During that day he obtained an advance from a neighboring banker of two thousand pounds, on the security of a deposit of a portion of the title deeds of the Yatton property. He had, indeed, occasion for great resources, personal as well as pecuniary; for instance—he had reason to believe that the enemy had already penetrated to his strong hold, the QUAINT CLUB at Grilston, (for that was the name of the club into which the one hundred and nine new voters of Grilston had formed themselves.) Though Gammon had agreed, after much negotiation, to buy them at the very liberal sum of ten pounds a-head, he had reason, shortly after the arrival of Mr. Crafty, to believe that they had been tampered with; for as he was, late one evening, moodily walking up to the hall, in the park, he overtook a man whose person he did not at first recognise in the darkness, but whose fearfully significant motions soon ensured him recognition. It was, in fact, the man who had hitherto treated with him on behalf of the Quaint Club; one Benjamin Bran, (commonly called Ben Bran), a squat, bow-legged baker of Grilston. He uttered not a word, nor did Mr. Gammon; but on being recognised, simply held up to Mr. Gammon his two outstretched hands, twice, with a significant and inquiring look. Gammon gazed at him for a moment with fury; and muttering—"to-morrow—here—same hour!" hurried on to the hall in a state of the utmost perplexity and alarm. The dilemma in which he felt himself, kept him awake half the night. When once you come to this sort of work, you are apt to give your opponent credit for deeper manoeuvring than you can at the time fully appreciate; and the fate of the battle may soon be rendered really doubtful. Then everything—inclusive of serious consequences, extending far beyond the mere result of the election—depends upon the skill, temper, and experience of the real and responsible directors of the election. Was Ben Bran's appearance a move on the part of Crafty? Had that gentleman brought him over and converted him into a spy? Was he now playing the traitor? Or was the purse of Titmouse to be bonâ fide measured against that of Lord de la Zouch? That would be dreadful! Gammon felt (to compare him for a moment to an animal with whom he had some kindred qualities,) much like a cat on a very high glass wall, afraid to stir in any direction, and yet unable to continue where he was; while the two candidates, attended by their sounding bands, and civil and smiling friends, were making their public demonstrations and canvassing the electors, as if thereby they exercised the slightest possible influence over one single elector on either side! As I have already intimated, the battle was being fought by two calm and crafty heads, in two snug and quiet little rooms in Grilston—one at the Hare and Hounds, the other at the Woodlouse Inn; of course, I mean Mr. Crafty and Mr. Gammon. The former, within a very few hours, saw that the issue of the struggle lay with the Quaint Club; and from one of his trusty emissaries—a man whom no one ever saw in communication with him, who was a mere stranger in Grilston, indifferent as to the result of the election, but delighting in its frolics, who was peculiarly apt to get sooner drunk than any one he drank with—Mr. Crafty ascertained that though the enlightened members of the Quaint Club had certainly formed a predilection for the principles of Mr. Titmouse, yet they possessed a candor which disposed them to hear all that might be advanced in favor of the principles of his opponent.

Mr. Crafty's first step was to ascertain what had been already done or attempted on behalf of Mr. Delamere, and also of Mr. Titmouse; then the exact number of the voters, whom he carefully classified. He found that there were exactly four hundred who might be expected to poll; the new electors amounting in numbers to one hundred and sixty, the old ones to two hundred and forty, and principally scot-and-lot voters. In due time he ascertained, that of the former class only thirty-six could be relied upon for Mr. Delamere. The tenants of the Yatton property within the borough amounted to one hundred and fifteen. They had been canvassed by Mr. Delamere and his friends with great delicacy; and twenty-three of them had voluntarily pledged themselves to vote for him, and risk all consequences: intimating that they hated and despised their new landlord, as much as they had loved their old one, whose principles they understood to be those of Mr. Delamere. Then there remained a class of "accessibles," (to adopt the significant language of Mr. Crafty,) in number one hundred and twenty-five. These were persons principally resident in and near Yatton, subject undoubtedly to strong and direct influence on the part of Mr. Titmouse, but still not absolutely at his command. Of these no fewer than seventy had pledged themselves in favor of Mr. Delamere; and, in short, thus stood Mr. Crafty's calculations as to the probable force on both sides:

DELAMERE.		TITMOUSE.
New Voters.....	36	New Voters.....	109
Yatton tenants.....	23	Quaint Club.....	109
Accessibles.....	70	Others.....	21
			130
		129 Tenants.....	92
		Accessibles.....	35

Now, of the class of accessibles, twenty remained yet unpledged, and open to conviction; and, moreover, both parties had good ground for believing that they would all be convinced one way—i. e. toward either Mr. Titmouse or Mr. Delamere. Now, if the Quaint Club could be in any way detached from Mr. Titmouse, it would leave him with a majority of seventeen only over Mr. Delamere; and then, if by any means the twenty accessibles could be secured for Mr. Delamere, he would be placed in a majority of three over his opponent. Whichever way they went, however, it was plain that the Quaint Club held the election in their own hands, and intended to keep it so. Gammon's calculations differed but slightly from those of Crafty; and thenceforth both directed their best energies toward the same point, the Quaint Club—going on all the while with undiminished vigor and assiduity with their canvass, as the best mode of diverting attention from their important movements, and satisfying the public that the only weapons with which the fight was to be won were—bows, smiles, civil speeches, placards, squibs, banners, and bands of music. Mr. Crafty had received a splendid sum for his services from Lord de la Zouch; but on receiving the first distinct and peremptory intimation from his lordship, through Mr. Delamere, that there was to be, bonâ fide, no bribery—and that the only funds placed at his disposal were those sufficient for the legitimate expenses of the election—he smiled rather bitterly, and sent off a secret express to Fotheringham, to ascertain for what his services had been engaged—for what was the use of going to Waterloo without powder? The answer he received was laconic enough, and verbatim as follows:

"No intimidation; no treating; no bribery; manœuvre as skilfully as you can; and watch the enemy night and day, so that the close of the poll may not be the close of the election, nor the victor there the sitting member."

To the novel, arduous and cheerless duty, defined by this despatch from head-quarters, Mr. Crafty immediately addressed all his energies; and, after carefully reconnoitering his position, unpromising as it was, he did not despair of success. All his own voters had been gained, upon the whole, fairly. The thirty-six new voters had been undoubtedly under considerable influence, of an almost inevitable kind indeed—inasmuch as they consisted of persons principally employed in the way of business by Lord de la Zouch, and by many of his friends and neighbors, all of whom were of his lordship's way of political thinking. Every one of the twenty-three tenants had given a spontaneous and cordial promise; and the seventy "accessibles" had been gained, after a very earnest and persevering canvass, by Mr. Delamere, in company with others who had a pretty decisive and legitimate influence over them. The remaining twenty might, possibly, though not probably, be secured by equally unobjectionable means. That being the state of things with Delamere, how stood matters with Mr. Titmouse? First and foremost, the Quaint Club had been bought at ten pounds a-head, by Gammon—that was all certain. Crafty would also have bought them like a flock of sheep, had he been allowed, and would have managed matters most effectually and secretly; yet not more so than he found Mr. Gammon had succeeded in doing: at all events, as far as he himself personally was concerned. In fact, he had foiled Mr. Crafty, when that gentleman looked about in search of legal evidence of what had been done. Still, however, he did not despair of being able to perform a series of manoeuvres which should secure one of the ends he most wished, in respect even of the Quaint Club. With equal good intentions, but actuated by a zeal that was not according to knowledge, some of Mr. Gammon's coadjutors had not imitated his circumspection. Quite unknown to him, one or two of them had most fearfully committed him, themselves, and Mr. Titmouse; giving him such accounts of their doings as should serve only to secure his applause for their tact and success. Before Mr. Crafty they stood detected as blundering novices in the art of electioneering. A small tinker and brazier at Warkleigh had received, with a wink, ten pounds from a member of Mr. Titmouse's committee, in payment of an old outstanding account. Heaven save the mark!—delivered in by him three years before, for mending pots, kettles, and saucepans, in the time of—the Aubreys! The wife of a tailor at Grilston received the same sum for a fine tom-cat, which was a natural curiosity, since it could wink each eye separately. A third worthy and independent voter was reminded that he had lent the applicant for his vote ten pounds several years before, and which that gentleman now took shame to himself, as he paid the amount, for having so long allowed it to remain unpaid. Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck, with superior astuteness, gave three pounds a-piece to three little boys, sons of a voter, whose workshop overlooked Messrs. Bloodsuck's back offices, on condition that they would desist from their trick of standing and putting their thumbs to their noses at him, as he sat in his office, and which had really become an insupportable nuisance. Here was, therefore, a valuable consideration for the payment, and bribery was out of the question. Such are samples of the ingenious devices which had been resorted to, in order to secure some thirty or forty votes! In short, Mr. Crafty caught them tripping in at least eleven clear, unquestionable cases of bribery, each supported by unimpeachable evidence, and each sufficing to void the election, to disqualify Mr. Titmouse from sitting in that Parliament for Yatton, and to subject both him and his agents to a ruinous amount of penalties. Then again, there were clear indications either of a disposition to set at defiance the stringent provisions of the law against treating, or of an ignorance of their existence. And as for freedom of election, scarcely ten of his tenants gave him a willing vote, or otherwise than upon compulsion, and after threats of raised rents or expulsion from farms. Tied as were Mr. Crafty's hands, the Quaint Club became a perfect eyesore to him. He found means, however, to open a secret and confidential communication with them, and resolved to hold out to them dazzling but indistinct hopes of pecuniary advantage from the regions of Fotheringham. His emissary soon got hold of the redoubtable Ben Bran, who, truth to say, had long been on the look out for indications of the desired sort from the other side. As Bran was late one evening walking slowly alone along the high-road leading to York, he was accosted by a genteel-looking person, who spoke in a low tone, and whom Bran now recollected to have seen, or spoken to, before. "Can you tell me where lies the gold mine?" said the stranger; "at Fotheringham or Yatton?"—and the speaker looked round, apprehensive of being overheard. Ben pricked up his ears, and soon got into conversation with the mysterious stranger; in the course of which the latter threw out, in a very significant manner, that "a certain peer could never be supposed to send a certain near relative into the field, in order that that relative might be beaten, * * * and especially for want of a few pounds; and besides, my friend, when only * * *—the other side."

"Why, who are you? Where do you come from?" inquired Ben, with a violent start.

"Dropped out of the—moon," was the quiet and smiling answer.

"Then I must say they know a precious deal," replied Ben, after a pause, "up there, of what's going on down here."

"To be sure—every thing; every thing!" * * * Here the stranger told Ben the precise sum which the club had received from Mr. Gammon.

"Are we both—gentlemen?" inquired the stranger, earnestly.

"Y—e—e—s, I hope so, sir," replied Ben, hesitatingly.

"And men of business—men of our word?"

"Honor among thieves—ay, ay," answered Ben, in a still lower tone, and very eagerly.

"Then let you and me meet alone, this time to-morrow, at Darkling Edge; and by that time, do you see, turn this over in your mind," here the stranger twice held up both his hands, with outstretched thumbs and fingers. "Sure we understand each other!" added the stranger. Ben nodded, and they were presently out of sight of each other. The stranger gentleman pulled off his green spectacles, and also a pair of grey whiskers, and put both of them into his pocket. If any one attempted to dog him, he must have been led a pretty round! "I was in consequence of this interview that Ben made the application to Gammon, which had so disturbed him, and which has been already described. And to return to our friend: what was he to do? On returning to the Hall, he opened a secret drawer in his desk, and took out a thin slip of paper which he had deposited there that morning, it having been then received by him from town, marked "Private and Confidential," and franked, "Blossom and Box." 'Twas but a line, and written in a bold hand, but in evident haste; for it had in fact been penned by Lord Blossom and Box while he was sitting in the Court of Chancery, apparently listening to an abstruse argument, to which he had prepared the judgment which he was within a day or two's time to deliver. This is a copy of it:

"The election must be won. You will hear from E— by this post. Don't address any note to me. "B. and B."

With this great man, Lord Chancellor Blossom and Box, when plain Mr. Quicksilver, Mr. Gammon had had a pretty familiar acquaintance, as the reader may easily suppose; and had a natural desire to acquit himself creditably in the eyes of so distinguished and powerful a personage. Gammon had volunteered an assurance to his lordship, shortly before leaving town, that the election was safe, and in his, Gammon's hands; guess, then, his chagrin and fury at finding the systematic and determined opposition which had suddenly sprung up against him; and the intensity of his desire to defeat it. And the more anxious he was on this score, the more vividly he perceived the necessity of acting with a caution which should ensure real, ultimate success, instead of a mere noisy and temporary triumph, which should be afterward converted into most galling, disgraceful, and public defeat. The more that Gammon reflected on the sudden but determined manner in which Lord de la Zouch had entered into the contest, the more confident he became that his lordship had an important ultimate object to secure; and that he had at command immense means of every description, Gammon but too well knew, in common with all the world. Was, for instance, Mr. Crafty brought down, at an enormous expense, for nothing? What the device were the Quaint Club about? Was ever any thing so monstrous heard of—ten pounds a man received—the bargain finally struck—and now their original demand suddenly and peremptorily doubled? Venal miscreants? Was the other side really outbidding him, or laying a deep plan for entrapping him into an act of wholesale bribery? In short, were the Quaint Club now actuated by avarice, or by treachery?—Again and again did he go over his list of promises; having marked the favorable, hostile, neutral, doubtful, from a table as accurately compiled and classified as that of Mr. Crafty. Like his wily and practised opponent, also, Gammon entrusted his principal movements to scarce a soul of those who were engaged with him; fearing, indeed, though them, with no definite grounds, that Messrs. Mudflint, Woodlouse, Centipede, Bloodsuck, and Going Gone, were already too deep in the secrets of the election. According to his calculations, supporting all his promises to stand, Titmouse was, independently of the Quaint Club, and some eighteen or twenty others whom he had set down as "to be had"—only twenty-five a-head of Delamere; thus making a difference of eight only between his calculation and that of Crafty. Of course, therefore, that cursed Quaint Club had it all their own way; and how to jockey them, was a problem that well nigh split his head. He gave Lord de la Zouch credit for doing all that he—Gammon—could do to win the election; and believed him, therefore, capable of buying over any number of the club, to turn king's evidence against their original benefactor. The Bloodsucks assured him that the club were all good men and true—staunch—game to the backbone; but Gammon had obtained information as to the political sentiments of several of the members, before they had acquired the new franchise, and become banded into so sudden and formidable a confederacy, which led him to speculate rather apprehensively on the effects which might follow any bold and skilful scheme which might be resorted to by his enemies. Now, as far as the club were concerned, its members were all quiet, respectable men, who made the affair a dry matter of business. They justly looked on each of the candidates as equally worthy of the honor they coveted of representing the borough, and considered that they would always go on right at head quarters—i. e. that the country would be properly governed—without the least reference to the quality or complexion of the House of Commons. They saw the desperate and unceasing fight going on among their betters for the loaves and fishes; and imitated their example, with reference to the crumbs and fragments. First they divided themselves, as near as their number would admit of, into tens, giving one to the odd nine, equally with each body of ten, and thus produced a body of eleven representatives. These eleven, again, in the presence of the whole club, chose five of their number for the purpose of conducting the negotiations between the club and the two candidates; and these five again selected one of themselves—Ben Bran—to be the actual medium of communication: the actual state of the market never went beyond the first body of eleven; and in the exercise of an exquisite dexterity, Mr. Crafty had contrived to inspire these eleven, through their deputy and mouthpiece, Bran, with a determination to exact fifteen pounds per head mere from Titmouse, before recording their votes in his favor: and this untoward state of things was duly intimated to Gammon by Ben Bran, by silently outstretching both hands and then one hand. That would make a total of two thousand seven hundred and twenty-five pounds disbursed among that accursed Quaint Club alone!—thought Gammon, with a shudder: and suppose they should even then turn tail upon him, seduced by the splendid temptations of Lord de la Zouch? Just to conceive the possibility, for one moment, of Mr. Benjamin Bran having been bought over to betray all his companions, and Gammon and his party also, into the hands of Lord de la Zouch? Saith the immortal author of Hudibras—

"Ah me, the perils that environ,
The man that meddles with cold iron!"

But I shall make an exclamation of my own—

"What pen his troubles shall describe,
Who voters once begins to bribe!"

"Oh!" thought Mr. Gammon, a thousand times, "that cursed Quaint Club!—That cursed Crafty!"

The very first person on whom Delamere waited, in order to solicit his support, was little Dr. Tatham, who, I need hardly say, gave it promptly and cordially; but he added, shaking his head, that he knew he was giving huge offence to the people at the Hall, who had already been several times very urgent, indeed, with him. "Well, rather, sir, than sow dissension between you and Mr. Titmouse, your neighbor," said Delamere, spiritedly, "I at once release you from your promise."

"Ah! indeed?" cried Dr. Tatham, briskly—"Do you? Can you? Ought you to do so? I look upon the exercise of my franchise to be a sacred duty, and I shall discharge it as readily and as conscientiously as any other duty, come what may." Delamere looked at him, and thought how often he had heard Miss Aubrey talk of him with affectionate enthusiasm, and he believed the little doctor to be every way worthy of it. "For myself," continued Dr. Tatham, "I care little; but I have reason greatly to apprehend the effects of his displeasure upon those who are disposed—as such I know there are—to go counter to his wishes. He'll make them rue the day!"

"Ay!—Let him!" exclaimed Mr. Delamere, with an eye of bright defiance; but it kindled only a faint, momentary spark of consolation in the breast of Dr. Tatham.

The rivals, Mr. Delamere and Mr. Titmouse, encountered one another, as it were in full state, on the second day of the former's canvass. 'Twas in the street. Mr. Delamere was attended by Mr. Parkinson, Sir Percival Pickering, Mr. St. Aubyn, Mr. Alyward Elvet, Mr. Gold, and one or two others. Mr. Delamere looked certainly very handsome. About his person, countenance, and carriage, there was an air of manly frankness, refinement, and simplicity; and a glance at his aristocratic cast of features, told you that a certain latent tendency to hauteur was kept in check by sincere good-nature. He was tall and well-proportioned, and his motions had a natural ease and grace; and as for his dress, it combined a rigid simplicity with an undoubted fashion and elegance. Though the air was very cold and frosty, he wore only a plain, dark-colored surtout buttoned.

"Delamere! Delamere!" whispered with a smile Mr. St. Aubyn, (one of the former members for the borough,) on first catching sight of the enemy approaching them on the same side of the street, at about twenty yards' distance—"Here comes your opponent; he's a beauty, eh?"

Mr. Titmouse walked first, dressed in a fine drab-colored great-coat, with velvet collar of the same hue, and sable near a foot deep at his wrist. It was buttoned tightly round a pinched-in waist, and a white cambric handkerchief peeped out of a pocket in the breast. He had a red and green plaid waistcoat, and a full satin stock, glistening with little pins and chains. His trousers were sky-blue, and very tight, and covered almost the whole of his boot; so that it was a wonder to the vulgar how he ever got into or out of them. The little that was seen of his boots shone wonderfully; and he wore spurs at his heels. His span-new glossy hat was perched a laant on his bushy hair; he wore lemon-colored kid gloves, and a delicate little ebony cane. Following this pretty little figure were—the sallow, insolent-looking "Reverend" Smirk Mudflint, (such was the title he assumed,) Mr. Centipede, Mr. Grogam, Mr. Bloodsuck, junior, (who had approached as near, in point of personal appearance, to his illustrious client, as he knew how,) and—Mr. Gammon. As the hostile companies neared each other, that of Delamere observed some one hastily whisper to Titmouse, who instantly stuck his chased gold eyeglass into his eye, and stared very vulgarly at Mr. Delamere—who, on passing him, with the courtesy he conceived due to an opponent, took off his hat, and bowed with politeness and grace, his example being followed by all his party. Titmouse, however, took not the least notice of the compliment; but, without removing his glass from his eye, throwing an odious sneer into his face, stared steadily at Mr. Delamere, and so passed on. Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck ably seconded him. Mudflint, with a bitter smirk, touched his hat slightly; Centipede affected to look another way; Grogam blushed, and bowed as to his very best customer. Mr. Gammon came last; and bursting with disgust at the reception given to Mr. Delamere, colored all over as he took off his hat, and with an expression of very anxious and pointed politeness, endeavored to satisfy Mr. Delamere and his party, that there was at all events one in the train of Titmouse, who had some pretensions to the character of a gentleman.

"Who can that last man be? He's a gentleman," inquired Sir Percival, with an air of much surprise.

"Mr. Gammon—a man who is lord paramount at the Hall," replied one.

"Gammon!—Is that Mr. —" echoed Delamere, with much interest; and as he turned round to look at Gammon, observed that Gammon was doing the same; on which both hastily turned away.

As the important day approached, each party professed complete confidence as to the result. The Yorkshire Sting declared that it had authority for stating that Mr. Titmouse's majority would be at least three to one over Mr. Delamere—and that, too, in glorious defiance of the most lavish bribery and corruption, the most tyrannical intimidation, that had ever disgraced the annals of electioneering. In fact, it was presumption in Mr. Delamere to attempt to foist himself upon a borough with which he had no connection, and done with a wanton and malicious determination to occasion expense and annoyance to Mr. Titmouse. The York True Blue, on the contrary, assured its readers that Mr. Delamere's prospects were of the brightest description—and though by perhaps a small majority, yet he was sure of his election. He had been everywhere hailed with the greatest enthusiasm. Many of even Mr. Titmouse's tenantry had nobly volunteered their support to Mr. Delamere; and at Grilston, so long regarded as the very focus and hot-bed of democracy, his success had surpassed the most sanguine expectations of his friends, and so forth. Then there was a sly and mischievous caution to the electors, not to be led away by the ingenious and eloquent sophistries which might be expected from Mr. Titmouse at the hustings, on the day of nomination!! All this might be very well for the papers, and probably produce its impression upon those who, at a distance, are in the habit of relying upon them. But as for the actors—the parties concerned—Mr. Delamere was repeatedly assured by Mr. Crafty that a decent minority was the very utmost that could be expected; while Titmouse and his friends, on the other hand, were in a very painful state of uncertainty as to the issue: only Gammon, however, and perhaps one or two others, being acquainted with the true source of uneasiness and difficulty; viz. the abominable rapacity of the Quaint Club.

At length dawned the day which was to determine how far Yatton was worthy or unworthy of the boon which had been conferred upon it by the glorious Bill for giving Everybody Everything—which was to witness the maiden contest between the two hopeful scions of the noble and ancient houses of Dreddlington and De la Zouch—on which it was to be ascertained whether Yatton was to be bought and sold, like any other article of merchandise, by a bitter old boroughmonger; or to signalize itself by its spirit and independence, in returning one who avowed, and would support, the noble principles which secured the passing of the Great Bill which has been so often alluded to. As for my hero, Mr. Titmouse, it gives me pain to have to record—making even all due allowance for the excitement occasioned by so exhilarating an occasion—that there were scarcely two hours in the day during which he could be considered as sober. He generally left his bed about 11 o'clock in the morning—about 2 o'clock reached his committee-room—there he called for a bottle or two of soda-water, with brandy; and, thus supported, set out on his canvass, and never refused an invitation to take a glass of good ale at the houses which he visited. About the real business of the election—about his own true position and prospects—Gammon never once deigned to consult or instruct him; but had confined himself to the preparation of a very short and simple speech, to be delivered by Titmouse, if possible, from the hustings, and which he had made Titmouse copy out many times, and promise that he would endeavor to learn off by heart. He might as well have attempted to walk up the outside of the Monument.

Merrily rung the bells of Grilston church, by order of the vicar, the Reverend Gideon Fleahpot, who was a stanch Titmouseite, and had long cast a sort of sheep's eye upon the living of Yatton; for he was nearly twenty years younger than its present possessor, Doctor Tatham. What a bustle was there in the town by eight o'clock in the morning! All business was to be suspended for the day. Great numbers from the places adjacent began to pour into the town about that hour. It was soon seen who was the popular candidate—he whose colors were yellow; for wherever you went, yellow cockades, rosettes, and button-ties for the men, and yellow ribands for the girls, yellow flags and yellow placards with "TITMOUSE FOR YATTON!" met the eye. Mr. Delamere's colors were a deep blue, but were worn, I am sorry to say, by only one in four or five of those who were stirring about; and who, moreover, however respectable, and in appearance superior to the adherents of Titmouse, yet wore no such look of confidence and cheerfulness as they. From the bay-window of the Hare and Hounds, Mr. Delamere's head-quarters, streamed an ample and very rich blue silk banner, on which was worked, in white silk, the figure of a Bible, Crown, and Sceptre, and the words "Delamere for Yatton." This would probably have secured some little favorable notice from his sullen and bitter opponents, had they known that it had been the workmanship of some fifteen of as sweet, beautiful girls as could have been picked out of the whole county of York; and, by the way, 'tis a singular and melancholy sign of the times, that beauty, innocence, and accomplishment, are in England to be found uniformly arrayed on the side of tyranny and corruption, against the people. Then Mr. Delamere's band was equal to three such as that of his opponent—playing with equal precision and power; and, what was more, they played very bold enlivening tunes as they paraded the town.

There was one feature of the early proceedings of the day, that was rather singular and significant: viz., that though all the members of the formidable Quaint Club were stirring about, not one of them wore the colors of either party, though (between ourselves,) each man had the colors of both parties in his pocket. They appeared studiously to abstain from a display of party feeling—though several of them could not resist a leering wink of the eye when the yellow band went clashing past them. They had, moreover, a band of their own, which went about the town, preceded by their own standard—a very broad sheet of sky-blue, stretched between two poles, supported by two men; and the droll device it bore, was—an enormous man's face, with an intense squint, and two hands, with the thumbs of each resting on the nose, and the fingers spread out toward the beholder. It produced—as it seemed designed to produce—shouts of laughter wherever it made its appearance. Every member of the Quaint Club wore a grave face, as if they were the only persons who appreciated the nature of the exalted functions which they were about to exercise. No one could tell which way they intended to vote, though all expected that they were to come in at the last, and place the yellows in a triumphant majority of a hundred, at least. Though it had been a matter of notoriety that they were Mr. Titmouse's men, before Mr. Delamere appeared in the field; yet, since then, they had suddenly exhibited a politic and persevering silence and reserve, even among their personal friends and acquaintance. The yellow band performed one feat which was greatly applauded by the yellow crowd which attended them, and evidenced the delicacy by which those who guided their movements were actuated: viz., they frequently passed and repassed Mr. Delamere's committee-room, playing that truly inspiring air, "The Rogue's March." Then the yellows dressed up a poor old donkey in Mr. Delamere's colors, which were plentifully attached to the animal's ears and tail, and paraded him, with great cheering, before the doors of the Hare and Hounds, and Mr. Delamere's principal friends and adherents. Nay—one of the more vivacious of the crowd threw a stone at a little corner window of the blue committee-room, through which it went smashing its way, till it hit upon the inkstand of calm Mr. Crafty, who sat alone in the little room, busy at work with pen, ink and paper. He looked up for a moment, called for a fresh inkstand, and presently resumed his pen, as if nothing had happened.

The hustings were erected upon a very convenient and commodious green, at the southern extremity of the town; and thither might be seen, first on its way, a little after eleven o'clock, the procession of the popular candidate—Mr. Titmouse. Here and there might be heard, as he passed, the startling sounds of mimic ordnance, fired by little boys from house-tops. As they passed the church, its bells rang their merriest peal; and, at a little distance further on, the little boys of Mr. Hic Hæc Hoc, each with a small rosette tied to his jacket, struck up a squeaking and enthusiastic "hurrah!" while from the upper windows, the young ladies (three in number,) of Mrs. Hic Hæc Hoc's "establishment" waved their little white pocket-handkerchiefs. Next on their way, they passed the "Reverend" Smirk Mudflint's chapel, which was in very unenviable and queer contiguity to an establishment of a very questionable character—in fact, adjoining it. Against the upper part of the chapel hung a device calculated to arrest, as it did arrest, universal attention and admiration—viz., an inverted copy of the New Testament; over it, the figure of a church turned upside down, with the point of its steeple resting on the word "Revelation;" and upon the aforesaid church stood proudly erect an exact representation of Mr. Smirk Mudflint's chapel, over which were the words, "FREEDOM OF OPINION! and TRUTH TRIUMPHANT!" But I do not know whether another device, worked by Miss Mudflint—a skinny, tallow-faced, and flinty-hearted young lady of five-and-twenty, was not still more striking and original; viz., a Tri-angle, and an Eye with rays, and the words—"TITMOUSE! Truth! Peace!" Three cheers for Mr. Mudflint were given here; and Mr. Mudflint bowed all round with an air of proud excitement—feeling, moreover, an intense desire to stop the procession and make a speech while opposite to his own little dunghill. First in the procession marched a big fellow, with one eye, bearing a flag, with a red cap on a pike, and the words, in large black characters,

"TITMOUSE OR DEATH!!!"

"LET TYRANTS TREMBLE!!!"

Then came the band; and next to them walked—TITMURBAT TITMOUSE, Esq., dressed exactly as he was when he encountered, in their canvass, the party of his opponent, as I have already described—only that he wore a yellow rosette, attached to a button-hole on the left side of his drab great-coat. His protuberant light-blue eyes danced with delight, and his face was flushed with excitement. His hat was off and on every moment, in acknowledgment of the universal salutations which greeted him, and which so occupied him that he even forgot to use his eyeglass. On his left hand walked, wrapped up in a plain, dark-hued great-coat, a somewhat different person—Mr. Gammon. The expression which his features wore was one of intense anxiety; and any tolerably close observer might have detected the mortification and disgust with which his eye occasionally glanced at, and was suddenly withdrawn from, the figure of the grinning idiot beside him. Who do you think, reader, walked on Mr. Titmouse's right-hand side? Sir Harkaway Rotgut Wildfire, Baronet, whose keen political feelings, added to a sincere desire to secure his daughter's becoming the mistress of Yatton, had obliterated all unkindly recollection of Mr. Titmouse's gross conduct on a former occasion, after having received, through the medium of Mr. Bloodsuck, senior, as a common friend, a satisfactory apology. Next walked Mr. Titmouse's mover and seconder, the "Reverend" Mr. Mudflint, and Going Gone, "Esquire." Then came Mr. Centipede and Mr. Woodlouse, Mr. Grogam and Mr. Ginblossom; Mr. Gargle Glistler, and Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck; and others of the leading friends of Mr. Titmouse, followed by some two hundred others, two and two. Thus passed along the main street of Grilston, in splendid array, what might too truly have been called the triumphal procession of the popular candidate; his progress being accompanied by the enlivening music of his band, the repeated acclamations of the excited and intelligent crowd, the waving of banners and flags below, and handkerchiefs and scarfs from the young ladies at the windows, and desperate strugglings from time to time, on the part of the crowd, to catch a glimpse of Mr. Titmouse. Mr. Gammon had the day before hired ten pounds' worth of mob—a device alone sufficient to have made Mr.

Titmouse the popular candidate, and it now told excellently; for the aforesaid ten pounds' worth disposed itself in truly admirable order, in front of the hustings—and, on Mr. Titmouse's making his appearance there, set up a sudden and enthusiastic shout, which rent the air, and was calculated to strike dismay into the heart of the enemy. Mr. Titmouse, on gaining the hustings, changed color visibly, and, coming in front, took off his glossy hat, and bowed repeatedly in all directions. Mr. Delamere's procession was of a vastly superior description, yet too palpably that of the unpopular candidate—every member of it, from first to last, having made up his mind to encounter incivility, and even insult, however really anxious to avoid the slightest occasion for it. The band was numerous, and played admirably. There was a profusion of gay and handsome flags and banners. Mr. Delamere walked next to the band, with a gallant bearing, a gay and cheerful smile, yet often darkened by anxiety as he perceived indubitable symptoms of a disposition to rough treatment on the part of the crowd. On his right hand side walked Mr. St. Aubyn; on his left, Sir Percival Pickering, the late member for the borough. Following them came Mr. Gold, the banker, and Mr. Milnthorpe, an extensive and highly-respectable flour-factor—these being Mr. Delamere's mover and seconder; and they were followed by at least three hundred others, two and two, all of substantial and respectable appearance, and most resolute air to boot. No amount of mob that day in Grilston would have ventured an attack, in passing, upon that stout-hearted body of yeomen. A great many white handkerchiefs were waved from the windows, as Delamere passed along—waved by the hands of hundreds of fair creatures, whose hearts throbbed with fond fears lest an unoffending gentleman should be maltreated by the mob. When Mr. Delamere approached a large bow-window, opposite to the town-hall, his heart began to beat quickly. There were four as beautiful and high-born young women as England could have produced—all gazing down upon him with eager and anxious looks. It was not they, however, who occasioned Mr. Delamere's emotion. He knew that in that room was Lady de la Zouch—his mother; and he grew silent and excited as he approached it. One of the loveliest of the four, as he stopped and with respectful bow looked up for an instant—Lady Althea Larymer—suddenly and quite unexpectedly stepped aside; and there stood revealed the figure of Lady de la Zouch. She would have waved her handkerchief, but that she required it to conceal her emotion. The lips of neither mother nor son moved; but their hearts uttered reciprocal benedictions—and Delamere passed on. As he neared the church, I regret to have it to put on record, but, at the bidding of the Reverend Gideon Fleahpot, the bells tolled as for a funeral!!

Could anything have been more lamentable and disgusting? If the sudden and unexpected sight of his mother had been calculated in any degree to subdue, for a moment, his feelings, what ensued within a minute or two afterward was sufficient to excite his sternest mood; for as soon as ever the head of his procession became visible to the crowd on the green, there arose a tremendous storm of yelling, hooting, hissing, and groaning; and when Mr. Delamere made his appearance in front of the hustings, you might have imagined that you were witnessing the reception given to some loathsome miscreant mounting the gallows to expiate with his life a dreadful crime. He advanced, nevertheless, with a smile of cheerful resolution and good humor, though he changed color a little; and, taking off his hat, bowed in all directions. Gracious heaven! what a contrast he presented to his popular rival, Mr. Titmouse, who stood grinning and winking to the wretches immediately underneath, evidently with a spiteful gratification at the treatment which his opponent was experiencing. Any one on the hustings or in the crowd had but to call out "Three cheers for Mr. Titmouse!" to be instantly obeyed; then "Three groans for the young boroughmonger!" were responded to with amazing vehemence and effect. Viewed from a distance sufficient to prevent your observing the furious faces of the dense mob, and hearing the opprobrious epithets which were levelled against the unpopular candidate, the scene appeared both interesting and exciting. On the outskirts of the crowd were to be seen a great number of carriages, both close and open, principally occupied by ladies—and I need hardly say who was the favorite in those quarters. Then the rival bands moved continually about, playing well-known national airs; while the banners and flags, blue and yellow, heightened the exhilarating and picturesque effect of the whole. The hustings were strong and commodious; Mr. Titmouse and his friends stood on the right, Mr. Delamere and his friends on the left side. He was dressed in a simple, dark blue surtout and plain black stock. He was tall, elegant, and easy in his person, appearance, and gestures; his countenance was prepossessing, and bespoke a little excitement, which did not, however, obscure its good nature. And beside him stood his mover and seconder, Mr. Gold and Mr. Milnthorpe; the two late members; and about twenty or thirty other gentlemen—the whole party forming such a strong contrast to their opponents, as must have challenged any one's observation in an instant. Titmouse stood in the centre, leaning (as he supposed,) gracefully against the front bar; on his right stood the burly, slovenly figure of Sir Harkaway Rotgut Wildfire, with his big, bloated, blotchy face: on Mr. Titmouse's left stood his proposer, the "Reverend" Mr. Smirk Mudflint. His lean, sallow face wore a very disagreeable and bitter expression, which was aggravated by a sinister cast of one of his eyes. He was dressed in black, with a white neck-kchief and no shirt collars. Next to him stood Going Gone, Esq., Mr. Titmouse's seconder, with a ruddy complexion, light hair, a droll eye, and an expression of coarseness, but by no means ill-natured energy. Gammon stood immediately behind Titmouse, into whose ear he whispered frequently and anxiously. There were also the Reverend Gideon Fleahpot, (though he evidently did not wish to make himself conspicuous,) Mr. Glistler, Mr. Grogam, Mr. Woodlouse, Mr. Centipede, Mr. Ginblossom, Mr. Hic Hæc Hoc, the Messrs. Bloodsuck, father and son. The business of the day having been opened with the ordinary formalities by the returning officer, he earnestly besought the assembled multitude to remember that they were Englishmen, and to give both parties fair play, allowing every one, who might address them from the hustings, to be heard without serious interruption. It had been arranged between the two committees that Mr. Titmouse should be the first proposed; and the moment, therefore, that the returning officer ceased speaking, the "Reverend" Mr. Mudflint took off his hat and prepared to address the 'electors'; but he had to wait for at least a minute in order that the applause with which he had been greeted might subside; during which little anxious interval, he could not help directing toward his opponents a look of bitter exultation. He spoke with the self-possession, fluency, and precision of a practised public speaker. If the day's proceedings were to take their tone from that of the opening speech, 't was a thousand pities that it fell to the lot of the "Reverend" Mr. Mudflint to deliver it.

BARNABY RUDGE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XIII.

If Joseph Willet, the denounced and proscribed of 'prentices, had happened to be at home when his father's courtly guest presented himself before the Maypole door—that is, if it had not perversely chanced to be one of the half-dozen days in the whole year on which he was at liberty to absent himself for as many hours without question or reproach—he would have contrived, by hook or crook, to dive to the very bottom of Mr. Chester's mystery, and to come at his purpose with as much certainty as though he had been his confidential adviser. In that fortunate case, the lovers would have had quick warning of the ills that threatened them, and the aid of various timely and wise suggestions to boot; for all Joe's readiness of thought and action, and all his sympathies and good wishes, were enlisted in favor of the young people, and were staunch in devotion to their cause. Whether this disposition arose out of his old prepossessions in favor of the young lady, whose history had surrounded her in his mind, almost from his cradle, with circumstances of unusual interest; or from his attachment toward the young gentleman, into whose confidence he had, through his shrewdness and alacrity, and the rendering of sundry important services as a spy and messenger, almost imperceptibly gilded; whether they had their origin in either of these sources, or in the habit natural to youth, or in the constant badgering and worrying of his venerable parent, or in any hidden little love affair of his own which gave him something of a fellow-feeling in the matter; it is needless to inquire—especially as Joe was out of the way, and had no opportunity on that particular occasion of testifying to his sentiments either on one side or the other.

It was, in fact, the twenty-fifth of March, which, as most people know to their cost, is, and has been time out of mind, one of those unpleasant epochs termed quarter-days. On this twenty-fifth of March, it was John Willet's pride annually to settle, in hard cash, his account with a certain vintner and distiller in the city of London; to give into whose hands a canvas bag containing its exact amount, and not a penny more or less, was the end and object of a journey for Joe, so surely as the year and day came round.

This journey was performed upon an old grey mare, concerning whom John had an indistinct set of ideas hovering about him, to the effect that she could win a plate or cup if she tried. She never had tried, and probably she never would now, being some fourteen or fifteen years of age, short in wind, long in body, and rather the worse for wear in respect of her mane and tail. Notwithstanding these slight defects, John perfectly gloried in the animal; and when she was brought round to the door by Hugh, actually retired into the bar, and there, in a secret grove of lemons, laughed with pride.

"There's a bit of horseflesh, Hugh!" said John, when he had recovered enough self-command to appear at the door again. "There's a comely creatur! There's high mett! There's bone!"

There was bone enough beyond all doubt; and so Hugh seemed to think, as he sat sideways in the saddle, lazily doubled up with his chin nearly touching his knees; and heedless of the dangling stirrups and loose bridle-rein, sauntered up and down on the little green before the door.

"Mind you take good care of her, sir," said John, appealing from this insensible person to his son and heir, who now appeared, fully equipped and ready. "Do n't you ride hard."

"I should be puzzled to do that, I think, father," Joe replied, casting a disconsolate look at the animal.

"None of your impudence, sir, if you please," retorted old John. "What would you ride, sir? A wild ass or zebra would be too tame for you, would n't he, eh sir? You'd like to ride a roaring lion, would n't you sir, eh sir? Hould your tongue, sir." When Mr. Willet, in his differences with his son, had exhausted all the questions that occurred to him, and Joe had said nothing at all in answer, he generally wound up by bidding him hold his tongue.

"And what does the boy mean," added Mr. Willet, after he had stared at him for a little time, in a species of stupefaction, "by cocking his hat, to such an extent! Are you a going to kill the wintner, sir?"

"No," said Joe, tartly; "I'm not. "Now your mind's at ease, father."

"With a military air, too!" said Mr. Willet, surveying him from top to toe; "with a swaggering, fire-eating, billing-water drinking sort of way with him! And what do you mean by pulling up the crocuses and snowdrops, eh sir?"

"It's only a little nosegay," said Joe, reddening. "There's no harm in that, I hope?"

"You're a boy of business, you are, sir!" said Mr. Willet, disdainfully, "to go supposing that wintners care for nosegays."

"I do n't suppose any thing of the kind," returned Joe. "Let them keep their red noses for bottles and tankards. These are going to Mr. Varden's house."

"And do you suppose he minds such things as crocuses?" demanded John.

"I do n't know, and to say the truth, I do n't care," said Joe. "Come, father, give me the money, and in the name of patience let me go."

"There it is, sir," replied John; and take care of it; and mind you don't make too much haste back, but give the mare a long rest.—Do you mind?"

"Ay, I mind," returned Joe. "She'll need it, Heaven knows."

"And don't you score up too much at the Black Lion," said John. "Mind that, too."

"Then why do n't you let me have some money of my own?" retorted Joe, sorrowfully; "why do n't you, father? What do you send me into London for, giving me only the right to call for my dinner at the Black Lion, which you're to pay for next time you go, as if I was not to be trusted with a few shillings? Why do you use me like this? It's not right of you. You can't expect me to be quiet under it."

"Let him have money!" cried John, in a drowsy reverie. "What does he call money—guineas? Has n't he got money? Over and above the tolls, has n't he one and sixpence?"

"One and sixpence!" repeated his son contemptuously.

"Yes, sir," returned John, "one and sixpence. When I was your age, I had never seen so much money, in a heap. A shilling of it is in case of accidents—the mare casting a shoe, or the like of that. The other sixpence is to spend in the diversions of London; and the diversion I recommend is going to the top of the Monument, and sitting there. There's no temptation there, sir—no drink—no young women—no bad characters of any sort—nothing but imagination. That's the way I enjoyed myself when I was your age, sir."

To this, Joe made no answer, but beckoning Hugh, leaped into the saddle and rode away; and a very stalwart, manly horseman he looked, deserving a better charger than it was his fortune to bestride. John stood staring after him, or rather after the grey mare, (for he had no eyes for her rider,) until man and beast had been out of sight some twenty minutes, when he began to think they were gone, and, slowly re-entering the house, fell into a gentle doze.

The unfortunate grey mare, who was the agony of Joe's life, floundered along at her own will and pleasure until the Maypole was no longer visible, and then, contracting her legs into what in a puppet would have been looked upon as a clumsy and awkward imitation of a canter, mended her pace all at once, and did it of her own accord. The acquaintance with her rider's usual mode of proceeding, which suggested this improvement in hers, impelled her likewise to turn up a bye-way, leading—not to London, but through lanes running parallel with the road they had come, and passing within a few hundred yards of the Maypole, which led finally to an inclosure surrounding a large, old, red-brick mansion—the same of which mention was made as the Warren in the first chapter of this history. Coming to a dead stop in a little copse thereabout, she suffered her rider to dismount with right good-will, and to tie her to the trunk of a tree.

"Stay there, old girl," said Joe, "and let us see whether there's any little commission for me to-day." So saying, he left her to browse upon such stunted grass and weeds as happened to grow within the length of her tether, and passing through a wicket gate, entered the grounds on foot.

The pathway, after a very few minutes' walking, brought him close to the house, toward which, and especially toward one particular window, he directed many covert glances. It was a dreary, silent building, with echoing courtyards, desolated turret-chambers, and whole suites of rooms shut up and mouldering to ruin.

The terrace-garden, dark with the shade of overhanging trees, had an air of melancholy that was quite oppressive. Great iron gates, disused for many years, and red with rust, drooping on their hinges and overgrown with long rank grass, seemed as though they tried to sink into the ground, and hide their fallen state among the friendly weeds. The fantastic monsters on the walls, green with age and damp, and covered here and there with moss, looked grim and desolate. There was a sombre aspect even on that part of the mansion which was inhabited and kept in good repair, that struck the beholder with a sense of sadness; of something forlorn and failing, whence cheerfulness was banished. It would have been difficult to imagine a bright fire blazing in the dull and darkened rooms, or to picture any gaiety of heart or revelry that the frowning walls shut in. It seemed a place where such things had been, but could be no more—the very ghost of a house, haunting the old spot in its old outward form—and that was all.

Much of this decayed and sombre look was attributable, no doubt, to the death of its former master, and the temper of its present occupant; but remembering the tale connected with the mansion, it seemed the very place for such a deed, and one that might have been its predestined theatre years upon years ago. Viewed with reference to this legend, the sheet of water where the steward's body had been found, appeared to wear a black and sullen character, such as no other pool might own; the bell upon the roof that had told the tale of murder to the midnight wind, became a very phantom whose voice would raise the listener's hair on end; and every leafless bough that nodded to another, had its stealthy whispering of the crime.

Joe paced up and down the path, sometimes stopping in affected contemplation of the building or the prospect, sometimes leaning against a tree with an assumed air of idleness and indifference, but always keeping an eye upon the window he had singled out at first. After some quarter of an hour's delay, a small white hand was waved to him for an instant from this casement, and the young man, with a respectful bow, departed; saying under his breath as he crossed his horse again, "No errand for me to-day!"

But the air of smartness, the cock of the hat to which John Willet had objected, and the spring nosegay, all betokened some little errand of his own, having a more interesting object than a vintner or even a locksmith. So, indeed, it turned out; for when he had settled with the vintner—whose place of business was down in some deep cellars hard by Thames-street, and who was as purple-faced an old gentleman as if he had all his life supported their arched roof on his head—when he had settled the account, and taken the receipt, and declined tasting more than three glasses of old sherry, to the unbounded astonishment of the purple-faced vintner, who, gimlet in hand, had projected an attack upon at least a score of dusty casks, and who stood transfixed, or morally gimletted as it were, to his own wall—when he had done all this, and disposed besides of a frugal dinner at the Black Lion in Whitechapel; spurning the Monument and John's advice, he turned his steps toward the locksmith's house, attracted by the eyes of blooming Dolly Varden.

Joe was by no means a sheepish fellow, but, for all that, when he got to the corner of the street in which the locksmith lived, he could by no means make up his mind to walk straight to the house. First, he resolved to stroll up another street for five minutes, then up another street for five minutes more, and so on until he had lost full half an hour, when he made a bold plunge, and found himself with a red face and a beating heart in the smoky workshop.

"Joe Willet, or his ghost!" said Varden, rising from the desk at which he was busy with his books, and looking at him under his spectacles. "Which is it? Joe in the flesh, eh? That's hearty. And how are all the Chigwell company, Joe?"

"Much as usual, sir—they and I agree as well as ever."

"Well, well!" said the locksmith. "We must be patient, Joe, and bear with old folks' foibles. How's the mare, Joe? Does she do the four miles an hour as easily as ever? Ha, ha, ha! Does she, Joe? Eh?—What have we there, Joe—a nosegay?"

"A very poor one, sir—I thought Miss Dolly—"

"No, no," said Gabriel, dropping his voice and shaking his head, "not Dolly. Give 'em to her mother, Joe. A great deal better give 'em to her mother. Would you mind giving 'em to Mrs. Varden, Joe?"

"Oh no, sir," Joe replied, and endeavoring, but not with the greatest possible success, to hide his disappointment. "I shall be very glad, I'm sure."

"That's right," said the locksmith, patting him on the back. "It don't matter who has 'em, Joe?"

"Not a bit, sir."—Dear heart, how the words stuck in his throat!

"Come in," said Gabriel. "I have just been called to tea. She's in the parlor."

"She," thought Joe. "Which of 'em, I wonder—Mrs. or Miss?" The locksmith settled the doubt as neatly as if it had been expressed aloud, by leading him to the door, and saying, "Martha, my dear, here's young Mr. Willet."

Now, Mrs. Varden, regarding the Maypole as a sort of human man-trap, or decoy for husbands; viewing its proprietor, and all who aided and abetted him, in the light of so many poachers among Christian men; and believing, moreover, that the publicans coupled with sinners in Holy Writ were veritable licensed victuallers; was far from being favorably disposed toward her visitor. Wherefore she was taken faint directly; and being duly presented with the crocuses and snowdrops, divined on further consideration that they were the occasion of the languor which had seized upon her spirits. "I'm afraid I could n't bear the room another minute," said the good lady, "if they remained here. Would you excuse my putting them out of window?"

Joe begged she would n't mention it on any account, and smiled feebly as he saw them deposited on the sill outside. If anybody could have known the pains he had taken to make up that despised and misused bunch of flowers!

"I feel it quite a relief to get rid of them, I assure you," said Mrs. Varden. "I'm better already." And indeed she did appear to have plucked up her spirits.

Joe expressed his gratitude to Providence for this favorable dispensation, and tried to look as if he did n't wonder where Dolly was.

"You're sad people at Chigwell, Mr. Joseph," said Mrs. V.

"I hope not, ma'am," returned Joe.

"You're the cruellest and most inconsiderate people in the world," said Mrs. Varden, bridling. "I wonder old Mr. Willet, having been a married man himself, does n't know better than to conduct himself as he does. His doing it for profit is no excuse. I would rather pay the money twenty times over, and have Varden come home like a respectable and sober tradesman. If there is one character," said Mrs. Varden, with great emphasis, "that offends and disgusts me more than another, it is a sot."

"Come, Martha, my dear," said the locksmith, cheerily, "let us have tea, and do n't let us talk about sots. There are none here, and Joe do n't want to hear about them, I dare say."

At this crisis, Miggs appeared with toast.

"I dare say he does not," said Mrs. Varden; "and I dare say you do not, Varden. It's a very unpleasant subject, I have no doubt, though I won't say it's personal"—Miggs coughed—"whatever I may be forced to think"—Miggs sneezed expressively. "You never will know, Varden, and nobody at young Mr. Willet's age—you'll excuse me, sir—can be expected to know, what a woman suffers when she is waiting under such circumstances. If you do n't believe me, as I know you do n't, here's Miggs, who is only too often a witness of it—ask her."

"Oh! she were very bad the other night, sir, indeed she were," said Miggs. "If you had n't the sweetness of an angel in you, mim, I do n't think you could bear it, I raly do n't."

"Miggs," said Mrs. Varden, "you're profane."

"Begging your pardon, mim," returned Miggs, with shrill rapidity, "such was not my intentions, and such I hope is not my character, though I am but a servant."

"Answering me, Miggs, and providing yourself," retorted her mistress, looking round with dignity, "is one and the same thing. How dare you speak of angels in connection with your sinful fellow-beings—mere"—said Mrs. Varden, glancing at herself in a neighboring mirror, and arranging the ribbon of her cap in a more becoming fashion—"mere worms and grovellers as we are!"

"I did not intend, mim, if you please, to give offence," said Miggs, confident in the strength of her compliment, and developing strongly in the throat as usual, "and I did not expect it would be took as such. I hope I know my own unworthiness, and that I hate and despise myself and all my fellow creatures as every practicable Christian should."

"You'll have the goodness, if you please," said Mrs. Varden, loftily, "to step up stairs and see if Dolly has finished dressing, and tell her that the chair that was ordered for her will be here in a minute, and that if she keeps it waiting, I shall send it away that instant. I'm sorry to see that you do n't take your tea, Varden, and that you do n't take yours, Mr. Joseph; though of course it would be foolish of me to expect that any thing that can be had at home, and in the company of females, would please you."

This pronoun was understood in the plural sense, and included both gentlemen, upon both of whom it was rather hard and undeserved, for Gabriel had applied himself to the meal with a very promising appetite, until it was spoiled by Mrs. Varden herself, and Joe had as great a liking for the female society of the locksmith's house—or for a part of it, at all events—as man could well entertain.

But he had no opportunity of saying any thing in his own defence, for at that moment Dolly herself appeared, and struck him quite dumb with her beauty. Never had Dolly looked so handsome as she did then, in all the glow and grace of youth, with all her charms increased a hundred fold by a most becoming dress, by a thousand little coquettish ways which nobody could assume with a better grace, and all the sparkling expectation of that accursed party. It is impossible to tell how Joe hated that party, wherever it was, and all the other people who were going to it, whoever they were.

And she hardly looked at him—no, hardly looked at him. And when the chair was seen through the open door coming blundering into the workshop, she actually clapped her hands and seemed glad to go. But Joe gave her his arm—there was some comfort in that—and handed her into it. To see her seat herself inside, with her laughing eyes brighter than diamonds, and her hand—surely she had the prettiest hand in the world—on the ledge of the open window, and her little finger provokingly and pertly tilted up, as if it wondered why Joe didn't squeeze or kiss it! To think how well one or two of the modest snowdrops would have become that delicate boddice, and how they were lying neglected outside the parlor window! To see how Miggs looked on, with a face expressive of knowing how all this loveliness was got up, and of being in the secret of every string, and pin, and hook, and eye, and of saying it ain't half as real as you think, and I could look quite as well myself if I took the pains! To hear that provoking precious little scream when the chair was hoisted on its poles, and to catch that transient but not-to-be-forgotten vision of the happy face within—what torments and aggravations, and yet what delights were these! The very chairmen seemed favored rivals as they bore her down the street.

There never was such an alteration in a small room in a small time as in that parlor when they went back to finish tea. So dark, so deserted, so perfectly disenchanted. It seemed such sheer nonsense to be sitting tamely there, when she was at a dance with more lovers than man could calculate fluttering about her—with the whole party doting on and adoring her, and wanting to marry her. Miggs was hovering about, too; and the fact of her existence, the mere circumstance of her having been born, appeared, after Dolly, such an unaccountable practical joke. It was impossible to talk. It could n't be done. He had nothing left for it but to stir his tea round, and round, and round, and ruminate on all the fascinations of the locksmith's lovely daughter.

Gabriel was dull too. It was a part of the certain uncertainty of Mrs. Varden's temper, that when they were in this condition, she should be gay and sprightly.

"I need have a cheerful disposition, I am sure," said the smiling housewife, "to preserve my spirits at all; and how I do it I can scarcely tell."

"Ah, mim," sighed Miggs, "begging your pardon for the interruption, there a'n't a many like you."

"Take away, Miggs," said Mrs. Varden, rising, "take away, pray. I know I'm a restraint here, and as I wish everybody to enjoy themselves as they best can, I feel I had better go."

"No, no, Martha," cried the locksmith. "Stop here. I'm sure we shall be very sorry to lose you, eh, Joe?" Joe started, and said, "Certainly."

"Thank you, Varden, my dear," returned his wife; "but I know your wishes better. Tobacco, and beer, or spirits, have much greater attractions than any I can boast of, and therefore I shall go and sit up stairs and look out of the window, my love. Good night, Mr. Joseph. I'm very glad to have seen you, and only wish I could have provided something more suitable to your taste. Remember me very kindly, if you please, to old Mr. Willet, and tell him that whenever he comes here I have a crow to pluck with him. Good night!"

Having uttered these words with great sweetness of manner, the good lady dropped a curtsy remarkable for its concension, and serenely withdrew.

And it was for this Joe had looked forward to the twenty-fifth of March for weeks and weeks, and had gathered the flowers with so much care, and had cocked his hat, and made himself so smart! This was the end of all his bold determination, resolved upon for the hundredth time, to speak out to Dolly, and tell her how he loved her! To see her for a minute—for but a minute—to find her going out to a party, and glad to go; to be looked upon as a common pipe-smoker, beer-bibber, spirit-guzzler, and tosspot! He bade farewell to his friend the locksmith, and hastened to take horse at the Black Lion, thinking as he turned toward home, as many another Joe has thought before and since, that there was an end to all his hopes—that the thing was impossible and never could be—that she did n't care for him—that he was wretched for life—and that the only congenial prospect left for him, was to go for a soldier or a sailor, and get some obliging enemy to knock his brains out as soon as possible.

CHAPTER XIV.

Joe Willet rode leisurely along in his desponding mood, picturing the locksmith's daughter going down long country-dances, and pousseting dreadfully with bold strangers—which was almost too much to bear—when he heard the tramp of a horse's feet behind him, and looking back, saw a well-mounted gentleman advancing at a smart canter. As this rider passed, he checked his steed, and called him of the Maypole by his name. Joe set spurs to the grey mare, and was at his side directly.

"I thought it was you, sir," he said, touching his hat.

"A fair evening, sir. Glad to see you out of doors again." The gentleman smiled and nodded. "What gay doings have been going on to-day, Joe? Is she as pretty as ever? Nay, do n't blush, man."

"If I colored at all, Mr. Edward," said Joe, "which I didn't know I did, it was to think I should have been such a fool as ever to have any hope of her. She's as far out of my reach as—Heaven is."

"Well, Joe, I hope that's not altogether beyond it," said Edward, good-humoredly. "Eh?"

"Ah!" sighed Joe. "It's all very fine talking, sir. Proverbs are easily made in cold blood. But it can't be helped. Are you bound for our house, sir?"

"Yes. As I am not quite strong yet, I shall stay there to-night, and ride home coolly in the morning."

"If you're in no particular hurry," said Joe, after a short silence, "and will bear with the pace of this poor jade, I shall be glad to ride on with you to the Warren, sir, and hold your horse when you dismount. It'll save you having to walk from the Maypole, there and back again. I can spare the time well, sir, for I am too soon."

"And so am I," returned Edward, "though I was unconsciously riding fast just now, in compliment I suppose to the pace of my thoughts, which were traveling post. We will keep together, Joe, willingly, and be as good company as may be. And cheer up, cheer up, think of the locksmith's daughter with a stout heart, and you shall win her yet."

"Joe shook his head; but there was something so cheery in the buoyant, hopeful manner of this speech, that his spirits rose under its influence, and communicated, as it would seem, some new impulse even to the grey mare, who, breaking from her sober amble into a gentle trot, emulated the pace of Edward Chester's horse, and appeared to flatter herself that he was doing his very best."

It was a fine dry night, and the light of a young moon, which was then just rising, shed around that peace and tranquillity which gives to evening time its most delicious charm. The lengthened shadows of the trees, softened as if reflected in still water, threw their carpet on the path the travellers pursued, and the light wind stirred yet more softly than before, as though it were soothing Nature in her sleep. By little and little they ceased talking, and rode on side by side in a pleasant silence.

"The Maypole lights are brilliant to-night," said Edward, as they rode along the lane from which, while the intervening trees were bare of leaves, that hostelry was visible.

"Brilliant indeed, sir," returned Joe, rising in his stirrups to get a better view. "Lights in the large room, and a fire glimmering in the best bed-chamber? Why, what company can this be for, I wonder!"

"Some benighted horseman wending toward London, and deterred from going on to-night by the marvellous tales of my friend the highwayman, I suppose," said Edward.

"He must be a horseman of good quality to have such accommodations. Your bed too, sir—!"

"No matter, Joe. Any other room will do for me. But come—there's nine striking. We may push on."

They cantered forward at as brisk a pace as Joe's charger could attain, and presently stopped in the little copse where he had left her in the morning. Edward dismounted, gave his bridle to his companion, and walked with a light step toward the house.

A female servant was waiting at a side gate in the garden-wall, and admitted him without delay. He hurried along the terrace-walk, and darted up a flight of broad steps leading into an old and gloomy hall, whose walls were ornamented with rusty suits of armor, antlers, weapons of the chase, and suchlike garniture. Here he paused, but not long; for as he looked round, as if expecting the attendant to have followed, and wondering she had not done so, a lovely girl appeared, whose dark hair next moment rested on his breast. Almost at the same instant a heavy hand was laid upon her arm, Edward felt himself thrust away, and Mr. Haredale stood between them.

He regarded the young man sternly without removing his hat; with one hand clasped his niece, and with the other, in which he held his riding-whip, motioned him toward the door. The young man drew himself up and returned his gaze.

"This is well done of you, sir, to corrupt my servants, and enter my house unbidden and in secret, like a thief!" said Mr. Haredale. "Leave it, sir, and return no more."

"Miss Haredale's presence," returned the young man, "and your relationship to her, give you a license which, if you are a brave man, you will not abuse. You have compelled me to this course, and the fault is yours—not mine."

"It is neither generous, nor honorable, nor the act of a true man, sir," retorted the other, "to tamper with the affections of a weak, trusting girl, while you shrink, in your unworthiness, from her guardian and protector, and dare not meet the light of day. More than this I will not say to you, save that I forbid you this house, and require you to be gone."

"It is neither generous, nor honorable, nor the act of a true man to play the spy," said Edward. "Your words imply dishonor, and I reject them with the scorn they merit."

"You will find," said Mr. Haredale, calmly, "your trusty go-between in waiting at the gate by which you entered. I have played no spy's part, sir. I chanced to see you pass the gate, and followed. You might have heard me knocking for admission, had you been less swift of foot, or lingered in the garden. Please to withdraw. Your presence here is offensive to me and distressful to my niece." As he said these words, he passed his arm about the waist of the terrified and weeping girl, and drew her closer to him; and though the habitual severity of his manner was scarcely changed, there was yet apparent in the action an air of kindness and sympathy for her distress.

"Mr. Haredale," said Edward, "your arm encircles her on whom I have set my every hope and thought, and to purchase one minute's happiness for whom I would gladly lay down my life; this house is the casket that holds the precious jewel of my existence. Your niece has plighted her faith to me, and I have plighted mine to her. What have I done that you should hold me in this light esteem, and give me these discourteous words?"

"You have done that, sir," answered Mr. Haredale, "which must be undone. You have tied a lover's knot here which must be cut asunder. Take good heed of what I say. Must. I cancel the bond between ye. I reject you and of all your kith and kin—all the false, hollow, heartless stock."

"High words, sir," said Edward, scornfully.

"Words of purpose and meaning, as you will find," replied the other. "Lay them to heart."

"Lay you then, these," said Edward. "Your cold and sullen temper, which chills every breast about you, which turns affection into fear, and changes duty into dread, has forced us on this secret course, repugnant to our nature and our wish, and far more foreign, sir, to us than you. I am not a false, a hollow, or a heartless man; the character is yours, who poorly venture on these injurious terms, against the truth, and under the shelter whereof I reminded you just now. You shall not cancel the bond between us. I will not abandon this pursuit. I rely upon your niece's truth and honor, and set your influence at naught. I leave her with a confidence in her pure faith, which you will never weaken, and with no concern but that I do not leave her in some gentler care."

With that, he pressed her cold hand to his lips, and once more encountered and returning Mr. Haredale's steady look, withdrew.

A few words to Joe as he mounted his horse sufficiently explained what had passed, and renewed all that young gentleman's despondency with tenfold aggravation. They rode back to the Maypole without exchanging a syllable, and arrived at the door with heavy hearts.

Old John, who had peeped from behind the red curtain as they rode up shouting for Hugh, was out directly, and said with great importance as he held the young man's stirrup,

"He's comfortable in bed—the best bed. A thorough gentleman; the smilingest, affablest gentleman I ever had to do with."

"Who, Willet?" said Edward, carelessly, as he dismounted.

"Your worthy father, sir," replied John. "Your honorable, venerable father."

"What does he mean?" said Edward, looking with a mixture of alarm and doubt at Joe.

"What do you mean?" said Joe. "Do n't you see Mr. Edward does n't understand, father?"

"Why did n't you know of it, sir?" said John, opening his eyes wide. "How very singular! Bless you, he's been here ever since noon to-day, and Mr. Haredale has been having a long talk with him, and has n't been gone an hour."

"My father, Willet!"

"Yes, sir, he told me so—a handsome, slim, upright gentleman, in green-and-gold. In your old room up yonder, sir," said John, walking backward into the road and looking up at the window. "He has n't put out his candles yet, I see."

Edward glanced at the window also, and hastily murmuring that he had changed his mind—forgotten something—and must return to London—mounted his horse again and rode away; leaving the Willets, father and son, looking at each other in mute astonishment.

AFFECTING INCIDENT.—A young man, whose pale and haggard countenance retained some traces of beauty and regularity, presented himself yesterday at the Commissariat of Police to place himself at the disposal of the judicial authorities. He said that he had involuntarily outraged the laws of society, and that he now implored justice to release him from the tortures of remorse and the ceaseless torments of his tempestuous conscience.

On being interrogated with kindness by the magistrate, the wretched man, whose sobs and torrents of tears bore but too ample evidence to the truth of his sad tale, spoke as follows:

"My name is Claude B—. I am thirty-four years of age. I was formerly in the habit of contributing to several journals, and the success of several of my publications would entitle me to rank as a man of letters. About three years since I married a woman, good, virtuous and beautiful; and although want and squalid misery sat with us at our board, love never deserted our humble dwelling. For two years we continued our hard struggles with adversity—my wife with her needle, I with my pen; but finding it impossible to obtain my livelihood in Paris, we determined to seek for bread in the Provinces. We left Paris to go we knew not whither. The world was all before us, and, friendless, almost naked, and in misery, we went forth in the wide world to seek our fortunes. I had no resources, no calling, or profession, and what to do I knew not. Within a few miles of Paris, on the high road, we fell in with a band of strolling players; I joined them, and for a time prospered, at least I had learned to deem that prosperity which ensured food and raiment for myself and wife. The band at length was dispersed, and we were again cast like a weed upon the ocean of wretchedness. Gaunt famine again stared us in the face, but my wife parried its attacks for a time by resigning herself to sing about the cafés in the evenings, as she was an accomplished musician. But even the few wretched sous which she obtained by her debasing calling sufficed not to preserve us from want and hunger. About a fortnight since we were at Point-Audemar, which we quitted without one farthing, intending to return to Paris, and relying upon the charity of travellers to prevent our dying of cold and hunger by the way-side. On Thursday, the 18th, we were spurned from the thresholds of several auberges, where we had requested permission to sing for the entertainment of the company. We had not seen a fire or tasted a morsel of food, but providentially we fell in with a poor laborer who procured us admission for the night to a stable. The smiling morning at length came on, instilling freshness and joy into all, save the miserable wretch you see before you. Tramp, tramp, we arose from our straw, and again travelled along the banks of the Eure toward Evreux; but our sufferings had been greater than we could bear. Strength and courage simultaneously failed us, and at length my beautiful, beloved wife, who had borne up like an angel against our harrowing vicissitudes, turned her famishing looks toward me and said that she would lay her down and die, for that she could no longer support the racking pains of hunger. I tried to encourage her, by pointing out the steeple of Evreux Cathedral, which was rising up out of the morning mists like a beacon of hope. I tried, by rubbing her quivering limbs, to invigorate her wasted frame; but it was of no avail; despair had shut up all access to hope or consolation; she turned and thanked me for my efforts, and said, in a voice of angelic sweetness which I am for ever doomed to have ringing in my ears, 'My friend, were I even to survive this dreadful day, and arrive at Evreux, the same thing would occur again to-morrow or next week. We are destined to sorrow and misery in this world. If, amidst the trials and degradations against which we have so manfully contended, you still cherish the love which presided at our union, do as I am resolved to do. The river rolls beneath us: let it be our tomb; and let it be our consolation that we have none to mourn over our loss.' She repelled all my exhortations and entreaties with stern resolve, and finding all my efforts useless, I agreed to plunge with her into the foaming torrent beneath us. With my handkerchief I tied her feet and hands, and we embraced for the last time. Can I ever forget that long last kiss of blighted hopes and blasted affections? Ere yet I had finished my harrowing task, my wife, eager to quit a world of suffering, sprang from the bank, and a few bubbles told me that all was over. The trees, hills, valleys, and river, whirled around me in mad confusion. I saw and felt no more, until the day after I found myself in the middle of a field, conscious that my misfortunes had bereft me of my reason. I walked on, at times yelling like a madman gay, but during my lucid intervals a prey to tortures, such as I hope no human being will ever suffer again. I have here, still before my eyes, my gentle, uncomplaining, angel wife, springing from the bank, and I having the cowardice to assist in consummating the horrible sacrifice."

A procès verbal was then drawn up, and Claude B—— was placed at the disposal of the judicial authorities.—[Gazette des Tribunaux.]

A DUEL QUASHED.—"I have no stomach for the fight to-day."—A very laughable occurrence happened the other day in Paris, which may afford a good hint to the managers of affairs of honor. Two law students, living in a hotel in the Rue St. Dominique d'Éafer, quarrelled one day after dinner, and agreed to settle their differences at the point of the sword—choosing two students of medicine, living in the same hotel, for their seconds. On the following morning all the parties met in the chamber of one of the seconds, who insisted, before they proceeded to business, that the principals should taste a bottle of prime Chablis, which he produced. After a little hesitation, and being assured by their friends that it was not intended to hinder the meeting, the combatants finished the bottle, which was pronounced to be excellent. Ten minutes after they had mounted a public conveyance, and in a short time had arrived at the field of arms. The ground was soon chosen, swords measured, and the two champions were engaged, when one of them suddenly clapping his hand to his stomach, and betraying by his countenance a strong internal motion, abandoned his ground, and rushed to a neighboring thicket, where he experienced one of the least agreeable concomitants of a sea-voyage. In a few minutes, however, he appeared to grow better, and returned to his place, and prepared to commence the combat, when his adversary, seized by a similar indisposition, was obliged to drop his sword, and take refuge in the thicket. The latter, like the other, returned shortly to the ground. The swords were again drawn, and the blades crossed, when, alas! for the dignity of the duel, the antagonists were compelled, by mutual consent, to desist, and retire, where they might in secret relieve their bosoms of "the perilous stuff," which their waggish friends had administered to them in the bottle of Chablis on which they had been regaled, and who now witnessed the doleful situation of the valorous heroes with shouts of laughter. The result may be anticipated: Each of the combatants returned to their hotel "a wiser and a sadder man" than he had left in the morning, fully satisfied that honor stands no chance against tartar-emetac.

SPLENDID ERUPTION OF A VOLCANO.

We are indebted, says the Newark Daily Advertiser, to an officer of the Exploring Expedition for files of the Poly-nesian, a useful little paper published at the Sandwich Islands; and transfer the following extract from a full account of the last volcanic eruption, which was briefly referred to by our correspondent in a late letter, as having been witnessed by the officers of the squadron:

"Several days before the eruption, smoke was seen by the natives rising from the direction where the lava afterward burst out, but it was attributed to brush on fire. At 2 o'clock on Sunday, the last day of May, a bright light was seen from Hilo toward the south, which spread with great rapidity, and increased to such an intensity that it was immediately attributed to a volcanic eruption. This the reports of the natives soon confirmed. It was judged to be thirty miles distant, and at night such was the brilliancy of the light, that the finest print could be read at that distance. This nocturnal brightness, converting night into day, continued for two weeks, and is represented by eye witnesses to have been a spectacle of unsurpassed sublimity. It was like the glow of a firmament on fire, and was seen for upward of a hundred miles at sea. It also rose and spread itself above the lofty mountain peaks, so as to be distinctly visible on the leeward side of the island, where the wind drove the smoke in dense and massy clouds.

The lava continued flowing toward the sea, which it reached on Thursday, four days from its first egress. At times it would rush forward with a velocity of four to five miles per hour, but for a short distance only, then become very sluggish, and move heavily and slowly on. Its general movement was in immense semi-circular masses, owing to its great consistency. These would roll on, gradually accumulating, until the mass had become too heavy to hold itself together, while the exterior was partially cooled and solidified; then bursting, the liquid interior flowing out would join a new stream, and thus aid in forming another. By these accelerated progressive movements, the wave-like ridges were formed, which are every where observable on the older currents. At times, it forced its way under the circumjacent soil, presenting the singular appearance of earth, rocks and trees in motion like the swell of the ocean. Mr. C. was standing near the stream and watching its progress, when the land beneath him began to rise, and in a few minutes he was ten feet above his companions, who were but a short distance from him. He had barely time to leave this dangerous situation when the earth opened, and lava gushed out. The color of the whole stream was of the deepest crimson. On the windward side its heat was not so powerful, but that persons could approach and plunge sticks into the fiery mass and draw forth specimens. So great was its viscosity, that large rocks were seen floating down the current, like cork upon water. In one night the stream spread from a few rods to half a mile in width.

The spectacle, when this burning mass reached the sea, must have been awful and sublime in the highest degree. The conflict between the two antagonistic powers, fire and water, was on a scale which the eye of man but seldom witnesses. The heavens were lit up in one intense blaze, while streams of fire, like lightning, glanced about in every direction. Ashes and sand were thrown to a great height into the air, and descended for miles distant in showers of fiery spray. Volumes of smoke and steam rolled heavily up, rendering the lurid glare still more powerful, while the heavy detonations and loud reports of exploding gases, and the roar of the conflicting elements were distinctly heard twenty-five miles off, like discharges of artillery.

With such rapidity and to such a degree was the water heated, that the following day (June 5th,) the fish floated when dead, as far as Keauu, fifteen miles distant, where the water was hot to the touch.

RAGE FOR THE TELESCOPE.—The interest which the exhibition of the telescope excited at Venice did not soon subside: Sirturi describes it as amounting almost to phrensy. When he himself had succeeded in making one of these instruments, he ascended the tower of St. Mark, where he might use it without molestation. He was recognized, however, by a crowd in the street; and such was the eagerness of their curiosity, that they took possession of the wondrous tube, and detained the impatient philosopher for several hours, till they had successively witnessed its effects. Desirous of obtaining the same gratification for their friends, they endeavored to learn the name of the inn at which he lodged; but Sirturi fortunately overheard their inquiries, and quitted Venice early next morning, in order to avoid a second visitation of this new school of philosophers. The opticians speedily availed themselves of the new instrument. Galileo's tube—or the double eye-glass, or the cylinder, or the trunk, as it was then called, for Demichiano had not yet given it the appellation of telescope—was manufactured in great quantities, and in a very superior manner. The instruments were purchased merely as philosophical toys, and were carried by travellers into every corner of Europe.

EMIGRATION TO AMERICA.—On Monday afternoon, at four o'clock, the Wellington, one of the regular New York line of packet-ships, was hauled out of the St. Katherine's dock, Liverpool, in the presence of an immense number of spectators, who lined the pier-head on each side of the lock entrance to witness her departure. She has on board 160 emigrants, principally of the humbler classes, who intend to settle in America. Among them are a number of agricultural laborers from various counties in England, tradesmen of small capital, mechanics, and their wives and families, who have left their native land with a view of bettering their condition in the United States and Canada. The emigrants were assembled on deck as the ship was being hauled through the dock into the river, and were bidding adieu to their friends and relatives assembled to witness their departure from old England. The scene was an interesting but very painful one; the exclamations "Good by—God bless you!" were heard on all sides. Many fine young women on deck appeared deeply affected, and were sobbing loudly at the separation from their friends, country, and kindred, while numbers of both sexes on shore, who were looking upon their relatives and acquaintances for the last time, seemed quite overcome with grief. The Wellington was taken in tow by a steamer, and proceeded down the river for Portsmouth, and, in addition to emigrants, takes out a valuable cargo, and dispatches from government for our minister at Washington.—[English paper.]

ITALIAN TEMPERATURE AND SEASONS.—The medium height of the thermometer for the whole year at different places, has been stated as follows:—at Milan, 55° 4' of Fahrenheit's scale; at Rome 59°; at Palermo, 62° 5'; and in Sardinia, 60° 5'. In the Roman gardens the almond trees blossom about the end of January; and in March at latest, the warmth of Spring has there become great and constant. The summer heats in that quarter are most intense, or, at any rate, most oppressive, in the month of August; but they are alleviated by gentle breezes, and by occasional thunderstorms with rain. For about two months and a half in the middle of summer, the highest temperature at Rome, on an average of years, has been about 92°; but that height is sometime exceeded. In July, 1828, the thermometer in that city rose to 95°; and for some days in the same month, at Molfetta in the Terra di Barri, it ranged from 97° to 104°. The corn harvest in the Roman district commonly begins about the end of June, and the vintage early in October: soon after the beginning of September the autumnal rains set in; and, when their violence is over, the climate, till then almost insufferably warm except in favorable exposures on the hills, becomes again moderate and delightful. During the winter months the temperature is very capricious, the nights are exceedingly cold, and the suddenness of the chill which accompanies the evening twilight is equally perceptible by the senses and from the evidence of the thermometer. On the mountains near Rome, snow lies every year, though not long; and in the city it usually falls one day at least in the season, but immediately disappears. In the south of Italy, and in Sicily, the heats of Summer are mitigated by the daily breeze, which springs two or three hours before mid-day, and sinks again toward evening. On the hottest days in Sicily, the thermometer ordinarily rises to 90° or 92°, and in the coldest days of winter it very seldom falls below 36°.

WANTED, A WIDOW.—An extraordinary and ludicrous scene took place on Tuesday morning, in Tower-street, at the house of Mr. E. Stroud, stationer and patent pocket-book manufacturer, at the corner of Mark-lane. Mr. S. having occasion for a housekeeper to superintend his domestic affairs, he advertised in the papers of Monday for "a widow and her daughter, to take charge of a tradesman's house, and to cook for him." The wages were stated to be £30 per annum, with coals and candles, &c., and application was directed to be made between eleven and three o'clock, at 68 Tower street. Before the clock struck eleven the widows began to arrive, and the street was soon rendered impassable by the number of fair ones crowding toward the house, and in a few minutes Mr. Stroud's shop and parlor were filled with women struggling to gain the attention of the advertiser, and clamorously setting forth their qualifications for the situation. A report soon got wind that Mr. Stroud had advertised for a wife, and people flocked from all quarters to see the ladies in search of a husband. The widows—young, middle-aged, and old, the thin and stout, the dark and the fair, some in their weeds and others gaily attired, and many poorly but decently clad—continued to arrive, and were greeted with laughter and shouts by the mob, who gave free vent to their jokes as the widows arrived and departed. At length the confusion became so great that a posse of the city police were sent for to preserve order, and afford a free ingress and egress to the applicants. About twelve o'clock, when the crowd was very dense round the house, a cab drove up, from which stepped a very handsome widow and her daughter, who had come from Essex to answer the advertisement, and were received by the mob in a similar rude manner, amidst cries of "Do you want a husband, marm?" "He's a good looking man;" "What fortune have you got?" and other exclamations. The widow and her daughter, seeing the position of affairs, immediately retreated and drove off. The widows continued flocking to the spot, and the mob increased till about 3 o'clock, at which time it was calculated that upwards of 600 females had applied for the situation.

MINIATURE CARRIAGE FOR THE PRINCESS ROYAL.—A most elegant little carriage is now building, and nearly completed, for the use of the Princess Royal, to enable the infant Princess to take occasional airings with her majesty through the walks in the gardens of Buckingham Palace and Windsor Castle. It is a most tasteful little affair, the body resting within a few inches of the ground, and admirably adapted to the purposes for which it will be required. A pair of beautiful Shetland ponies, in perfect keeping as to size with the carriage, have recently been purchased, and the whole "turn out" will be an attractive novelty. The ponies are so exceedingly tractable and docile that, it may be said, "even a child might drive them." It is expected that this Lilliputian affair will be used for the first time upon the arrival of the Court at Windsor at Easter.

Hayden was one of the most quiet of composers; he required no strong stimulus, no enlivening punch or sparkling champagne to give an impulse to his genius; but he had a familiar spirit of his own of another kind, a gentle sort of Zamial, and this was a diamond ring which had been presented to him by Frederick the Great. Did it sometimes happen that at his studies the ideas would not flow with ease, the fault was at once laid on the ring; he had forgotten to put it on. And no sooner was the magic ring on the composer's finger, and its brilliant sparkling in his eye, than the spring of his awakened fancy was at once unsealed.

BLACKBERRY PICKING.

LOVE AND HORNETS.

Mister Editor: Did you ever in the hull course o' your natteral life go a blackberryin'? If you haint, golly grahshus, why you do n't know nothin' no more about real labor-savin', high-preshur, galvanic-lectifyin' sport than the butt end o' nothin' arter it's been whittled. Lor' ha' massy upon offiss-holders! why nothin' in all creation can come up tu blackberryin', but gitten' dumped out'n a slay into a sno bank, and even that aint as good, when it aint a moon-berry night. Menny and menny is the time when a lot o' the Jordan Spankers—that 's what our village boys was nicknamed—would raise a party o' gals, arter the grain-harvestin' was over, and afore the corn and taters was ripe, and start off early in the mornin' for Hop-Toad Hill, where the blackberries was cenamost as plentiful as muskeeters in these digging, and sich all-fired prime times as we 'd have was a caution tu forriners. Fust off when all hands got collected, and a lot o' suttin' to eat, pork an' beans, new cider, gooseberry pise, green corn, lasses gingerbread an' a smart sprinklin' of other good things was provided, we 'd lokermote; the gals all a walkin' by themselves, and the fellers a walkin' by themselves; the gals with their tongues a runnin' about scandle, new ribbins, kaliko gowns, and sich consarns, jest as fast as a saw-mill in a freshet; and the fellers a gabblin' about horses, cattle, gincral musters an' corn shukkins—a tellin' how 't was all like Shaw's kerelessness that made his grain mouldy—that Jim Bingy was the orfulest liar that ever was, and that Hen Sprague told uncle Seth that Zeke Armstrong's wife had heerd how that Harrison Stebbins had n't the funs to go on with his new frame house, an' that a comin' so strait from one who 'd orter know all about it, all hands sot it rite down for a fact, an' said that it sarved him jest rite—an' then to think of his havin' the sass tu bild a house, without tellin' the hull village how menny rooms there was to be on the fust floor, an' he a member o' the church, tu—"it sarved him jest rite, by crackey!" So we 'd keep a torkin' till we cum to the hill, then all hands div rite into the bushes and brambles, and sich a scramblin' and scratchin' for blackberries as there was, was n't to be sneezed at.

It happened that on one o' these blackberryin frolics that a sartin long-haired feller, with a little bunch rite over his mouth—lookin at a distance jest as though he'd ben among the pots an' kittles, an got a great gob of crock on his upper lip—was a visitin down our way, an appeared tu have taken an amazin fancy tu Sally Ann, the Sally Ann that I 'd ben payin 'tentions tu; kep a chatin tu her the hull live long time, an' I snum if I could scarcely bleve my own natteral senses, when he begun to pick berries an' put 'em into her basket, an' she not sayin' a word agin it. Wal I guess as how I was a leetle riled, tu see myself out an' set adrift in that fashion, an' I had a gret mined to go off and shine 'round some other gal jest for spite, but somehow 'rother I wanted to keep an eye on that dandy. So tu Sally says I, "there 's a smart sprinklin o' berries over here, I guess a leetle than they grow around your way." "Oh, they 're thick as puddin' here," says she. "I kalkilate that you are pooty consmedly thick," says. "You-aw remarks aw demd supawfluous," says the long haired creetur. Suz alive! but wa'n't my dander up, to hear myself called a "demd snporflus"—down I slat the basket an upshot all the berries—marches rite up tu him jest as brassy as a hull malicious trainin an says I, "ony you call me a porpus or a suporflus agin, an' see how I'll go tu work an spile your hansum countenance for ye." With that, Sally she bust out a cryin, an I vow if I could help a boo-hooix a leetle myself, I felt so conflasticated. "You-aw laboring under aw erruaw," says he, "but awnaw demands an explanation—awm demd." "Wal," says I, "your langwidge wants explainin that 's a fact." So he turned round tu set down, hauled out his hankercher, an' as I hope to be saved went to dustin off the top of a hornets' nest, and afore one could say "git out," sot down on 't tu explain. Gorashus! did n't the hornets come at him for squishin their nest, an' did n't he run and heller, an' scoot thro' the briar bushes, an' tear his trowser-loons—aa! the gals snickered out, an' the fellers haw-hawed till they was eenamost ded, tu see that dandy marvill down tu the main road, without enny kat, his trowse all split up, his hair a flyin' in the wind like a hosses tail, and the hornets a goin it tu kill. Sally was shockin shamed of actin so, but we soon made up, and sitch prime sport as all hands had for the rest of the day wa'n't tu be beat. Long Locks mended up his trowserloons—they were the ony ones he had—and sneaked out'n our village that day an' haint showed his nose there since—the poor creetur said he found no less than two duzen ded hornets in his boots arter he took 'em off! We cum from blackberryin' in pairs and not as went—had a loud cargo o' berries, and I do n't bieve that one on us 'll ever forgit the haw-hawin we had about the feller who sot down on the hornets' nest. Yures truly, JEHOSEPHAT JINKINS.

THE SPIRITS OF AIR.

BY ISAAC McLELLAN, JR.

"The whole of Nature is animated. The world teems with Spirits. The very air is thick with them. They dance in the sunshine; they ride upon the beams of the stars. They float about in the melodies of music; they nestle in the cups of flowers; and I am forced to believe, that never a flower fades, or a beam passes away, without some Being mourning the brief date of loveliness on earth."—[JAMES.]

I.

Spirits, gentle spirits, fill
Every verdant grot and hill.
Their unnumbered legions rally
In the moist and lonesome valley.
Thick in the sweet flowers they lie,
In the violet's purple eye;
In the wild rose of the hedge,
In the pink that crowns the ledge;
In the honeysuckle's bloom,
In the hawthorn's soft perfume;
In the gay sweet-pea that flings
O'er the lattice its green rings;
In the strawberry's snowy cup,
Where the wild bees love to sup.

II.

In the twinkling leaves that quiver,
O'er the clearly flowing river;
High among the boughs they flit,
On the topmost twigs they sit,
Joying in the flashing gleam
Of the wind-o'erwrinkled stream.
Oft the gaudy blue-jay sees
Their mad gambols o'er the trees;
And the chattering squirrels meet
On the oak their nimble feet;
Oft the sky-ward soaring lark
Steps their airy sports to mark;
Oft the cawing crow's keen eye
Views them as they circle by;
Oft the lonely wood-dove's brood
Meets them in the untrod wood.

In the earliest beam that day
Sprinkles o'er the mountains grey;
In the tiniest sparkling mote,
Thick those mystic Beings float;
In the flame of noon they ride;
And when mellow eventide
Flushes with its yellow flood
Glassy lake and waving wood,
Thick their fairy myriads crowd
Each bright color of the cloud;
And when streams the white moonlight
O'er the azure dome of night,
And when twinkles the faint star,
In its trackless course afar,
Millions of those spirits stream
Through each shooting, sparkling beam.

In the gushing melodies,
O'er all nature that arise;
In the ocean's hollow beat,
Where the beach and billow meet;
In the gurgle of the brook,
Whispering in the woody nook;
In the murmur of the leaves,
When the grove the breeze receives;
In the plaintive, mellow note
Of the song bird's chanting throat;
In the honey-bee's long hum,
In the beetle's drowsy drum;
In the warble of the flute,
In the soft, melodious lute;
In each pleasing earthly sound
Are those mingling Spirits found.

A TALE OF CHARLECOMBE VILLAGE, (NEAR BATH, ENGLAND.)

I left the village when quite a lad,
I return an old gray-hair'd man;
And many a day both gay and sad
Have I known in Life's lengthen'd span.
But nothing has won my heart from thee,
Loved home, where my fathers dwelt;
Near the village church, with its old yew tree,
Where often, in happy infancy,
In humble prayer I've knelt!

We were but four—my sister and I,
My father and fond young mother;
And surely no hearts in one family
So dearly could love each other.
But I was cursed with a wish to roam,
And longed to follow the sea;
Nor could the prayers of those at home,
Keep me from braving the salt sea foam,
For a sailor I would be.

I crossed the ocean and India found;
When there I was like to die,
But was saved by one, and friendship bound
Me to serve him faithfully.
I staid—and many a year rolled by;
I wrote—but no answer came;
Till Hope, deferred from day to day,
Perished by tardy, yet sure decay.
I feared they'd forgotten my name!

I heard at last, for which I had prayed,
But my heart was sorely tried;—
The ship that bore me returned, and said
"In India I had died!"

* * * * *

My sister was woo'd by many a one,
But none would she ever wed,
Till he with news to her feet did come,
Or bring the truant wand'rer home,
For she would not believe me dead.

One came—both pale and weak was he,
But his was a soul of fire;
He gloried to prove his constancy,
By doing her heart's desire.
He left, upheld by some wizard spell—
For Love has sustaining charms—
He tracked me over the ocean's swell,
He found—the prize was won—too well!
He died within these arms!

* * * * *

I dar'd not return—and years rolled on;
The fever of gain was past;
My hair was turning—my health was gone,
I pined in spirit to rest upon
My native turf at last.
And here I arrived but yesternight;
My home still stands the same;
But Death has quenched the living light
Of all who bore my name.

He sleeps afar in a foreign land;
They slumber here below;
And I, the last of that link'd band,
Alone, and stricken with sorrow, stand,
Praying their peace to know.

HENRY E. WATSON.

A RARA AVIS.—One day this week we had an opportunity afforded us of witnessing a most remarkable instance of success in teaching birds to talk and sing. The gentleman to whom we are indebted for this high treat is Mr. Garside, surgeon of Sandy-lane, Cheetham-hill, by whose kind permission we are enabled to lay the following interesting particulars before our readers. Among the large family of feathered curiosities by which Mr. Garside is surrounded, there are several highly accomplished bullfinches and canaries, which sing English and foreign airs most exquisitely, particularly a canary, which executed a difficult waltz with great precision and accuracy. But these, interesting as they are, fall into the shade when compared with the subject of our notice—a common starling, which has been taught not only to lay aside its natural notes and sing various airs with great exactness, but to chatter away with all the volubility and much of the quaintness of an old maid. Jack (for that is the name to which this mimic answers,) on a sign from his owner and instructor, commences, and runs on in the following strain:—"How d'ye do, Sir—how d'ye do, Sir? Any news to-day—any news to-day? [The bird, we should explain, repeats each expression.] Have you seen the papers? Jack is a Tory. Wellington and Peel for ever. Hurrah, hurrah!—bravo, bravo! Now, ladies and gentlemen, I'll give you a song; I hope I don't intrude; now for it—silence, silence. [Here Jack will commence singing 'The rose tree in full bearing,' or an Italian air.] Hurrah, hurrah!—bravo, bravo!—well done, Jack. Jack is a dandy; good lad, Jack. I should like to kiss Sally. Come, Sir, be quiet; oh, for shame; how dare you? Upon my word, you're a pretty fellow! oh, for shame! Jack is very poorly. [Coughs three times.] Fetch the doctor; fetch the doctor! I should like to fly away; but I can't get out—I can't get out; let me come out. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I'll give you a song—silence, silence! (With emphasis.)—Now for it. [Sings again.] Hurrah, hurrah!—bravo, bravo!—well done, Jack; Jack is a dandy." In this way Master Jack goes on chattering and singing by turns the day long. He is now just ten months old. When he first came into Mr. Garside's possession he was only six weeks old; he soon, however, showed himself a very apt learner, and at nine months old could repeat many of the expressions which he now so constantly uses with such distinctness and apparent ease.—[Manchester Courier.]

A SENSIBLE WIFE.—One of our subscribers discontinued his paper a fortnight since, in order, as he said, to curtail his expenses. This week he sends to renew his subscription, because his wife "will have it." He has concluded to economise in something else.—[Ohio Star.]

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1841.

Our readers are requested to read the handsome proposition, made by our Publisher in his department of the paper. It is liberal, and cannot fail to afford general satisfaction, since it places within the reach of every subscriber to the New World a most valuable and pleasing work. SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE should be found in every family circle—for its pages impart delight to the old and the young. It is a fountain of pure and wholesome recreation.

HON. RUFUS CHOATE'S EULOGY.—We are obliged to forego our intention to publish Mr. Choate's Eulogy this week. We had the copy reported in the Boston Daily Advertiser, and intended to make use of it; but we have this morning received a letter from Mr. Choate, informing us, that "so far as language goes" that report "is wholly inaccurate and incomplete."

We shall receive Mr. Choate's manuscript copy in a few days, and will then issue the eulogy as he delivered it.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN WEIGHTS, MEASURES AND MONIES IN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.—In every country, where advances have been made toward civilization, and where the mode of traffic among the people has been carried one step beyond the rudest system of barter, it has been found necessary for the government to interfere, in order to establish standards whereby to ascertain the quantities by weight or measure of things, which form the objects of trade. This interference is necessary, in order to prevent frauds and endless disputes; and when a system of weights and measures has been adopted, which in this respect produces certainty into the dealings of traders and consumers, a great benefit will have been conferred upon both classes. It has usually happened in most countries, from the subject not having been well understood, that the settlement of this important point has been devolved by the general Government upon various local bodies in different parts of the same country, and by this means a want of uniformity has been produced; the inconvenience of which has long been acknowledged, and at various times efforts have been made for remedying the evil.

At the organization of our Government, authority was conferred upon Congress to establish a uniform system of weights and measures, but no laws have as yet been enacted by that body for the perfection of this important object. Some measures have been taken to obtain information on the subject, and able reports have been made by Messrs. Jefferson, Adams, and Hassler. Most of the States of the Union have attempted to reduce their standards of weights and measures to a uniform system, and numerous laws have been enacted with that view; but so far from succeeding in their object, they have had in many instances, an opposite effect. There are but few States in which the proportions of their measures are required by law to be the same—lineal, superficial, and cubic measures excepted—although they may bear the same names; and owing to the difficulty of enforcing new regulations, the great pertinacity with which people adhere to customs of this kind, when once they have been suffered to take root, and a constant influx of settlers from one State into another, and from various countries of Europe, who bring with them their own accustomed weights and measures, uniformity can hardly be said to exist in any State of the Union. Local consumers do not feel the whole disadvantage of this confusion. But those who make large purchases—merchants, who either send out their own produce to another part of the country, or import the manufactures of their distant fellow-countrymen to their own States—often experience great difficulties in converting to their own local standard the quantities expressed according to another rate. The proportion which one standard often bears to another is not easily ascertained; and when it is, the calculations necessary to be made are long and tedious, and do not always give an accurate result.

We have been led to make the above remarks from reading an interesting and elaborate article in the May number of Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, on the forthcoming Report of a "Commission," instituted by the British Government, for devising a more simple and convenient system of Weights, Measures and Money's. The writer has evidently devoted no ordinary degree of attention to the subject, and has clearly demonstrated in what manner a uniform system can be established both in Great Britain and the United States. From the scientific character and the simplicity of the principles and arrangement of the system which he proposes, we cordially recommend it to the acceptance of the citizens of both countries; and were the two Governments to adopt this or some similar system, they would assuredly confer a lasting benefit on posterity.

With regard to the legal coinage of the country, the writer of the article referred to thinks that it could not probably be improved, with the exception of a slight alteration in the weight of our cents; but when we come to the obtrusive, ungracious and illegitimate 8th and 16th dollar pieces of Spain, a sweeping change he deems necessary. The change he thinks could readily be effected by reducing the value of the 12½ cent pieces to 10 cents, and the 6½ cent pieces to 5 cents, which would soon drive them out of the country, after the manner of the old pistareens a few years since. No individual who has long resided among us, can be ignorant of the inconvenience and perplexity he has met with by the use of these coins, and can be so prejudiced as not to be willing to have them abolished. With these alterations, only a slight change would be required in our laws, such as the reduction of postage from 18½ cents to 15 cents; 12½ cents to 10 cents, 6½ to 5 cents, &c., which has long been called for, and a few others.

SEIZURE OF HOUSEHOLD GOODS.—We are glad to perceive that this subject, to which we adverted some days ago, is about to receive some consideration in our Legislature, though not the sort of consideration which we conceive to be imperiously demanded.

The Judiciary Committee have reported a bill conforming in part to the prayer of the petitions that have been presented during the winter: that is, it proposes to exempt from execution household goods to the amount of one hundred and fifty dollars value in addition to what is already exempt by the present law.

Our objection to this bill is that it is confined to sales under execution, and does not extend to distress warrants; in other words, it does not extend to the great majority of cases where it is needed to relieve the petitioners. We hope that the bill may pass in its present shape; because its passage will be something gained. But we also hope that the good work will not stop there. To be of real, permanent service to the poor; to accomplish what all philanthropic and humane considerations would prompt; household goods must be protected, up to a certain amount, against any process. Our laws already provide exemption for a church pew, be its value what it may: and it is a most just and salutary provision. But, surely, a man's domestic altar is not less entitled to protection than his humble corner in the sanctuary of the Lord.

THE BOSTON ATLAS publishes the discourse pronounced by the Rev. Hubbard Winslow on the melancholy occasion of the death of Mr. Haughton, editor of the Atlas. The interest with which we read so feeling a tribute to a departed friend is indeed deep and painful. We subjoin an extract.

He had long wished to make a tour in the Old World, but circumstances had been hitherto unpropitious. They had now yielded to his desires; and his official appointment to be the bearer of despatches from government brought him at once to a decision to embark in the Acadia, on the 17th inst. The last cloud seemed now to have passed from his sky; the sun was riding full-orbed at high noon; the prosperity of the nation in whose cause he had so long labored, the realization of his fond dreams respecting a foreign tour, and the anticipation of pleasant scenes and recovered health in promise, made him one of the most cheerful and happy of mortals. The day of his intended departure arrived; his clothes were packed; he had taken leave of many of his friends; he had left his office, and was in his room at the Tremont House, adjusting his dress and preparing to bid adieu to his mother, brothers and sisters, and go on board. They were waiting to receive him, and exchange the parting congratulations. One of his friends had just said to him, "Major, we all hope and expect that you will have a pleasant voyage and a delightful time." He replied with emphatic assurance, "I know I shall." To another he said "I have always wished to visit Europe, but have never been able to accomplish that wish until now. My affairs are at length in a condition to leave; my paper is in good hands and is doing well; and, going as the bearer of despatches, I shall have every opportunity to be desired, abroad. I intend to be absent six months, and in the mean time to visit Italy. Yes, I am going to Rome; these eyes are soon to look upon the Eternal City." His friend remarked to him, "I hope the voyage and tour will confirm your health." His reply was, "I doubt not but they will." In less than two hours from that time, he was a corpse! Lord what is man! "Verily every man at his best estate is altogether vanity."

Another gentleman, then present but now absent from the city, writes, "He said to me, 'It's rather a pleasant idea; I have dreamed all my life-time of going to Europe; To-day, I go.'" The writer adds, "I left the room for five minutes, and on coming back found him on the bed with great distress in the region of the head, and occasional nausea. He had probably been in this condition about fifteen minutes, when you came. We rubbed him, and bathed his forehead, and tried to calm his mind, which, though he said but little, was evidently distressed with fear that he could not go in the Acadia. He grew continually worse, and the rest you know, until the light went out, at half past twelve o'clock, and poor Haughton embarked on a voyage far different from that which the hopes of the morning had pointed to! "To-day I go!" These words, which he spoke to me as the realization of the dreams of his whole life-time, are indelibly impressed on my recollection. How full they are of prophecy! What a text for the preacher!"

Thus closes the earthly career of our lamented friend. In the 42d year of his age, in the meridian of his life and the height of his prosperity, surrounded by affectionate relatives, he is summoned in a moment to the eternal world. Relentless death would not release him; no prayers nor tears could avail; his bounds were set, and he could not pass over them. It adds to the impressiveness of the admonition, that the man exalted to the chair of the nation, and the man who acted so conspicuous a part in placing him there, so soon descend to the grave together. What a vanity is this world! What bubbles are all earthly hopes!

POETRY.—There is no disputing about tastes; yet we think that our good friends of the Commercial might have spared their readers the mortal agony of "The Change" by Mrs. Colonel Thompson," written in Washington, April 7, 1841: and published in New York, April 27, 1841; or, in other words, twenty days after date.

Undoubtedly, among the various things that fill up the world of poetry, there are sundry descriptions of numbers and of verse. We have the acrostic, the epigram, the song, the ode, the sonnet, the dirge, the almost-any-thing, indeed, done in rhyme. Then we have the tragedy, and the epic which do best in blank verse; and, in fact, we do sometimes meet with a short, fugitive, occasional piece in blank verse that is good: though it should be particularly observed and most especially noted, and very unequivocally recollected that such piece in blank verse is always to be looked on with suspicion, and is never tolerable unless it be first-rate—i. e. the thought and the language must both be of the first order to render the form (blank verse) at all endurable.

From all this it may follow logically—and, in fact, it does follow—that nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every million of these occasional pieces in blank verse are miserable, wretched, irredeemable trash: and this, too, when they are done up in accordance to the mechanical rudiments of the arts,—being divided into line of ten syllables, and each line commencing with a capital letter.

But there is one kind of writing that falls far below even these—it is a sort of mock trash—an imitation of a humbug—a caricature of essential nonsense. This is a deliberate arrangement into lines that vary in length from four syllables to fifteen—without a rhyme to relieve them, without a thought to enliven them—of words: mere words: words taken at random from the dictionary: very good words, too, per se; but words which no inspiration could metamorphose, transpose or tecture into the expression of a sentiment, either good or bad.

The "Change," of which we have spoken somewhere in the course of these remarks, is a fair specimen of this style of writing: and as some of our readers may not have happened to see the Commercial, we will inflict an extract:

"What means this gathering of the multitude
Toward the city gates?
From every State within the Union's line
They come. From shore of broadest sea,
And bank of gentle river—from lofty edifice,
And lowly cottage—old men, and youth,
Each bearing laurel branch. Matrons
And maidens fair, with wreaths
Of choicest flowers—all come,
To crown the brow, and scatter roses
On the hero's path."

Now—do not be alarmed reader! we are not going to criticize such writing as that is rather too low down for criticism—now, we say, can any reasonable, respectable, well-bred gentleman inform us (not why people write such stuff; the wherefore of that is, unfortunately, too obvious: but) why the editor of a paper like the New-York Commercial Advertiser should consent to publish "The Change, by Mrs. Col. Thompson?"

Good luck! good luck! We can assign no other reason than that, once upon a time,
"The sun had gone down with his battle-stained eye."

MISS CLARENDON.—The principal novelty at our theatres the past week has been the appearance of a young and beautiful debutante at the Park, who is known to the public as Miss Clarendon. She made her debut on Saturday last, in "The Wife," repeated the performance on Wednesday, and on Thursday played Pauline, in the "Lady of Lyons," for her benefit. Her success before the "fit audience, though few," who were present on these several occasions, was of the most gratifying and brilliant description.

Miss Clarendon, if she resolves to persevere in the difficult career upon which her own unaided genius seems to have prompted her to enter, will attain a position second to that of no actress upon the English and American boards. We are willing to stake all the critical reputation that may be granted to us upon this vaticination.

In her stature and figure the debutante is not unlike Fanny Kemble, as she was, but, in loveliness of face and beauty of expression, Miss Clarendon bears away the palm not only from the illustrious Fanny but from all her professional contemporaries. It is in her exquisitely modulated and melodious voice, however, that the great charm and power and promise of her acting consist. Although half its powers are as yet undeveloped by practice, it is still sufficiently clear and sweet to win the ear of the most inattentive listener; and, with a little more study and cultivation, it will discourse "most eloquent music."

For a novice, Miss Clarendon treads the stage with surprising grace and confidence. We learn that she had not been at the theatre more than a half a dozen times in her life before making her debut. And yet we could not detect a single occasion, when there was the slightest embarrassment, awkwardness or failure of memory in her acting. There is no ungraceful exuberance, no inappropriate attempt at effect in her performance. Her faults are of so trifling a nature, that they may be easily corrected. They are such as a little experience with the stage will entirely remove.

With a person and a voice so well adapted for success upon the stage—so calculated to win at once the sympathy and admiration of audiences—with that becoming confidence, which a just consciousness of her own talents and powers alone could have inspired—with industry, ambition and the capacity of study and application—and above all with the modesty to receive and the good sense to appreciate the criticisms of competent advisers—we cannot doubt that Miss Clarendon will rapidly attain a distinguished rank in her arduous and perilous profession. We are sufficiently acquainted with her history to know, that a more deserving candidate for histrionic honors has never appeared upon our boards.

The following address was spoken by Miss Clarendon on the occasion of her benefit, on Thursday evening last:

Friends, generous friends, what gratitude is due
For liberal favor thus bestowed by you!
Could studied phrase or smoothly-polished line
Declare but half th' emotions that are mine—
As, thus invoked by your approving hands,
The Drama's votaries in your presence stands—
How should I grieve that not to me was given
Some inspiration from the poet's Heaven!
But, not in words, though by 'he muses taught,
And with the genius of a Shakspeare fraught,
Can one who deeply, truly feels, impart
The grateful sentiments that warm the heart!

New to the stage—to public effort new,
Young Inexperience shuddered at the view.
I feared yet ventured, trembled yet essayed,
Alike of failure and success afraid.
Oft in my dreams I saw the critic's frown,
Heard the cold comments of the careless town;
Imagined clouds, but saw no rainbow where Hope strove to paint her colors in the air:
But, still resolved though doubting still, I came,
Aid, kindness, sympathy, support to claim:
And these are mine—and in such lavish store,
I could not seek, I should not ask for more.

Before me lies afar my chosen way—
And on it rests the breaking light of day;
Shadows may fall; the sun may never rise
In clear effulgence o'er my future's skies;
But, whether bright or dark shall be my lot,
The present hour shall never be forgot,
And, though the mist that Time may round me cast,
One fair remembrance sparkle to the last.

THE MERCHANT'S WIDOW, AND OTHER TALES: By Mrs. Caroline M. Sawyer. P. Price, 130 Fulton street.

We have here a small and neat volume of original sketches of Life and its trials, by the wife of one of our city's most popular clergymen. Mrs. Sawyer was already known to a considerable portion of the community, by her contributions to the literary periodicals of the day and to those of her own Religious denomination; but she has never before appealed directly to the judgment of the great tribunal by publishing a book. Her many friends and admirers may well be proud of this effort. It extends to 192 pages and comprises three stories of unequal length, and a short poem of decided merit. The stories are entitled "The Merchants' Widow," "The Unequal Marriage," and "The Lonely Barial"—differing widely in their character but imbued with the same gentle, pensive, Christian spirit. None can read them without profit, and few without a profound and admiring interest. Their perfect plainness and simplicity of style, is the fitting garb of their pure thoughts and kindly, hallowed monitions; and if any of our city belles, who yawn away a late morning very dully over the last London novel, will condescend to do so unfashionable a thing as to take up "The Merchants' Widow" at their next sitting, we will warrant them a source of instruction and of serene enjoyment.

ANTHON'S CLASSICAL DICTIONARY.—We are gratified to see that this invaluable work receives from all our contemporaries the marked and extended commendation which it so well deserves. The last number of the New-York Review furnishes the most compendious comments and analysis of the book that has yet appeared; but all the papers devote nearly a column to it; and all agree that it is the most valuable book, from an American author, that has yet been published. It is a work indispensable in every man's library.

BANK ROBBERY.—In the Savannah papers of Saturday, 17th inst., it is announced by the Cashier, that the Planters' Bank of Georgia, located in Savannah, has been robbed of $37,000. The money was abstracted from the vaults, and consisted entirely of the notes of the Planters' Bank of the State of Georgia, of various denominations, but principally of notes of Fifty Dollars and Twenty Dollars.

Washington Correspondence.

WASHINGTON, April 21.

The policy of the Administration, under President Tyler, continues to be the engrossing topic in the political circles of the metropolis. The principles of the President himself have been defined with great clearness and force, in his Address to the People of the United States; and they are the principles for which the Whig party have been contending during a long course of years,—and which, when stated abstractly, no public man in this country, of any party, will venture to deny, unless he is ready also to brave the charge of being wanting in the sentiments of true republicanism. There is no mistake then, about Mr. TYLER's principles,—and there is no room for speculation, except as to the means of conveying them into practical effect. Upon this point I may perhaps be able to give your readers in a familiar way, some information that may be valuable and interesting.

One great purpose of PRESIDENT TYLER will be to restrain generally, the overaction of the Federal Government, which has been carried to such a height during the last twelve years. No one more strongly condemns the unconstitutional and anti-republican character of the leading measures of policy adopted by General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. No one more steadily or more vigorously resisted the usurpation by which they successively labored to strengthen the Executive arm. He has shown, even during his brief term of service, that what he opposed, when out of place, he is determined to put down and destroy, now when in office, and when the advantages of the increased Executive power would enure to himself. He has voluntarily deprived himself of much of the patronage and influence which he might have employed to strengthen himself, and weaken his adversaries. He has told the legion of office-holders—(who, under the last two Administrations, composed a band always to be counted upon, always to be trusted, always active and energetic in behalf of their superiors,

"For 't is their duty, as the sage ones think,
To aid the cause by which they eat and drink."

he has told these men to keep their hands off in popular elections, and, I am sure, he will sanctify the principle by the prompt dismissal, under his own hand, of the very first officeholder who dares to interfere with the pure and independent exercise of the elective right by the people.

President TYLER, however, is anxious, not only that the overaction of the Executive Department should be restrained, but also that the Legislative branch of the Government should not pass beyond its proper Constitutional limits. He is most sincerely solicitous that the Federal Government, in all its branches, should keep itself strictly within the boundaries prescribed by the Constitution.

He thinks that not only the Executive, but Congress also, has assumed powers which do not belong to it; and he will feel bound to use all the authority, with which he is officially invested, to restrain the over-action of the Legislative Department.

For instance, should a bill, appropriating money from the National Treasury, to make a road, pass Congress, Mr. TYLER will unquestionably veto it.

This question of internal improvements, however, will not, probably, come up for some time. There is no money in the Treasury at present to spend on such objects: and the States which have expended so much from their own treasuries on internal improvements, will not, in the existing state of the public finances, be very urgent for providing other States with roads, canals, &c., &c., &c.

The political speculators may amuse themselves with inquiring how far the ideas of PRESIDENT TYLER about certain Congressional usurpations of power may be satisfactory to certain distinguished public men: they may rest assured of one thing.—He is now where he has ever been. It would be well for a distinguishing political adventurer to keep a good look out on what he has said or written—to have a good memory—lest his insincerity should be discovered. Mr. TYLER needs not this caution. He has always spoken with a straight tongue. He has been honest, open, straightforward, and, by consequence, always consistent.

From our own Correspondent.

THE PRESIDENT AND HIS FAMILY—RECEPTION OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS—ORDER OF BUSINESS AT THE WHITE HOUSE—THE PROSCRIPTIVE CLAMOR—THE SECRETARIES.

WASHINGTON, April 26, 1841.

Several members of President Tyler's family have arrived at the White House—namely, Mr. and Mrs. Jones, of Va., (son-in-law and daughter of the President;) Mr. Robt. Tyler and his lady, (formerly Miss Cooper,) and Miss Tyler. These, with the wife of the President, who is still in Virginia in delicate health, and Mr. John Tyler, Jr. his private Secretary, will compose the domestic circle of the Executive mansion—and a most delightful circle it will be. The President himself is distinguished for his kind and cordial manners. All who have business with him, or who call to pay their respects, are pleased with their reception. Henceforth, there will be, beside, that charm around the White House which the presence of young, beautiful, and accomplished women alone can give.

The foreign Ministers speak in the highest terms of the manner in which they were received by the President when they called in a body to present their respects to him on Saturday. No man, however accustomed to Courts, could have gone through the ceremony with a higher degree of grace and dignity. In conversation, Mr. Tyler is always singularly fluent and animated, and sometimes rises even to eloquence—but in his reply to the address of the Russian Minister, in behalf of the Diplomatic Corps, and in the remarks he made to each member, there was a felicity both of thought and expression, and a general appropriateness, which all observed and which produced the most favorable impression on the representatives of foreign nations and all who were present. It was, indeed, a most interesting scene. Several members of the Cabinet have spoken of the part the President bore in it as a model of the deportment of an American Chief Magistrate.

Mr. Tyler is fortunate in having a most methodical and industrious Private Secretary. Nothing can be more orderly than his arrangement of his father's business, and of the papers which demand his personal attention and consideration. The President himself is a man of well disciplined business habits. He rises with the dawn; and thus has a couple or more hours clear for work before breakfast. His first task is to clear his table—that is, to dispose of all the letters and papers that have been placed there, systematically arranged, by his Secretary the day or evening previous. This prevents a very troublesome kind of business from accumulating. He devotes the time from his rising till ten o'clock, (with a brief interval at eight for breakfast,) to this work. From ten o'clock to twelve he receives the visits of those who wish to see and consult him personally on business. Such persons are admitted singly, so as to allow more freedom to their intercourse. It is expected that at these interviews no one will act so improperly as to engage the President longer than is really necessary to explain his object. From twelve to two is set apart for the reception of those who call merely to pay their respects; and the drawing rooms are generally well filled at these hours. At two o'clock the Cabinet meets, and from the breaking up of the Cabinet to dinner time the President holds himself in reserve for consultation with the heads of department, separately, on official business. The evenings are given up to free and social intercourse with those who happen to drop in. This is a very good and orderly arrangement, and by adhering to it the President is enabled to despatch a great amount of business every day.

The Globe and a few other papers of the same character continue to make an outcry about proscription. But, in truth, as I have before said, their own friends are astounded at the moderation of the Whig Administration. They did not think it conceivable that a triumphant party should be so tolerant after so decisive a victory. The principle, adopted by the President and Cabinet to remove only in cases where proof can be brought of incompetency or dishonesty, or partisan interference, is too strictly adhered to, for many good Whigs themselves. There is no doubt that there are many in office here who would deservedly come within this rule, however rigidly construed. But then, who is to turn informer? It is truly honorable to the Whigs of this District that with the temptation of lucrative posts before their eyes, they refrain from taking the odious character of informers. And yet how can the Secretaries, new in their places, as they are, be expected to know thus early who are obnoxious to the charge of partisan interference? In due time the evidence, doubtless, will be presented in a tangible shape, and the delinquents will then be removed. Thus far the removals have been few in number; and some of the more impatient of the followers of the Whig camp think that they have reason to complain that their adversaries should be suffered to remain so long in the offices they have abused.

Whoever imagines that the Secretaries have easy berths just now would find himself greatly mistaken, could he contemplate the reality. Go, for example, into the War Department. You will find the Secretary there busily engaged from an early hour in the morning till late at night. During a great part of the day his room is a sort of Chancery Court, and he the judge called to decide upon a succession of old, intricate cases of claims which have been brought up to him on appeal from the Accounting Officers—many of them involving thousands and thousands of dollars. He has to weigh the evidence, and give a conscientious and deliberate judgment. Then come the ordinary business of the Department—the incessant demands on his time by visitors—the appointments and transfers—besides Cabinet consultations, &c. &c. Be assured his is no bed of roses. This is but a sample. The other heads of Departments are no better off.

SPRING IN WASHINGTON—MIDSHIPMEN AND CADETS—UNGENEROUS CONDUCT OF TWO EX-SECRETARIES—ARMY AND NAVY—FOREIGN DESPATCHES—ON DITS.

WASHINGTON, April 27, 1841.

After a long season of extraordinarily disagreeable weather, spring has at last burst upon us suddenly; and we have had two days of bright skies and genial atmosphere—though it did rain, as usual, at night! In these two days, however, the gardens, of which almost every tolerable house in Washington has one of some sort, have put forth their bloom and beauty wonderfully; and all around is the promise of a better time to come. The grounds around the Capitol are in admirable order—the grass fresh and luxuriant—and the parterres in the lawns and the beds along the smooth walks are blooming with hyacinths, and tulips, and a variety of early flowers. It is delightful, after having been pent up so long within brick walls, to get even this taste of the country: for where you have lawns, and grass-plots, and beds of flowers, and sparkling fountains, and blooming trees, with the music and flight of birds, you fancy other "rural sights and sounds" enough, and dream you are afar from the smoky and dusty city. The grounds about the President's House and the Capitol are delightful places of resort; and in the spring and summer are always filled with promenaders during the afternoon and evening. You must pardon this talk about the weather, from the novelty of the subject here!

The Secretary of State, like a man of sense and taste, has fled on the first opening of spring from the dusty Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol Hill, where the windows of his study and of his drawing-rooms look out on the fine eastern gardens of the Capitol, whose early fragrance he may inhale. The other Secretaries live at the west, or court end of the city, in the neighborhood of the White House.

Much complaint is made, and with good reason, of the conduct of Mr. Paulding, late Secretary of the Navy, and of Mr. Poinsett, late Secretary of War, toward the close of Mr. Van Buren's administration. These gentlemen evidently took the determination to leave to their successors no chance of making any Midshipmen's or Cadets' appointments for a long time.

From the first to the fourth of March, it is understood, that Secretary Paulding issued between thirty and forty letters of appointment to Midshipmen—not only filling up all allowed by law, but even lapping over as if to prevent his successor from making any appointments in case a vacancy should occur, by having a nominee of his own ready to step into such vacancy. This is too bad; and the present Secretary might be justified in revoking these letters of appointment, and in refusing to issue the warrants. But such a course would inflict injury upon the young men appointed, who certainly are not to blame, and would be mortifying to their families and friends. The forbearance of Mr. Secretary Badger in this respect presents him in strong contrast to Mr. Ex-Secretary Paulding.

Mr. Ex-Secretary Poinsett is chargeable with similar conduct. He has filled up and lapped over all the appointments to the Military Academy, so that it is difficult to say when there will be room for a single new cadet. This surely was a small business for gentlemen to engage in, during the expiring hours of their official authority. Many meritorious young men, who applied in vain under the Van Buren Administration for commissions or appointments, (being refused on account of the politics of their friends or families,) and who hoped for success after a change of rulers, find their aspirations repressed by this conduct of the ex-Secretary. Some of them have peculiar claims to the notice and assistance of the Government. In some cases the appointments are the only stay and support of widowed mothers—the sons of deceased officers—of men who have suffered, and died in the service of their country. Their hopes of advancement are cut off, and the places they ought to fill are given to the pets and proteges of partisans.

Let us indulge the hope that under the new Administration these matters hereafter will be better ordered. The military and the naval service are both dear to all true Americans. Over the departments of the war and navy two gentlemen now preside who have the entire confidence of the officers in both branches of the service; and the country will not be disappointed in the expectations of increased vigor to be given to these two arms of our defence.

Despatches have been received at the Department of State from the United States Minister in London, and from two or three ports of the Continent—brought by the Great Western: but the purport of them has not transpired.

ON DITS.

Col. Charles S. Todd will not be Minister to Austria after all—Mr. Hone will have the New-York Post Office, after all.

STEAMBOAT DISASTER.—The Albany Argus (extra) issued last Sunday afternoon conveys the distressing intelligence that on Saturday evening, as the steamboat South America, Capt. Brainard, was on her passage up the river, an accident occurred which reduced the machinery of the boat nearly to a wreck, and severely injured several of the passengers. The following particulars may be relied upon:

When about two miles above Poughkeepsie, at about half-past twelve, the boat being under her usual steam and full headway, the shaft broke, and the connecting machinery giving way, the piston was forced through the cylinder, both in its downward and upward motion, scattering the fragments of machinery in different directions and with great force, and discharging the steam into the gangways and cabins. All was confusion for the moment. Passengers jumping from the berth, or not thinking to envelope themselves in the bedclothes, (which some had the presence of mind to do,) encountered the vapor, and were, in the instances we give below, scalded more or less severely; though we are happy to state that the probability is that all, with perhaps one exception, will survive. Owing to the promptitude and energy of Captain Brainard and the officers and crew of the boat, the sufferers and the other passengers were relieved from immediate danger; and the steamboat Diamond which opportunely came up soon after the occurrence, went at once to their relief. The passengers, including those who were disabled, were immediately taken on board the Diamond, where every attention was afforded them, and every thing done by Capt. Flower, his passengers, officers and crew, to alleviate their sufferings. They reached this city between 9 and 10, A. M.; and the wounded were immediately taken ashore for medical treatment.

Some idea of the force with which parts of the machinery were thrown upward, will be understood by the circumstance, that a fragment of the shackle-bar, falling perhaps fifty feet from its place, passed through the deck of the state-rooms, through the second deck, and striking a colored man belonging on the boat, severely wounded him in the head.

The South America is a new and splendid boat; having made only three or four passages. Her machinery is said to be literally a wreck, and the amount of damage from $10,000 to $20,000.

By this accident, but one person was killed—Mr. John Garwin of Troy—and about a dozen others more or less injured, but none of them dangerously.

At a meeting of the passengers of the steamboat South America and Diamond, on the morning of April 25th, resolutions were adopted expressive of the presence of mind, energy and attention evinced by Capt. Brainard, to whom they tendered their grateful acknowledgments.

Hitherto the North River steamboats have been almost entirely exempt from disaster; because they are well built and carefully managed. We trust that the public confidence in these boats, so justly reposed and so long continued, will not be materially affected by this exception to the general rule furnished in the case of the SOUTH AMERICA.

ANOTHER STEAM-BOAT EXPLOSION.—The work of destruction, which for so many years has been principally confined to the Western rivers of our country, has at last commenced in our own waters, and Heaven knows where it is to end!

The steam-boat Henry Eckford, a little after 6 o'clock Tuesday evening, while lying at the foot of Cedar street, N. River, and just as she was about to leave the dock, burst her boiler. The explosion was very violent, tearing the engine and the boat almost to pieces, and killing or wounding about half the people on board. It was fortunate that the number on board was small—something less than a dozen: for the character of the explosion was such that if a load of passengers had been in the boat and in their usual place (the quarter-deck) they would all have been killed.

The accounts go to show that the Henry Eckford is a very old boat, and has been used of late only for towing, &c., &c. And probably any statement of particulars that may be given by the owners or hands will conclude with the consoling intelligence that "no blame whatever can be attached to any one on board."

The circumstances of the explosion on board of this boat were on Wednesday submitted to a coroner's jury, who, after a deliberate investigation, found that whatever there is of blame attaches to the United States inspectors. Such a verdict as this is scarcely satisfactory, because it is not generally received by the public as demonstrative evidence, nor does any penalty follow it. In our opinion, the public good requires that the guilty individual, in such cases, should be detected, exposed, and punished.

ARRIVAL OF MR. JARED SPARKS.—Among the passengers in the steamship Columbia, recently arrived in Boston, was our countryman, Mr. Sparks, the principal object of whose voyage to Europe was to procure original materials, relative to the history of America. We understand, says the Boston Daily Advertiser, that his success has more than answered his expectations. He has been absent nearly ten months, and during that time he has been constantly employed in making researches in the public offices and libraries of England and France. By the courtesy of the governments of both those countries Mr. S. has been allowed freely to examine the manuscripts in the different departments, which relate to the history of America, and to have copies taken of all such papers as were deemed by him important in their historical character. His inquiries have been principally devoted to the period of the revolution; but he has likewise taken much pains to ascertain the original sources of American history previously to that period. We are glad to learn that these are numerous, and well preserved. From the public archives, as well as from the British Museum, and the Royal Library in Paris, he has procured copies of some curious and highly interesting manuscripts relative to the first settlements of this country. On a former occasion Mr. S. was engaged abroad more than a year in the same pursuits. The results have been seen in the works which he has since published.

RHODE ISLAND.—The election in Rhode Island took place on the 21st ult., and the result has been decidedly in favor of the Whigs. Governor King, and Messrs. Tillinghast and Cranston are re-elected almost without opposition. The Providence Journal gives the result in 25 of the 31 towns in the State as follows: vote for Governor King 2252—for all other candidates 62. Votes for Mr. Tillinghast 2165, for Mr. Cranston 2242; scattering 215. All the towns are heard from except Warwick, Coventry, West Greenwich, Jamestown, Little Compton and New Shoreham. There was a small vote from the double cause of want of opposition, and a very stormy day.

33. A very destructive fire occurred at Williamsport, Pa., on Saturday night of last week, by which property to the amount of $30,000 was consumed. The buildings burned down were the spacious brick hotel of Mr. Hall, and the stables attached to it, together with three valuable horses, the store of Jacob Grafius & Son adjoining, and the house of Mr. Joseph Grafius. Several other buildings were torn down to arrest the progress of the flames. The fire is believed to have been the work of incendiaries.

CRIMINAL CODE OF ALABAMA.—The criminal laws of Alabama were revised at the late session of the Legislature of that State. Of the new statutes, the Louisville Advertiser gives a summary, from which it appears that they make but one kind of crime punishable by death, while forty-two kinds are held punishable by confinement in the Penitentiary, from periods varying from two up to fifty years. Murder in the first degree, is the crime which the law makes punishable by death, but even this the Court can at its option punish by sentence of imprisonment in the Penitentiary for life. Death in a duel, is held to be murder in the second degree, and made punishable by confinement in the Penitentiary for a period of ten years. To give, accept, or carry a challenge, disqualifies for holding office in the State, and is further punishable by confinement in the Penitentiary for two years. Rape is punishable by confinement there for life; bribery of executive, legislative, ministerial or judicial officers, from two to seven years; steamboat racing, by which life is endangered, for two years; and loss of life, or injury to the person by negligence or want of skill in officers of boats, from two to ten years.

ARRIVAL OUT OF THE SULTANEE.—By the Brenda, at Salem, from Bombay and Zanzibar, advices have been received of the arrival out of the Muscat ship Sultanee, on the 7th of December last, after a passage of 120 days from New York and 29 from the Cape of Good Hope. Captain Drinker, who went out as navigator, returned in the Brenda. Capt. D. had strong inducements held out to him by the Sultan, to remain in his service, such as the command of the best frigate in his navy, with the prospect of a voyage to New York within a year, &c., but he declined. The Sultan also endeavored to retain by tempting offers the four American seamen who went out with Capt. Drinker; but one, however, accepted his proposals. His navy is composed of many fine ships, all built at Bombay, of teak wood, but they are entirely neglected and suffered to go to pieces. The inhabitants are described as a very filthy, half-naked, slavish race, and the town a collection of hovels scarcely fit for dog kennels.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—A sailor named Frederick Dunsom, attempted to hang himself on the 20th ult. in Westerly, R. I. He ascended a button-wood tree, and fixing a rope around his neck, fastened it to a branch, and swung off. A number of persons were standing near, who supposed that he was climbing the tree for diversion. The rope was immediately cut, with considerable difficulty, and he fell to the ground, a distance of seventeen feet. He was considerably injured by the fall. He stated that he had previously taken a very large dose of arsenic. Intemperance was the cause of the act.

MATRIMONY.—In the Vice-Chancellor's Court, Monday, there were no less than seven cases of application for divorce decided on. In five of the cases the application was from the wives, and the two others were from the husbands. Of these seven applications three were successful, and the other four were referred back to the Masters in Chancery, by whom they were introduced: the reference being made with a view to allow the complaining party to amend the proofs, by beginning over again. These facts do not look very encouraging to those who seek matrimonial alliances.

ANOTHER REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOT GONE!—Died, in this town, on the 16th inst., Capt. Jonathan Rogers, aged 85 years. Capt. Rogers, when a youth, volunteered in the service of his country, and was for a long time in the regular service, both in the Army and Navy. At the termination of the war, then an inhabitant of one of the New-England States, he shouldered his axe, and penetrated the forest in pursuit of his fortune. He finally reached this place, and pitched his tent on the ground where this village now stands, which was then an unbroken wilderness, and by a life of industry and economy, succeeded in obtaining the object of his pursuit. He was much beloved by his acquaintances and friends, and was an exemplary member of the Presbyterian Church, of which he had long been a worthy communicant.—[Northern Journal.]

MORE INDIAN TROUBLES.—Advices from Wisconsin, under date of April 10, are that large bodies of Sioux were gathering in the neighborhood of Fort Snelling, with the design, as was supposed, of making an attack upon it. One of the tribe, it seems being drunk and disorderly within the limits of the garrison, and resisting an attempt to remove him, was shot down; hence the hostile aspect of the tribe. Two companies from Forts Winnebago and Crawford, has been ordered to Fort Snelling.

THE CANALS.—We are requested to state, says the Albany Evening Journal, that owing to the recent heavy fall of rain, the frost not being out of the ground, large quantities of sand have been washed into the canal, above the lower aqueduct over the Mohawk River, which will render it impracticable to have the canal ready for navigation before Monday the 26th inst.

SHORE OF LAKE ERIE.—The Cleveland Herald of the 17th states that another piece of land, east of Erie street, has taken a slide into the lake. Five or six slides of a similar kind, we believe, have occurred there within two or three years, some of which have encroached considerably upon the front part of the town plat.

DEATH OF A MEMBER OF THE LEGISLATURE.—The Hon. NATHAN HEATON, a Member of the Assembly, died at his residence in Cortland co., on Monday of last week.

—TERRIBLE.—We learn from a credible source, this morning, that a terrible tragedy of blood occurred last Wednesday in Summer, Oxford County, where Mr. Moses Butterfield, hitherto a highly respectable citizen of that town, murdered his wife and two youngest children, while two others only saved themselves by flight.

Mr. B. had previously, we are told, had fits of insanity, and this last fatal attack took the form, it is said, of religious phrenzy, and his alleged reason for murdering his family was to save them from eternal ruin at the approaching end of the world!

He has been committed to jail in Paris.—[East Argus.]

A KNOWING DOG.—A gentleman owns a spaniel dog, which, owing to his daily official avocations, he cannot take out for a run, except for a Sunday after morning church service. Dash never ventures to show his black nose in the drawing-room during the week, but, as sure as Sunday comes upstairs he trots, between one and two o'clock, wagging his tail, and saying as plain as he can "well, here I am, ready for a walk."—[A fact.]

STATE PRISON STATISTICS.—Mr. A. M. C. Smith, Deputy Sheriff, who conducts the prisoners from this city to Sing Sing prison, informs us that 15 prisoners have been discharged the present month by expiration of sentence. On the 21st instant there remained in prison 861 prisoners, of whom 789 were males and 72 females. The four prisoners, viz: Provost, Bowne, Green and Moore, who were taken up to the prison by Mr. Smith, the Deputy Sheriff, had served 48 years aggregate in that prison; and, as they are sentenced for 34 years more, if they serve out that period, they will have served 82 years in that prison, or average 20½ years each.—[Tribune.]

Michigan Execution Law.—A law concerning sales on Execution has been enacted by the Legislature of Michigan during the present session, and is now in force. It requires an appraisement by three disinterested persons, and prohibits a sale of either real or personal property unless it will bring two-thirds of its affixed cash value.

VIRGINIA ELECTION.—About two-thirds of the State heard from. We have only room for general results this week. There is a Whig gain of three Members of Congress—Barton in place of Lucas, Summers in place of Beirne, and Stuart in place of Craig. On the other hand, the Whigs lose John Hill, who is succeeded by Hubbard, by 12 votes.

The Whigs have elected their old Senators—three—and have pretty certainly gained Tunstall in place of Dyer from Pittsylvania, &c. and possibly another in the West.

In 77 counties the Whigs have elected 53 members of Assembly and the Opposition 45—being an Opposition gain of 4 members.

AWFUL OCCURRENCE.—A few nights since, twelve negroes, belonging to the Rev. Wesley Adams, of Jefferson county, Florida, were burnt to death. They were all in one building and it is supposed were suffocated, and rendered insensible, as they gave no alarm, and when the doors were opened uttered not a groan. The building was entirely destroyed.

CANADIAN ELECTIONS.—The elections for Members of the Provincial House of Assembly have resulted in the choice of thirty-six Tories, who will support the government in all its leading measures—eight Conservatives, who will give the Executive a partial support, and forty Anti-Unionists, or Liberals. Nine seats will be contested—viz: Beauharnois, Three Rivers, Vaudeuil, Rouville, York 2d Riding, St. Maurice, Lenox, Addington, Montreal County and Chambly. The members returned for these places are chiefly supporters of the Government. The unsuccessful members retired from the contest on account of violence at the polls.

33. THE COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, of Tuesday evening, published a letter, dated Montreal, April 21, by which it appears that the forger, Mitchell, is now in that city.

He arrived on the 9th inst. bearing the name of Goodwin, and passes his time in gambling and at houses of ill-fame. He was arrested a few days since and taken before the police, but succeeded by feeing lawyers in getting clear. His trunk, however, was searched, and about $4000 was found in it, mostly notes of the Girard Bank. He is spending it very freely. A stranger called at my office this morning with $150, which he had received from Goodwin, who he said had lost it in gambling.

It struck me that this Goodwin might be Mitchell, and I said so to the stranger, who told me that he had been introduced to Mitchell in New-York about three years ago, and had afterwards seen him at Buffalo, and had no doubt that this Goodwin was the same man. When he first met him in Montreal he told him that he thought he had seen him before, but Goodwin (or Mitchell) denied all acquaintance with him. When I mentioned Mitchell's name my informant distinctly recollected that this was the same person. I learn, moreover, that he told his lawyer he was a member of Congress, and at the police office confessed that his name was Mitchell.

I have spent the whole day in trying to have him arrested, but without success. Our authorities say "The United States refuse to give up persons who have committed the most heinous crimes in this country, (alluding to Holmes the murderer,) and why should we trouble ourselves about this man? He is spending his money very freely, which will do us some good."

The money that he obtained by his forgeries might be recovered from him by proving the debt. He might be arrested on a civil process, if authority were given some one here to proceed against him.

33. The following is from a Texas paper—but, as the Almanacs say, it will do very well for this meridian:

"The government will want, about the first Monday in October next, some fifty-four members to supply the two Houses of Congress. Let as few of them be lawyers as possible, for the reason that they are addicted to talking, and their long speeches are too expensive."

33. The Legislature of Illinois adjourned without providing for any Special Election in case of an Extra Session of Congress; consequently that State will go unrepresented in the Extra Session.

33. The U. S. frigate Macedonian, Com. Wilkinson, arrived at Pensacola on the 7th ult. The sloop of war Levant, Commander Fitzhugh, arrived there on the 10th inst.

CANAL NAVIGATION.—The canal is probably navigable throughout its whole line. The water was let in at Buffalo and Rochester on Saturday. In Rochester there was a small break which was soon repaired.

33. Cape of Good Hope papers of the 17th of January, announce the destruction by fire, of the brig Australia, from Dundee, about 600 miles to the westward of the Cape. The Captain and crew escaped in the boats.

"DON'T BLOW ME."—A certain well-known and highly respectable physician of this city, who is scarcely less distinguished for his humor than for his medical skill, and who is in the habit of calling any male acquaintance Doctor, finds very few opportunities of going to church. Indeed, he is seldom seen within the walls of a sacred edifice. One Sunday, however, the Esculapian made his appearance. We encountered him as he was walking along the aisle; and, on getting within speaking distance, he put his hand on the side of his mouth, nodded, and said in a very mysterious whisper, "Don't blow me, doctor, don't blow me!"

33. The New London Gazette advertises that there are in that city not less than three hundred unmarried ladies, between the ages of sixteen and thirty years, handsome, well educated, and accomplished. All bachelors who possess the proper qualifications to make good husbands, and discrimination justly to appreciate beauty to combine with all the virtues which adorn the mind and render life pleasant, and society agreeable, are invited to visit New-London, and "pop the question." "Is nobody coming to marry me, is nobody coming to woo?"

THE PRESIDENT STEAMER.—Before the sailing of the President, 25 per cent. insurance had been paid. This was on the 7th of April; and 30 per cent. was asked. The original insurance was five per cent.

There is great anxiety respecting the fate of this vessel, and may be floundering about in the ocean, exhausted of coal. There was about 35 passengers on board.

METHODISTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.—A late English paper says that the Wesleyan Methodists have no less than 160 foreign missionary stations, they employ 220 missionaries, and in the schools under the supervision of those missionaries there are the amazing number of 40,000 children. The contributions to the missionary funds within the last year were nearly £90,000.

The receipts at Fanny Ellsler's benefit in New-Orleans were $6000. The net profit of her engagement was $20,000. On the night of her benefit, a wreath, containing a pair of bracelets set in diamonds, and other valuable jewels valued at $1500 was thrown upon the stage. There are a great many very foolish people in New Orleans.—[Concord Republican.]

33. The three boys accused of the murder of the lad Phelps in Brooklyn last summer, have been arraigned before the King's County Oyer and Terminer. They pleaded not guilty. Their trial will not come on at this term.

33. "You charge me fifty sequins," said a Venetian nobleman to a sculptor, "for a bust that only cost you ten day's labor." "You forget," replied the artist, "that I had been thirty years learning to make that bust in ten days."

33. Alexander Troy, Esq., late Solicitor for the Fifth Judicial District in North Carolina, died on the 20th ult.

FROM WASHINGTON.—President Tyler received the Diplomatic Body on Saturday last at 2 o'clock at the President's Mansion. The British Minister, Mr. Fox, being kept away by indisposition, M. Bodisco, the Russian Minister, appeared at the head of the Corps. We give the Address with the Reply. The Intelligencer says that nothing could be more appropriate or in better taste than the President's remarks to the several members of the Body as they were successively presented.

M. BODISCO'S ADDRESS.

MR. PRESIDENT: The United States having been suddenly deprived of its supreme head, the Constitution has invested you with the Chief Magistracy of the Union.

The Diplomatic Corps has the honor to appear before you, Mr. President, for the purpose of expressing through me, its organ, its concern in the melancholy event which has so unexpectedly removed General HARRISON from the hopes of the American People. The Diplomatic Corps hastens also to offer up its vows, Mr. President, that your Administration may be distinguished by the maintenance of all the existing friendly relations, and by a constant increase in the prosperity of the United States.

The Diplomatic Corps embraces this opportunity, Mr. President, to assure you of its earnest desire to merit your confidence and esteem.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY.

Mr. Minister: In my character of Chief Magistrate of the United States, and in the name of the People thereof, I have to return to the Diplomatic Corps, whom you on this occasion represent, my acknowledgements for their expression of condolence on account of the bereavement which this country has so recently sustained in the death of its late lamented and illustrious President. I take occasion, at the same time, to give the assurance that my most earnest desire, as his constitutional successor, will be to maintain and cherish the friendly relations which now so happily subsist between our respective countries.

The People of the United States regard their own prosperity as intimately connected with that of the entire family of nations, and the cultivation of the feelings of mutual amity as the best mode of advancing that important end.

I sincerely desire that the residence of the Diplomatic Corps near this Government may prove every way agreeable to them—to accomplish which, nothing shall be wanting on my own part.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The Publisher of the THE NEW WORLD announces that he has made an arrangement with the Publisher of the Boston NOTION, by which, all those who wish to subscribe for the Boston NOTION and The New World together, can have both Journals for one year on paying or remitting, postage-free, $5 in advance. As the two papers do not publish the same stories in continuation, and, as they will endeavor to avoid issuing the same matter, it is thought that this arrangement will be acceptable to those who would like to take in two periodicals whose ample dimensions enable them to contain all the good floating popular literature of the day.

The New World is now publishing Samuel Warren's (author of Passages from the Diary of a late Physician) magnificent story, TEN THOUSAND A-YEAR; Charles Dickens's (Boz) BARNABY RUDGE; W. Harrison Ainsworth's GUY RAVEN; and Henry Cockton's STANLEY THORN.

The Boston Notion is publishing Captain Marryat's new novel THE POACHER; W. H. Ainsworth's OLD ST. PAUL; and Henry Cockton's GEORGE ST. GEORGE JULIAN.

Besides these SEVEN Novels, to be obtained at the small rate of $5 per annum, the Boston Notion and the New World publish a vast number of selected and original articles from the pens of the first authors in the literary world, as well as a much greater quantity of editorial matter than is usually contained in weekly papers; all valuable public Documents—proceedings of Congress and the State Legislatures, and copious compends of intelligence from the four quarters of the globe.

Remittances to be made in current bills to GEORGE ROBERTS, State at: est, Boston—or to J. WINCHESTER, 30 Ann street, New-York.

THE NEW WORLD

AND SEARS'S PICTORIAL

BIBLE

A SPLENDID OFFER.

In looking about for something of suitable character and of eminent value, which we could with satisfaction to ourselves and them, offer as a PRESENT to the subscribers of the NEW WORLD, we have found nothing in point of attraction and popularity, equal to

SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE,

a work embellished with TWO HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS of Scriptural scenes and views in the Holy Land, recommended by the press, and also by the most pious and intelligent clergymen in the country—and which, as has been justly remarked, should be possessed by every family in the United States; and, indeed, ought every where to be the companion of the sacred volume.

We therefore respectfully ask every lady and gentleman under whose observation this paper may come, to reflect on the following

PROPOSITIONS:

To gratify the wish which has generally been inspired to possess a copy of SEARS'S CELEBRATED PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BIBLE, the Publisher has concluded to purchase a sufficient number of copies to supply, gratis, all those new subscribers to the NEW WORLD, who will forward to him—in current bills, postage free—two full years' subscription in advance, (viz. $6.) The price of this beautiful volume is two dollars per copy; so that, by this arrangement, the NEW WORLD is actually afforded at $4 for two years.

Further—it will be given to every present subscriber who shall pay for two years as above, on the renewal of his subscription—or who may obtain two new subscribers, and remit the money therefor. To this latter proposition particular attention is asked. Each and every one of our present subscribers may easily, if he kindly resolves to make a little exertion, procure us from the circle of his friends and acquaintances two new subscribers. To each one doing this shall be presented a copy of the PICTORIAL BIBLE.

LASTLY—Clubs of ten persons associating together, and remitting FIFTY DOLLARS, shall receive the NEW WORLD two years each, and each also a copy of the Pictorial Bible. What more splendid or more liberal offer can be made than this, in presenting, for so trifling a sum as $5, one of the most charming volumes ever published, and a paper which will give you during two years, new and rare works, choice literature, and popular discourses by eminent divines, which could not be purchased in any other form for ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS.

In every case New-York or Eastern money must be remitted, or the discount allowed; and all letters must be post-paid or free. To prevent misunderstanding, it must be distinctly understood that the whole subscription must be received without deduction for commissions. Every postmaster or agent will be entitled to a copy for each subscription for two years, or for two subscriptions one year, provided the full amount of six dollars is remitted.

All persons in the United States or the British Provinces, are invited to avail themselves of these propositions, to obtain a copy of the Pictorial Illustrations.

Each copy of the Bible so presented will have the name of the subscriber written in a blank leaf; and it will be held subject to his order, and will be forwarded in any way he may choose to point out. The copies will be elegantly bound, and lettered in gold.

Subjoined are a sufficient number of testimonials to the character of this invaluable work:

From the N. Y. Christian Advocate and Journal (Methodist). It gives us pleasure to recommend a work of this character to our Christian brethren of all classes, and particularly youth. It contains upward of two hundred engravings, illustrative of manners and customs, incidents, landscape scenery, and natural history, referred to in the Holy Scriptures, and is entirely free from sectarianism, which but too frequently forms a part of works of a religious nature. The engravings are well explained by letter-press descriptions, occupying about two hundred pages; and which, in matter and manner, are well calculated to give the reader a desire to go farther, and "search the Scriptures." Any book that may be instrumental in leading men to the great Fountain of Truth, should receive the warm approval of sincere Christians; and it is our candid opinion that the volume in question is eminently calculated to do so. The price of the book, handsomely bound in muftin and gilt, is only Two Dollars. It is a valuable holiday present for a Christian father to make to his family.

From the New York Evangelist.

This work is especially adapted for, and is calculated to interest, all persons in the Sacred Scriptures. The number of engravings is two hundred. The volume is handsomely published, on good paper, and with beautiful binding. The illustrations are accompanied with descriptions of the places, customs, and curiosities noticed. The ruins of Oriental cities; the domestic manners of the Jews, Egyptians, Arabians, and other nations referred to in the Bible; the arts and inventions of writing, dress, &c., prevailing in the East—these and similar representations fill up the generous number of two hundred.

From the Rev. Charles G. Sommers, A. E., Pastor of the South Baptist Church, New-York.

Mr. Robert Sears: Dear Sir—I have carefully examined the elegant copy of the "Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible," which you sent me; and for which receive my thanks. I regard it as a valuable addition to my library. As a work explanatory of ancient and modern Oriental customs, it comprises an ordinary amount of entertaining, useful, and religious information, which could not, without great labor, be obtained from other sources. It is due to your good taste, enterprise, and great industry and care, as the compiler, to express my opinion, that your book, as to its general excellencies, stands unrivalled by any similar volume ever issued from the press in this country. Its typography is beautiful, the paper and binding are in perfect keeping, and the very low price of two dollars for a book of 200 pages, adorned with 200 superior American engravings, cannot fail to commend it to general patronage, and will eventually introduce it into intelligent and pious families throughout the United States.

Yours truly,

CHARLES G. SOMMERS.

From Rev. J. O. Choules, author of the History of Missions, &c. Mr. Robert Sears: Dear Sir—I have examined your "Two Hundred Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible," and regard the publication of the work as calculated to be very useful. I entertain no doubt of its obtaining an extensive circulation, especially in our Western country, where few persons have access to the sources from which the work has been compiled. I can easily imagine the welcome that your book will receive from our inquisitive youth, and cordially recommend the volume as a substitute for the ordinary trashy volumes which are given as annual presents.

I am, sir, yours, very truly,

JNO. O. CHOULES.

This offer will remain open for all who choose to avail themselves of the same, until the first day of September next, with the exception that every present subscriber may obtain a copy after that date who renews his subscription for two years.

ERRATA.—In a part of our edition last week, the 266th and 267th pages were transposed in 'making up.'

IMPORTANT TO SUBSCRIBERS AND THE PUBLIC.

Those who may subscribe in accordance with the above offer, are informed that we can supply only 100 sets of the quarto from the commencement of the volume, Jan. 2, being all that remains of a surplus edition of over 3000 copies. From the commencement of the story of BARNABY RUDGE, March 20, we have 500 sets of back Nos. out of 1500 kept back at that time. New subscribers are coming in at the rate of 250 to 300 per week, and those, therefore, who take advantage of our splendid offer must write immediately, if they want the back numbers.

A large number of subscriptions will expire with quarto whole No. 52, June 1st, and notice is hereby given to such to renew them before that time, as all papers are discontinued unless a new remittance is made. For $6 current money the New World will be sent two years, and a copy of SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE will be given.

THE RIGHTS OF WOMAN.

AN ESSAY,

READ BEFORE THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE OF THE CITY OF NEW-YORK.

BY E. P. HURLBUT.

THE present discourse will be devoted to the consideration of the Rights of Woman—the rights of one half of the human race, and which I do not propose to treat as the "better half," but rather as the equal half of mankind. I shall not mock woman with fulsome adulation, lest I should offend her pride—nor yet withhold from her appropriate praise, lest I should offend her sense of justice. Man surely concedes not too much when he admits her to be his equal; and her ambition may well be satisfied, without aspiring to be his superior. Woman is deprived of her natural dignity, when she is depressed below the condition of man; and she may be treated as an usurper when she aspires to exercise dominion over him.

Man was not "born to command," nor woman "to obey." They are not wedded to each other by human laws, nor by the church, but by the law of their natures, whose ministers are the common sentiments and affections of their minds—and which consecrate their union, demand its sacred inviolability, and admonish them perpetually to love, honor and cherish each other so long as they both shall live. By these neither is commanded to obey the other, but only the Creator's laws.

But woman is to be regarded not only as the companion and equal of man, but as the same intellectual being as himself, possessed of the same sentiments and affections—the same emotions and wants, and consequently of the same natural rights.

One need but hint to "ears polite" that woman is powerful in intellect, noble in sentiment, and that she aspires to the perfection of her being, by all the means allotted by the Creator for the attainment of true excellence and happiness—and all this and much more will be conceded before it is half expressed. I shall take this concession from the cultivated and polite, and treat it as though it were made in good faith. It ought not to be regarded as "small talk," nor construed tenderly, as though made "to please the ladies;" since, if we set about it earnestly, we can prove that this concession, although made in the spirit of gallantry, might well have been dictated by a sense of justice.

Inquire of the physiologist whether woman hath the same cerebral organization as man; and he will answer that her brain and nervous system are the same in structure, and execute the same functions.

Inquire of the phrenologist, and you will be informed that as in man, so in woman, by means of the brain, all mental powers are manifested; that these powers have their respective seats in distinct parts of the brain; and that not one of them which is found in man is wanting in woman; that these powers, whether of sentiment, intellect or passion, vary infinitely in the different individuals of the human race, whether male or female—but that they are common to man and woman, who have therefore one common nature.

Consult the writers upon natural law as to the derivation of human rights, and the most approved of these will state that they emanate from the natural wants and emotions of mankind, as I have attempted to show in the preceding discourses.

What, then, let me inquire, necessarily follows from these premises? Nothing less than this, That the rights of man and the rights of woman are precisely one and the same: the "lord of creation" is just as well off as the lady of creation, and not one whit better.

You have now the concession of gallantry, the testimony of the physiologist, the demonstration of the phrenologist, and the authority of writers upon the natural law, all establishing the rights of woman upon the same foundation as the rights of man. You present these to the British or American magistrate, and demand that the same legal protection shall be afforded to one as the other—nay, that the laws shall not be made for man or woman—but for man kind; that all rights are human rights, and pertain to human beings, without distinction of sex; and he will be filled with surprise, if not with horror. What then is the difficulty? Nothing less than this, That the laws of England and America, touching the Rights of Woman, are at variance with the laws of the Creator; and the question is, Which shall stand?

It would be going too far to say that the laws of these countries do not recognize the rights of woman at all; for they do acknowledge and protect the rights of a single woman or "spinster," as these laws politely term her. But marriage forms an astonishing legal era with this same "spinster;" she becomes most emphatically a new creature after this event—a being of the law's own creation—a monster, (pardon the word,) whose nature disowns—a monstrous being, breathing a legal, not a moral atmosphere.

She is courted and wedded as "an angel," and yet is denied the dignity of a rational, moral being ever after. I am aware that this is bold language; but I propose to demonstrate its truth and justice.

We have before seen that marriage is a natural institution, proceeding necessarily from the organization and condition of the sexes; and that the law of their natures demands an union for life. This union is necessary to their happiness, and as it is dictated by the desires and sentiments of their common nature, to live in the married state is a sacred right. In a former discourse, I showed that man was ordained by his mental constitution to live in human society—and this being so, he must enter the social state without surrendering any of his rights, since the designs of nature all harmonize with each other. The foundation was thus laid for asserting that woman by entering the married state, doth not properly surrender any right whatever.

My argument is this, That woman's mental forces and wants are designed to have a free and harmonious exercise and gratification—and while single her rights to this extent are conceded to her—that marriage results from her mental constitution, and is necessary to her happiness, so that she has a right to live in the married state; having such right she can demand its enjoyment, without the surrender of any other right incident to her nature—since no one proper natural want is to be answered at the expense of another's denial; and as woman no more requires the married state for her happiness than she demands that full scope and exercise be given to the various powers of her nature, it cannot be claimed that she must surrender any of her natural rights upon entering into the married state.

She follows not less than man the great law of her nature when she "pursues her own true and substantial happiness." By the laws of her organization she has the same faculties and wants as man, and they demand the same exercise and gratification. Her rights have therefore the same origin and extent as his own. Now I suppose I have established, in my introductory discourse, that man surrenders not a solitary natural right, when, by yielding to the harmonious demand of all his intellectual forces, he enters the social state, and acquiesces in the proper institutions of government. Why then should woman, by yielding to a like general demand of her nature, and entering the married state, be required to surrender any of her natural rights? Let it be borne in mind that the state of marriage is not more demanded by woman's nature than by man's. It is as necessary to his happiness as to her own. He is in an unnatural condition out of wedlock. In both it is the voice of nature that pronounces them to be "husband and wife." He surrenders not a single right when summoned by this voice to the altar of Hymen—but walks erect in all the dignity of his nature, the stern and immutable man; taketh the vow, and goeth forth undivested of any of the rights of humanity. While she, who went forth in pride returns in humility. She who was wooed by the bended knee of suppliant man, hath promised to obey that man, now proudly claiming to be her lord. She who went forth an intelligent moral being, obedient only to the will of Heaven, returns the creature of man's will—having transferred her allegiance to him.

She was before his equal—she is now his inferior. She existed before as a distinct moral being, full of rights and bounden by duties; that existence is now merged in her husband—and in the eye of the law she exists not at all. But from her legal tomb he gains an accession of power, dignity and rights. Her submission exalts the throne of his power: her legal insignificance elevates his dignity, and her lost rights are appropriated to himself. The law allows him to exact her obedience, and to compel it by appropriate chastisement and restraint. It confers upon him her estate—every body knows that the dead cannot keep their property—and the wife is legally dead. She therefore exchanges her freedom of will, her moral dignity and her worldly estate, for that most uncertain estate, a man—upon whom she can lavish her affections, and, by looking upward to him with sufficient awe and reverence, can call into complete exercise her veneration and her wonder! Well is it for the aggressor that the aggrieved was made for love rather than for war, or he would be put upon immediate self-defence. No man asks of his fellow, no nation demands of another, any like concession of rights, when the closest friendship springs up between them. The honor belongs to English and American lawgivers, of having discovered the class of human beings which will endure the greatest deprivation of rights, with the least effectual resistance. Doubtless it is a valorous thing to conquer woman, and "to the victor belong the spoils of the vanquished!"

Go forth, valiant Saxon! not frowning like Mars—but with a countenance clothed with smiles; not breathing destruction, but the soft whispers of gentle love; subdue the heart of fair, confiding woman, and the law shall load you with spoils! Gain her affections, and you shall not be annoyed with her moral dignity; obtain her hand, and you shall have her purse also. Let not the characteristic modesty of your nature depress the energies of your mind, for the law favors you. Let not your sense of justice defeat the gratification of your acquisitiveness, for is not the law just? Princes acquire domain, power and wealth, by conquest—why shouldst not thou, one of Creation's lords, have thy plunder for thy pains?

Let us now examine the institution of marriage as recognized by the Common Law, and the legal rights and relations of husband and wife.

"Our law," says Sir William Blackstone, "considers marriage in no other light than as a civil contract. The holiness of the matrimonial state is left entirely to the ecclesiastical law, the temporal courts not having jurisdiction to consider unlawful marriage as a sin but merely as a civil incontinence."

Here is the first grand error of the British and American law concerning marriage. It is this idea of marriage being "a mere civil contract" that leads on to much absurdity and injustice. This species of contract in general relates to matters of property. It is an agreement by which one person, at the solicitation of another, undertakes to do or to abstain from doing some act, which done or abstained from, will benefit the promisee in his estate and property; the violation of which by the promisor, is regarded as a civil wrong, to be atoned for by the payment of money as damages. Hence the action for a breach of promise of marriage. A man and woman "contract" to marry: this the law regards as "a fair business transaction." The man refuses to perform his part of the contract; this refusal is a breach of contract—a civil injury—and the aggrieved party can sue him in a court of law, and recover a compensation in money as damages for the breach of contract. But the woman refuses to perform her agreement; then the man may sue her and recover a compensation in money.

In an old case it was contended that the man could not have an action for the breach of the marriage contract, for the reason that marriage was of no advantage to him, and therefore he could have no damages. But the Court overruled this argument, and gave the injured man his remedy also.

But I see not on what principle this decision can be sustained, if marriage is to be regarded as a mere civil contract, and you look to its breach as a ground for awarding pecuniary damages to the aggrieved—unless it appears that the fair defaulter possessed a fortune. For I would inquire, how much money can a man make of the marriage contract in cases where the wife brings no fortune. If he sustains no pecuniary loss he ought not to have any pecuniary satisfaction. But if the delinquent woman possess a fortune, inasmuch as the law gives it to the husband upon the marriage, we can perceive, if she will not marry him, that he sustains damage to the amount of her fortune—less her reasonable support out of it—and our most righteous laws ought to award it to him! The default of an heiress, then, would be a snug little profit to the broken hearted lover!

"A civil contract!" A contract to do what? Has it ever been written out? Is it to love one human being above all others for ever? Is it to consecrate that love by the purest devotion—the holiest sentiment—the most perfect seclusion? Is it to devote the faculties and affections of the mind to the attainment of another's happiness? Doth the wife so resolve? And is the husband to protect her life—preserve her honor—and to exalt her intellectual and moral dignity by the concentration of all his faculties, sentiments, and affections, in the work of devoted love? Shall he be willing to lay down his life for her happiness, and to part with all other beings, all other possessions, sooner than the wife of his bosom?

If so—is this to be written on parchment like a common deed—to be set forth in legal pleadings—read aloud to vulgar crowds in open courts—and to be made the subject of pecuniary estimation? "A civil contract!" Say rather that marriage is the holiest ordinance of the Creator's laws—that its obligations are felt in the highest impulses of the human sentiments—and are incapable of utterance by the human tongue.

It is this idea of marriage being a civil contract which enables the husband to prosecute for the highest infringement of the marital rights, and to recover money as damages against the offender—a mode of redress which I hope I sufficiently condemned in a former discourse. And yet the law which regards this as a mutual contract between husband and wife does not give the wife any damages for the violation of it by the husband, either as against him or the person with whom he commits the wrong. Another glory for that "perfection of human reason," the common law!

If you discard the notion of marriage being a civil contract, the action for the breach of the marriage promise would not be retained—but such breach would be regarded as a moral offence, as it truly is—and it would be punishable as such. The wrong doer would be stigmatised as a criminal—as one who had injured the happiness of a human being in a very high degree, for which no atonement could be made in money, but only by condign punishment and legal disgrace. The parties then would not so often pride themselves upon a violation of plighted vows; and indulgence in falsehood and bad faith, would no longer be called "trifling" with human affections.

But while the laws place the violation of the lover's faith upon precisely the same footing as the non-payment of a promissory note, it may be expected that ordinary minds will regard the payment of damages in the former case a full atonement as in the latter. Thus, the man or woman whose marriage vows are broken, will be as respectable in society as the merchant whose notes are under protest—and bankruptcy of the affections will be regarded as no more distressing than bankruptcy in trade.

Do not suppose that I contend for innovation from the love of novelty—or that I would remove the landmarks of the law for the sake of appearing to be a reformer. I am only applying a general principle, which I endeavored to establish in a former discourse—that injuries to the high and holy sentiments of humanity ought to be regarded as crimes—and not as the subjects of pecuniary atonement and satisfaction—and that, when the law shall not regard them as crimes, it shall not recognize them in any manner whatever.

Let us get rid of the sordid estimate, the pecuniary valuation of human hopes and joys, sorrows and afflictions. Let no man or woman say, "This is the price of my humanity; this is the value of my honor and happiness; give me so much and I am content. Go, perjured creature, and wed another, but pay me first before you go: this mockery of the heart is worth so many dollars; pay them, and my wounds will be healed!" Precious humanity this! Is it far above our estimate of the animal tribes? The ox, the horse, the ass are valued thus; and surely none but beasts can have a monied price. A man receives your money and contracts to deliver to you a horse, but fails to do so. This is a "civil contract"—and for its breach you sue him and recover the value of the animal. But instead of contracting to deliver a horse he contracts to deliver himself—here is another "civil contract"—and he fails to perform it. Our laws allow you to sue him again and to recover the value of the animal.

Let us next consider what persons may enter into the state of matrimony. "The parties must be able to contract," saith our law; and it regards all persons as capable of marrying except those who labor under some defined disability or incapacity. Consanguinity, or relation by blood, is a disability derived from the natural laws—it having been observed as a general result that the offspring of a marriage within certain degrees of consanguinity are imbecile either in mind or body. This disability ought probably to be extended so as to prohibit marriage between first cousins. Idiots and lunatics are incapable of contracting marriage—except the latter during a lucid interval. The lunatic may bind himself by a civil contract during such intervals, and, therefore, our laws at such times allow him to marry. Here is another error arising from the doctrine of civil contract being applied to marriage. The lunatic ought to be prohibited from marrying at all times. The laws of nature forbid it, and the laws of man ought not to favor the transmission of his infirmity to his offspring.

The age of legal consent to marriage is fixed by the common law at fourteen years in males and twelve in females. "The law," says Chancellor Kent, "supposes that the parties at that age have sufficient discretion for such a contract, and they can bind themselves irrevocably, and cannot afterward be permitted to plead even their egregious indiscretion, however distressing the result of it may be." Here our law supposes a "sufficient discretion" to exist in a case, where every body knows it does not exist at all. Why should the law outrage the sense and judgment of mankind in this most important transaction of human life? No man or woman is supposed, even by the law, to have sufficient discretion before the age of 21 years to enter into any contract except for the necessities of life and for profitable instruction. No man can irrevocably convey his land, or sell a horse, before he attains to the age of 21 years—why then should he be deemed to possess sufficient discretion to choose a wife, and to assume the responsibilities of a husband? The age of legal consent to a marriage as now recognized by law is wholly immature, and ought to be changed to that period of life, when the intellectual faculties attain their full development, the character is formed, and the parties take their true position in society. The man ought to postpone marriage until he shall have entered seriously upon the business of life and fairly tested his chance of success. The Napoleon code is far more reasonable and in conformity with the laws of the human mind—which provides that in case of marriage without the parent's consent, the son must be twenty-five, and the daughter twenty-one years of age, in order to render them competent. But even this code, the parents consenting, allows marriage at too early an age. It seems to me that marriage earlier than at the age of twenty-five in males and twenty-one in females, ought to be forbidden by law, for natural reasons. The newspapers of the day contain the following statement:

"A case is now pending before the Senate of N. York, which is peculiar in its features. The common law fixes the 'age of consent,' as it is termed, at twelve years for a female. Some years since, the statute law of this State varied that age of consent to fourteen years, and at the same time declared it a felonious offence to marry a female under that age, without the consent of her parents or guardians. Subsequently, the statute was amended, so as to restore the common law rule of twelve years of age as the period when a female becomes legally marriageable; but the penalty against clandestinely marrying a female less than fourteen years of age, was inadvertently left in force.

During the autumn of 1838, a daughter of a citizen of Stephentown, Rensselaer county, aged about 13 years, attended the common school of the district in which she resided, and when going and returning, was in the habit of calling at a neighbor's house on the way. The mistress of this house seems to have been an inveterate match-maker, and she so filled the simple girl's mind with notions of matrimony, having reference to a particular young man of her acquaintance, as to prepare her to take that important step at the first opportunity. In the course of events, the father and mother of the girl were absent from their residence, at a funeral, which would detain them for nearly a day, and this occasion was improved by the husband of the officious match-maker, and others, to persuade their victim (though not without much hesitation on her part) to ride to a clergyman's in the vicinity, and be married to the young man—who would seem, from the statements before the Senate, to have played but a secondary part in the affair.

Resulting from these proceedings was the indictment of the conspirators, and the sentence of the husband to the State prison. Meanwhile, the wife is such in the eye of the law; although the punishment of the husband pronounces her still under the control of her parents. To put an end to this double and incompatible relation, legislative action seems to be necessary."

Our laws appear to be defective in not restraining from marriage the moral idiot—as well as those who are afflicted with such bodily infirmities as observation has shown will be almost certain to be transmitted. The former seems to me to be as incapable of entering into the married state as if he were deficient in the ordinary powers of intellectual perception; nay, as this state is mainly dependent upon the moral forces of the mind, he who is grossly depraved morally, is not at all in a condition to embark in it, and is surely unfit to discharge its obligations. The social body is deeply concerned in all that relates to the fitness of marriage, and the moral training and intellectual culture of children.

We have treated marriage as an ordinance of nature, binding upon the parties for life. Its permanency can be greatly sustained by judicious precautions at the outset. Prohibit marriage by the young and indiscreet—by those who are morally insane, and also by those whose constitutional diseases will cut off themselves and their offspring, and a great protection will be gained against the dissolution of the nuptial ties, by moral causes and premature death.

If we could penetrate the designs of Nature in reference to the matrimonial state, we should, perhaps, discover that one marriage was all that was ordained for either man or woman. There are strong indications of such a natural design. The uniform equality of the sexes as regards numbers first suggests this idea. And, next, it would appear to be the design of nature that human beings should not die from disease or want, but that they should wear out by the lapse of years. Mr. Combe in his "Constitution of Man" appears to demonstrate that disease and premature death are the result of our ignorance of, and inattention to, the laws of our organization. If this be so, (and no other view appears to be reconcilable with the benevolence of the Creator,) an union between two persons of opposite sexes, would naturally be terminated by death in old age, when a second marriage would seem to be prohibited by Nature. The moral organization of mankind tends, moreover, to the same conclusion. The shock which conjugal bereavement gives, even to the least sensitive of our race—the sadness with which it shrouds the survivor—the fact that the husband or wife selected in early life, is ever regarded as a more perfect being, and is clothed with charms, graces and virtues unobserved in one adopted by a second marriage—the revolt of the children of the first marriage against their surviving parent's again embarking in matrimony—the earnest last request of the dying wife that her husband will not marry another—the solemn last will and testament of the dying husband, so framed as to prevent, if possible, a second marriage by his wife—the common sentiment of mankind, that second marriages are the creatures of interest, and are not hallowed by those pure sentiments which consecrated the first—all conspire to show that the higher nature of mankind revolts at a second matrimonial union, and tend strongly to confirm the idea that it is the design of Nature that there shall be but one marriage connexion for either man or woman.

What instruction then ought the lawgivers of mankind to derive from these natural precepts? Their first care should be to ordain such laws on this subject, as would protect as far as possible all indiscreet unions between the sexes; they ought next to guard the marriage ties by severe and salutary legislation, and they should regard the dissolution of these ties in any other manner than by death as contrary to the laws of nature—except in cases where the marriage connexion ought never to have been formed, by reason of the moral unfitness of one or both of the parties.

The law's first care should be to prevent improper marriages, and its next, to guard the married state from all molestation, and lastly, to regulate divorce by the standard of natural morality. There is a right of divorce, as well as a right of marriage. Ignorance, indiscretion or misfortune cannot be visited by the law as a crime—they cannot properly work a legal forfeiture of human rights or happiness. Where, then, shall we allow, and what limits shall we set to the right of divorce? I answer, divorce must be allowed in those cases, and in no other, where it is fairly proved from the inexperience of the parties that the marriage connexion ought not to have been formed—that is to say, whenever the party complained against shall be shown to be unfit to live in the married state. The test should be the moral fitness for marriage of the party complained against.

"Christ himself tells" says Milton "who should not be put asunder, namely, those whom God hath joined; a plain solution of this great controversy, if men would but use their eyes; for when is it that God may be said to join? When the parties and their friends consent? No surely—for that may concur to lowdest ends. Or is it when church rites are finished? Neither; for the efficacy of those depends upon the presupposed fitness of either party. It is left, that only then when the minds are fitly disposed, and are enabled to maintain a cheerful conversation, to the solace and love of each other, according as God intended and promised in the very first foundation of matrimony. 'I will make her a helpmeet for him;' for surely what God intended and promised, that only can be thought to be his joining, and not the contrary. So likewise the apostle witnesseth, that in marriage 'God hath called us to peace.' It may be for domestic reasons Milton leaned to the side of divorce—nevertheless, he reasons well on this subject; for all the sacredness of the marriage state depends upon the fitness of the parties, and the harmony of their minds.

Upon the principle in view, divorce would in all cases be total, and a second marriage would be prohibited to the party who was shown to be morally unfit for that condition. An absolute divorce is now allowed in only one case, and that case, it seems to me, is evidence of no greater moral turpitude than many others which are unnoticed by law. It seems to me that in all the cases in which it is provided by the statutes of this State, that a partial divorce, or separation, may be decreed, such as cases of brutal and inhuman treatment, threatening danger to life, or great bodily injury, and desertion and abandonment, ought to be made the grounds of absolute divorce; and that habitual drunkenness, gaming, gross prodigality, habitual insult, tyranny or neglect, as well as insanity, idiocy, and the conviction of an infamous offence, ought to be included in the causes for absolute divorce. The miseries produced by domestic wrongs, of which our laws take no notice, cry aloud for recognition and redress. How often do you witness the spectacle of a gentle, kind and sensitive woman, abounding in every virtue of her sex, who is wedded to a brutal man, degraded by many vices, or sunk in habits of drunkenness, or perhaps convicted of an infamous crime—and when you contemplate her condition, or hear the story of her wrongs and sufferings, your hearts sink within you, and all the kind and generous impulses of your nature demand that she be relieved from her wretched thralldom. But to all the generous pleadings of humanity the law coldly responds, that she must abide her cruel fate! Why should your sentiments and the law be at variance with each other? Ought not the law to respond to the high demand of your moral nature? Whence its authority, unless it be derived from the sanction of your superior sentiments? The law ought to be no more nor less than enlightened justice and benevolence written out in the pages of human legislation. It has properly nothing to do with questions of expediency—its concern is with the right. Is it right that any human being should be bound by an inexorable law to another human being whose presence and whose character inspire nothing but dread and loathsome disgust? Is it right to arm one human being with the power of inflicting perpetual misery upon another? If not, then let justice be done, though it would divorce a world of wretched sufferers.

Be not filled with dread of an innovation proceeding from your enlightened justice and humanity. He who regards the marriage vows the most sacredly, and who has the most rational view of the true aim of the matrimonial relation, will be the first to demand the release of the aggrieved party from the miseries of a wretched marriage. You would not bind a noble being to a brute, degrade moral excellence by perpetual association with the vilest ruffianism—make fast the bond that unites the innocent with the guilty, and condemn a spotless being to perpetual union with a felon! Humanity revolts at such awful sacrifice of a noble, an immortal being. How long will it bear such bold defiance by your laws? If man will legislate no more wisely, let woman be heard upon this point;—she hath suffered enough from the barbarous tyranny of the common law, which weds her to a brute, as it were, in her cradle, and binds her irrevocably to the moral monster, until the grave opens to receive her!

I quote further from Milton:

"He therefore who lacketh of his due in the most native and humane end of marriage, thinks it better to part than to live sadly and injuriously to that cheerful covenant, for not to be loved, and yet retained, is the greatest injury to a gentle spirit; he, I say, who therefore seeks to part, is one who highly honors the married life and would not stain it; and the reasons which now move him to divorce, are equal to the best of those that could first warrant him to marry."—[Milton's Prose Works, vol. 2, page 101.

"And it is a less breach of wedlock to part with wise and quiet consent betimes, than still to foil and profane that mystery of joy and union with a polluting sadness and perpetual distemper; for it is not the outward continuing of marriage that keeps whole the covenant, but whatsoever does most according to peace and love, whether in marriage or in divorce, he it is that breaks marriage least: it being so often written that 'love only is the fulfilling of every commandment.'"—[ib. p. 103.

"Again, if law aim at the firm establishment and preservation of matrimonial faith, we know that cannot thrive under violent means, but is the more violated. It is not when two, unfortunately met, are by the canon forced to draw in that yoke an unmerciful day's work of sorrow, till death unshakes them, that then the law keeps marriage most unviolated and unbroken; but when the law takes order that marriage be accountant and responsible to perform that society, whether it be religious, civil or corporal, which may be conscientiously required and claimed therein, or else to be dissolved if it cannot be undergone; this is to make marriage indissoluble, by making it a just and equal dealer, a performer of those new helps which instituted the covenant, being otherwise a most unjust contract, and no more to be maintained under tuition of law than the vilest fraud, or cheat, or theft that may be committed."—[ib. p. 146.

It will be perceived that I regard marriage more as a solemn sacrament, than as a civil contract; and that when the union is consecrated by the sentiments of the parties, it ought to be dissolved only by death;—but that, in those cases where there is an unfitness in either of the parties, this tie ought to be dissolved upon the application of the aggrieved party, since it is mere mockery of the sacredness of marriage to allow its solemn obligations to be violated with impunity. Moral unfitness ought to be deemed a disability; and as it may not be known at the time of the marriage, but may come out by its experience, the marriage ought to be declared void, in the same manner as a marriage by a person having a former husband or wife living at the time is now declared void by law upon proper application. In the latter case the party is deemed incompetent to marry; in the former case the party is equally incompetent, since he wants the moral properties requisite to a performance of the high moral duties of the conjugal state. Upon this principle the law would not acknowledge that there had been a marriage, (except in behalf of the offspring,) since it was not consecrated by the moral sentiments of the parties themselves, and the decree dissolving it would be based upon the moral evidence that this marriage was a profanation of the most sacred natural ordinance.

Wherever, then, marriage can properly exist by the moral laws, the law of the land would hold to its sacred inviolability and permanent endurance; and where it could not in contemplation of the former laws have its proper existence, the law of the land would declare it to be void.

In short, marriage would be regarded as an ordinance of nature, consecrated by the high and holy sentiments of humanity, and as dependent upon these for its moral and legal existence, and where these would be outraged by the connexion, it would be dissolved.

Let us now consider more particularly the legal condition of woman in the character of wife.

And first; she surrenders her very existence to a certain extent, as an intelligent moral being.

"By marriage," says Sir William Blackstone, "the husband and wife are one person in law—that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated or consolidated into that of the husband, under whose wing, protection and cover she performs everything, and is therefore called in our law—French, a femme covert, is said to be covert baron, or under the protection and influence of her husband, baron or lord, and her condition during her marriage is called her coverture."—[1 Bl. Com., 422.

Chancellor Kent says that—

"The legal effects of marriage are generally deducible from the principle of the common law by which the husband and wife are regarded as one person, and her legal existence and authority are in a degree lost or suspended during the continuance of the matrimonial union."—[2 Kent's Com. 129.

Mr. Justice Patti, of this State, in an elaborate opinion, delivered in the Court for the Correction of Errors, expresses the highest admiration of these maxims of the common law, and denounces the tendency of modern decisions as "accommodated to the excessive refinements of society;" and he complains that there have arisen artificial innovations in regard to the rights and duties of good old English matrimony." He approves the doctrine that the very being or legal existence of the wife is suspended during marriage, and confesses that he loves and venerates "that primeval notion of the mystical and hallowed union of husband and wife."

This is a remarkable example of the highest activity of the organ of veneration! But the benevolence of the learned judge was not altogether dormant when he continued and said: "That we often see acts of tyranny and cruelty exercised by the husband toward the person of the wife, of which the law takes no cognizance," and yet," he adds, under the influence of self-esteem, doubtless, "no man of wisdom and reflection can doubt the propriety of the rule which gives to the husband the control and custody of the wife." "It is the price," says he, "which female wants and weakness must pay for their supply and protection." Neither of the two former of these writers have attempted to justify this doctrine—they merely state its existence and extent—they declare the law as it exists, like faithful commentators. Sir William Blackstone seems rather to wish to apologise for the existence of the law; and quotes the civil law without disapproving it, by which he says, "the husband and wife are considered as two distinct persons, and may have separate estates, contracts, debts and injuries." It is consoling to know that all womanhood are not under the tyranny of the common law of England, which sets nature at defiance. It is the law of the male sex gathering unto themselves dominion and power at the sacrifice of the female. It originated among a people who are full as much distinguished, in the highest state of civilization and refinement, for their self-esteem as their love of justice; and it took its origin in the days of their ignorance and barbarism; when the condition of woman was depressed, and when it was even doubted whether she had the same moral and intellectual existence as man. When the sword created the lord, and submission the vassal, the husband took the title of baron or lord, and the wife was regarded as his creature. Presumptuous pride repelled the idea of equality, and rude and savage man never would admit woman to be his equal. This act of sense and justice it was reserved for civilized man to do after a season of reflection. The time has arrived; justice and benevolence are abroad in our fair land, awakening the spirit of inquiry and innovation, and the Gothic fabric of the British law will fall before it, save where it is based upon the foundation of truth and nature.

Need I to prove, and if so, have I not proved, that woman has the same moral and intellectual constitution as man; that her being and her rights are individual and distinct; that she thinks and acts for herself; is happy or miserable of herself; is a free, moral agent; an accountable being; full of rights and bounden by duties; having equals, but no superiors upon the earth? Hath she not the sense of pride, of justice and of praise, the love of personal and moral freedom? Is it revealed by the natural laws or written by inspiration that man shall have dominion over her? This was given to him over the brute only. Is he answerable for her will? Let him then do her thinking. Is he responsible for her as a moral being? Let him be punished for her crimes. Does he absorb her pleasures? Let him then endure her pangs, even to her toothache! Neither her moral or intellectual existence can be merged in his, more than her physical. If she has any existence whatever after marriage, it must be as woman, as one of mankind. But I will not insult an audience in the nineteenth century by stopping to prove that woman after marriage ought still to be regarded as the creature of God, and not as the creature of man.

Those laws, then, which in the least detract from woman's intellectual freedom or moral responsibility, or restrain the harmonious activity of her faculties after marriage, outrage her rights. Her happiness still depends upon the free exercise of her natural powers. Her restraints must be those of her own enlightened nature. The woman and the wife must remain one and the same. She must be deemed capable of moral and legal consent; capable of judging and of acting; of willing and refusing. Her rights must be acknowledged and her wrongs redressed. She must remain a distinct person, as by the civil law; having "her separate estate, contracts, debts and injuries." In no other way can her mental powers have their requisite scope and exercise; in no other way can her intellectual and moral powers enjoy that healthy and harmonious activity which nature has ordained as the means of perfecting all human beings in knowledge, excellence and happiness. How widely doth our law depart from these plain principles! "As the husband," says Chancellor Kent, "is the guardian of the wife, and bound to protect and maintain her, the law has given him a reasonable superiority and control over her person, and he may even put gentle restraints upon her liberty, if her conduct be such as to require it."

Sir William Blackstone also says, that "the husband (by the old law) might give his wife moderate correction—for as he is to answer for her misbehavior, the law thought it reasonable to entrust him with this power of restraining her by domestic chastisement, in the same moderation that a man is allowed to correct his apprentices or children." He adds "that in the polite reign of Charles the II, this power of correction began to be doubted, and yet the lower rank of people, who were always fond of the old common law, still claim and exert their ancient privilege; and the courts of law will still permit a husband to restrain a wife of her liberty in case of any gross misbehavior."

And this learned commentator has the grace to add, after this, that "even the disabilities which the wife lies under are for the most part intended for her protection and benefit;" and then exclaims in rapture, "so great a favorite is the female sex of the law of England!" The truth is, how politely soever the commentator may express it, that the "good old common law" allowed the husband to whip and beat his wife, so that he performed this salutary infliction with a lawful weapon—and a broomstick was solemnly adjudged to be such lawful weapon—and a rod not larger than the thumb was not objected to, unless it were of iron, but if so, and death ensued, it was murder. But commentators chose to say the law only allows salutary correction and restraint of the wife in cases of gross misbehavior. We'll allow this to be so. He may still lock her up in a closet; he may bind her with cords; but he may not whip her. He can still inflict personal chastisement of some sort, and can correct her as an inferior and dependent, instead of treating her as his companion and equal, as a rational, moral being like himself. And so long as the act shall be legalised, there will always be a large amount of brute power employed in its perpetration.

All the writers upon the common law agree to this dominion of the husband over the wife, although they assign different reasons for its origin and present existence.

In a note in Petersdorff's Abridgement it is said, "A series of ages have demonstrated that the savages are the tyrants of the female sex; and that the condition of woman is usually ameliorated by the refinements of civilised life. In the early stages of society females are generally subject to the uncontrolled power of the man; and he may approve or condemn, caress or chastise, and exercise the dominion of life or death. Even now, in countries of the most refined and polished habits, a considerable latitude is allowed to marital coercion. In England the husband has the right of imposing such corporal restraints as he may deem necessary for securing to himself the fulfilment of the obligations imposed on the wife by virtue of the marriage contract. He may, in the plenitude of his power, adopt every act of physical coercion which does not endanger the life or health of the wife or render cohabitation unsafe."—[4 Pct., Abr. 21. I am a loss to know whether this English writer intends to call his countrymen "savages" and "tyrants of the female sex;" or whether he designs this as a pleasant satire upon the dignity of English and American wives. At any rate he admits that the law confers upon the husband "a plenitude of power" indeed! He sits in judgment upon the hourly actions of his wife; arbitrarily determines whether she has performed her duties to her lord; measures the extent of her submission to his will; and whether he be good or bad, just or unjust, calm or raging; whether he loves or hates her, he has the power to decide in his own case; and to seize her person; to restrain her of her liberty; "to use every act of physical coercion which may not endanger her life or health;" and if she resist and oppose his lordly authority and brute force, he may even maim her; for the right to coerce implies that he may use all the force necessary to accomplish his lawful design. So much for the personal liberty and security of the wife as set forth by the most skillful apologists of the common law. Let us now see how the same writers regard the moral condition of the wife; and whether her superior sentiments are protected by law or abandoned to the grossest laceration and insult at her husband's will.

The last writer quoted says that, "mere austerity of temper, petulance of manners, rudeness of language, or want of civil attention and accommodation—even occasional sallies of passion—if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty; they are high offences in the marriage state, but not that cruelty against which the law can relieve." I ask why is not actual cruelty "legal cruelty"? Why are not "high offences in the marriage state" offences against the law? Because this law, true to its origin, still looks upon the husband and wife as the same man and woman of whom it first took cognizance, and these were savages. It knows not civilized man or woman, and ought to take leave of them. I would commend it to those congenial minds which the policy of our Government has concentrated "beyond the Mississippi."

Lawyers do not find it difficult, in general, to assign some sort of reason in support of any proposition for which they may have occasion to contend. Accordingly the last writer from whom I have quoted, hard pressed in the premises, attempts to justify the legal supremacy of the husband, upon the ground that he is the stronger party of the two—that in him there is power to support his dominion—while if it were given to the woman who wants the power, she would at every moment be obliged to resort for help to conquer her refractory subject. This is the tyrant's old argument that "power confers right"—that physical force confers the right to do a moral wrong. This does not look well on paper—and he accordingly fortifies it by another statement—that the man is best fitted by his education, experience and mental powers to bear away. This is but substituting intellectual for physical force, and substantially asserts the right of intellectual power to do a wrong; that because a man has the intellectual forces at command, he may use them to subdue the moral and intellectual powers of woman. This would do if the power were to be exerted against a brute—but the assumed mental superiority of the man can have nothing to do with physical coercion; it can only be exerted to persuade and convince the reluctant and refractory woman. But man shuts out woman from the education and experience which he enjoys, and after doing this wrong, make the deficiency of his own creation the foundation of his own supremacy, and the denial of her rights; which is but setting up one wrong as the justification of another.

But this argument is most abused in another point of view. The question is not which shall have the supremacy, but whether any legal supremacy shall be allowed in the case? The argument is against the woman's bearing away. Now I am as much in fear of such a state of things, as the grayest sage of the common law. I am contending only for the legal equality of the sexes; I am striving to put out of view all pretension to the right of coercion by either party.

Lord Kaimes says "both should govern: the husband by law, and the wife by persuasion." He is only half right. Both should govern: neither by law—but both by persuasion. All the force that can be employed is the proper force of human beings, the moral and intellectual powers of their minds. If they were regarded as equals, and as intelligent moral beings, the one that reasoned best and loved most would have the supremacy, and the only supremacy consistent with the laws of their being.

Our laws have created a little officer to look after all married women who may be signing deeds and papers "under the fear and compulsion of their husbands." He is the only legal remnant of the days of chivalry—the only official representative of the spirit of La Mancha's far-famed Knight, who went about releasing captive and distressed women from their grievous oppressions. This little officer is known as a "Commissioner of Deeds"—and great deeds he commits, surely. What doth he? Perhaps there are few married ladies present, but have received a visit from this worthy little dignitary. He cometh with a deed in his hand—he sendeth the husband sneakingly out of the room—he goeth up to the wife—he looketh in any direction but that of her face—he seemeth ashamed of his errand—he muttereth something about "fear and compulsion of her husband"—attempts to laugh at the idea of her fearing her husband, but saith something about the law's requiring him to certify as to her bravery—he getteth out of the house as quick as possible, and feels that he hath done a foolish thing. Did he ever extort the confession that a wife had signed a deed from fear? Her pride, her humanity revolt at the idea. We must abolish the necessity for this little officer, by denying to the husband the legal right to inspire fear in the wife, or to coerce her to do any act whatever, by physical resorts.

But this idea of woman-merger, so stupidly adhered to by the law, is turned to a benevolent account in relieving the lost being from moral responsibility. Husband and wife cannot be guilty of a conspiracy, because in the eye of the law they are one person. Here both escape from punishment because one person cannot conspire to do any act.

But the law has other benevolent features. It takes the sensible ground that none but a rational, moral being can commit either theft or burglary; and as the wife is not regarded as such a being in the presence of her husband, she cannot in that dread presence be deemed to have committed either of these crimes. The law construes his mere presence as equivalent to coercion, and it requires such strong proof to rebut its own presumption that it must appear that she was the principal instigator of the crime, or she will escape all punishment. How consistent is the law in its barbarism! This is a complete demonstration that it regards the moral being of the wife as sunk, and her will completely surrendered to her husband. "So great a favorite of the law is the female sex!" Hath not woman a right to be ever regarded as a free moral agent? The law takes away this right, and boasts that it has created an exception! It sets so degraded an estimate of woman's moral nature as to consider her incapable of either committing or abstaining from crime, and then boasts its magnanimity in forbearing to punish her! Why not rather first assent to her enjoying the moral dignity pertaining to her nature, and then hold her accountable as a human being? If she commit a wrong under actual restraint or compulsion, treat her as the law treats other human beings—as irresponsible—for no one can be deemed to have acted while forcibly constrained by another. What shame, that the law should degrade an intelligent moral being to such a degree, that it shrinks from holding her responsible for a criminal act! It is the highest demand of our natures, the most sacred right of humanity, to be held responsible at all times, and in all conditions, to the moral laws of the Creator. No sane man or woman can ever forfeit this moral eminence, from which flow all human rights and dignity.

But the legal sacrifice of the wife is yet incomplete; her person, her will, and her moral freedom are not enough for her lord's contentment. He must have all; and what remains but her worldly estate? He takes that also.

By marriage the husband becomes seized of all the wife's money and personal effects, and is entitled to treat them absolutely as his own. In her lands he has an estate in general during his life, and in return he assumes her debts, and is bound to provide for her reasonable support and maintenance.

"So great a favorite is the female sex of the laws of England" and America!

Now we have before seen that both man and woman have an instinctive disposition to acquire and keep exclusive property, and that the gratification of this desire was ordained by the Creator as a means of happiness—that, therefore, such gratification is the right of every human being. Here, then, is a surrender of a positive right on the part of women by the act of marriage. Is it necessary, or proper that the law should thus defeat the natural desire of any human being? The laws cannot demand the surrender of rights, their office is to protect them. Woman is naturally sufficiently tenacious of the right of property. If you are sceptical on this point, go and bargain with a femme sole who buys and sells habitually, and return with your answer. It is true that this native disposition of the mind may be heightened in its manifestations by frequent exercise—as an hour's observation in Wall street will sufficiently establish. It is enough for my purpose that woman has the native desire of property; this confers the right, and I know not upon what ground her entire surrender of this right to her husband, by the mere act of marriage, can be justified or excused.

The possession of property is ordained to be a great means of support to one's personal independence. A proper self-esteem oftentimes depends upon this possession. The dependence of one human being upon another is a moral dependence. Domestic and general society result mainly from the moral wants of mankind.

Now pride, or a feeling of self-dependence, is one attribute of the human mind. It cannot be lost without a sense of degradation. Pride gives tone to human character. A dependant and servile human being hath lost a portion of his proper humanity—and the laws ought to do nothing to create an artificial and unnecessary state of depression and dependence in any human being. Look at the wife in this point of view, and behold her after the surrender of her estate to her husband—a mere pensioner upon his bounty—entitled, it may be, to her reasonable support and maintenance, but having to ask for it, to make known her wants; aye, and to satisfy her lord of their reasonableness before he can be moved to her relief. "In the general course of human nature," says Mr. Hamilton, "a power over a man's subsistence is a power over his will."

So a power over a woman's subsistence may enslave her will and degrade her pride. Moreover, the chances for the just exercise of this power are not as numerous as could be desired, since he who decides upon the wife's requests is interested against her wishes—for so much as he withholds from her he retains to himself. Her sense of justice, therefore, receives the next wound, and love vanishes. For no woman's affection, however strong, can remain long unimpaired after her pride has been mortified, and her sense of justice outraged by her husband.*

Moreover, if the husband really fears that the wife is unfit to appreciate the value of property, he has but to allow her the same means he himself enjoys for the gratification of her innate love of it, by allowing her to acquire and possess it; and all analogy shows that she will be very soon well enough improved in the very point he would attain. She will come by degrees to appreciate property as well as himself, and the more she shall exercise the faculty of acquisitiveness the stronger it will become. She now is sometimes inclined to regard the property of her husband as a stranger's—it is not her own—and all she spends of it is clear gain to herself. She is not allowed to indulge the desire of possession. Its activity would be a salutary check upon needless expenditure.

She would soon look upon him with great respect for his love of money. She would think him on the whole as rather a sensible man than otherwise, and she might be inclined to imitate her lord's example. Husbands had better try the experiment at any rate. They now keep their wives from the exercise of acquisitiveness, and still complain that they are deficient in that respect; and this with the same justice that a parent could complain of a child for being deficient in music, after having strictly prohibited it from all instruction and exercise. But I wish to treat of the justice and not the expediency of this matter. Woman has the right of property, and the husband has no right to demand its surrender by the act of marriage, and the law ought not to sanction it. If a woman of proper age and discretion chooses voluntarily to surrender a part of her property to her husband by an ante-nuptial agreement, there seems not to be any objection to this, provided the law shall properly guard the mode of her doing it; but an implied surrender by force of law is entirely destitute of foundation in reason and justice. It seems to me that the law should leave the woman's fortune in her own hands, and under her perfect and free control to the same extent after marriage as before. Then as regards the acquisitions of property after marriage, it seems to me that the parties ought to be treated as holding it jointly between them, and the whole to go to the survivor.

A bill is now (Jan. 1841,) pending before the Legislature of the State of Missouri, which if passed, will greatly improve the condition of married women in respect to the right of property. It provides that—

"All the property owned by the wife, at the time of the marriage, and all she may acquire during the marriage, by descent or gift, shall be called 'the wife's separate property.'"

All the property which shall be acquired during the marriage, either by the husband or by the wife, except that which is acquired by descent or gift, shall be called 'common property.'

The husband's separate property shall be liable for his debts contracted before and after the marriage, but shall not be liable for the debts of the wife.

The wife's separate property shall be liable for her debts contracted before the marriage, but shall not be liable for the husband's debts, contracted before or after the marriage.

The husband shall have unrestricted power to alienate and dispose of his own separate property, and to alienate and dispose of the common property during the marriage; except that the common property which is real estate shall not be alienated or disposed of, unless the wife join the husband in the conveyance.

The husband may, during the marriage, alienate and dispose of the wife's separate property, if the wife give her consent thereto in writing."

This latter clause, it seems to me, confers too much authority upon the husband. He ought not to be empowered to alienate her separate estate, without the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, which should ascertain that it was the true interest of the wife to consent to the transfer of her estate, and require an equivalent in value to be settled upon her by the husband.

Let us carry the principal of equality into the married state, and allow the wife to know and feel that she is truly the partner and equal of her husband. If she has not been a "silent partner" hitherto, she has at least been a very "dormant" one. My proposition is not new. The common law is altogether at variance with the laws of France, Spain, Holland, and with the laws of one of the States of this Union, (Louisiana,) in regard to the marital rights—and especially as to the wife's right of property. Community of property between husband and wife exists to a certain extent in most civilized countries where the common law of England does not prevail. The civil law is the friend of woman, and as respects her moral freedom and her right of property tends to exalt her condition and to render her conscious of her equality with man.

But I am obliged to leave this subject to your consideration; and I fear that the same objection may prevail against me, as against the laws of which I have complained—that of having done injustice to the Rights of Woman.

* NOTE.—During a debate in the New-York Legislature of 1840, upon "a bill to incorporate the New York Female Benevolent Society," several members seemed to have imbibed the spirit of reform in regard to laws affecting the rights and social position of woman, and spoke as follows:

"Mr. Loomis advocated the bill as one step toward recognizing the separate existence of females.

Mr. Culver said there was one feature in this bill of which he heartily approved. It was that which exempted the husband from any liability for the wife's subscriptions. 'I long,' said Mr. C., 'to see the day when legislation shall give to women some right of possession in their own property.'

Mr. Simmons agreed with the gentleman from Washington, in expressing his hopes that the law would be modified in relation to the rights of married women, but he doubted the propriety of commencing this reform by an act of incorporation.

Mr. Stoddard, stated that he would be glad to see the day when the female sex should have their own control over their own property, when they should be no longer subjected to the caprice and oppression, and the ill-treatment of the idle and the vicious men, to whom it may be their lot to be united.

Mr. Murray hoped the period would soon arrive when very great and serious alterations would be made in our statutes relative to the rights of married women. These laws have been handed down to us from dark feudal times, and are not consistent with the better, wiser, purer spirit of this age. The poor female, subjected by laws, in the making of which she has had no voice, to the grasp of the merciless creditor of the dissolute husband, finds her property, earned by her own hard labor, swept away.

The adversities of the last few years had shown thousands of instances where the laws visited upon the wife the misfortune or imprudence of the husband.

It is a publication by Dr. Shattuck, of Boston, it is stated, that forty-three per cent., or nearly one-half of the deaths which have taken place in Boston during the last nine years, are of persons under five years of age; and the proportional mortality of this age has been increasing.

ISABELLE OF ENGLAND.

Many a bright eye has sparkled with indignation at the mention of the Salic law, excluding the fairest part of creation from the empire of the French throne. Ambition we know is insatiable, and though woman is allowed to reign queen of hearts, she cannot but murmur that any nation should be so barbarous as to exclude her from her just inheritance. We may well say barbarous, for the law first sprang from barbarians. A company of Salians emigrated to the borders of France, before the time of Clovis, and made frequent incursions into Gaul. In time they assumed the name of Franks, and became an important part of the nation. They then determined to make a code of laws.

For this purpose, they all assembled in a great Wigwam, and elected four of their wisest men to frame the laws. These four were the learned Doctors Arrogast, Bodegast, Sologast and Windegast. When they first assembled, the wives and daughters were allowed to be present, but when they came to what is now termed the Salic law, the ladies made such violent opposition, and grew so obstreperous and loquacious, that business could not proceed, and they were requested to withdraw. We are credibly informed that they were absolutely expelled from the Chamber of State, and as "might is right," obliged to content themselves with wandering round it, and peeping through the chinks in the walls.

Still, however, this law was framed merely for individuals, and meant to operate on private estates—the sons only thought capable of inheriting the patrimony of the father. In time it extended even to the throne, and, from the earliest period of the French monarchy, no Victoria reigned over the Empire.

They talk of the chivalry of the earlier ages, yet we never read of any knight-errant who buckled on sword and helmet, put his lance in rest, and went forth to overthrow the Salic monster, which grew and flourished on the wrongs of women.

In succeeding years "Philip the Fair" ascended the throne of France, and left three sons, and one beautiful daughter, named Isabelle. The two eldest sons died, after having reigned successively, and the third, Charles, took possession of the throne. Isabelle was married to the King of England, Edward the Second.

Now it seems evident that the English monarch treated the fair Isabelle with great slight, and though she bore him three hopeful sons, he considered her a mere Salian. To this stimulated by Sir Hugh Spencer, an ambitious and evil-minded man, who so set him against the Queen that he treated her quite like a slave, and finally excluded her from his royal presence. Poor Isabelle, for a time, bore her wrongs with the timidity of a woman, but when she was privately informed that the King had determined to imprison her for life, she set her wits to work to relieve herself from his tyranny. For this purpose she humbly entreated leave from her royal master to go on a pious pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Edward churlishly replied, "that so she did not offend his sight he cared not where she went."

The Queen immediately made preparations for the pilgrimage. A number of Dames and Esquires offered to accompany her, and on a bright morning she mounted her snow-white palfrey, with housings richly embroidered by her own hands, reaching to the very ground; by her side rode her young son the Duke of Kent, prancing and curvetting his charger, much to the annoyance of his royal mother, who vainly represented the impropriety of going in this guise to the holy shrine of St. Thomas.

"Ah, mother," said the boy, "it is of St. Denis I am thinking."

"Hush, foolish boy," she replied, "or thou wilt mar my fortunes and thine own."

Rapidly they proceeded to Canterbury, but we do not find that the piety of the Queen detained her long there, as we read that she "embarked that night at Winchelsea, on board a vessel in waiting for her and her sister, and arrived the next morning at Boulogne."

When she landed, she was received by the high authorities of the place and conducted to the Abbey, where great preparations were made for her. It is even averred that the old rushes were removed and new and clean ones strewn upon the floors. She remained there two days, and then proceeded to Paris. Charles sent his nobles to meet her; and when she entered his apartment she would have knelt at his feet, but he threw his arms around her, called her his dear sister, and said, "I welcome you with your fair son, my nephew." Now we are told that some of the English dames that accompanied the Queen, were so rude as to titter at the costume of the French ladies, because they wore only their hair low on the head ornamented with flowers and jewels; whereas the English ladies, with the Queen, wore head-dresses resembling grenadier caps, three quarters of a yard high and a large tassel dangling at the end, which went to a point. It must have been hard for the French ladies to have preserved their gravity, but we do not learn that they suffered a smile to escape them.

Isabelle was much moved by the kindness of her brother, and could not refrain from shedding tears, but we presume they were few and far between, as history says "they greatly increased her charms," and in modern times we have never seen a face improved by downright crying. The Queen then began her moving appeal, telling her brother of the wrongs she had endured from her husband and Sir Hugh Spencer. The King replied—"Fair sister, be appeased, for by the faith I owe to God and St. Denis, I will provide a remedy." When the young Edward, the Earl of Kent, heard the King quote St. Denis he actually clasped his hands for joy, but his mother looked gravely at him and shook her head.

It must be confessed that the King of France was placed in an embarrassing situation—for to openly espouse his sister's cause might involve him in a war with the King of England, and so it was agreed by him and his nobles that the queen should be allowed to purchase friends, and that he should privately assist her with gold and silver.

Isabelle had been in France three years when she received letters from England entreating her to return, and promising to acknowledge her and her son as heads of the nation—for they said that Sir Hugh Spencer governed the King, and they could no longer endure the oppression they suffered; that nobles were put to death without any just cause, and that if she could collect a thousand men at arms, and would return at the head of them, they would receive the young Edward as their lawful sovereign. Charles was much gratified with this offer, and promised to raise an army for her. She had already gained many partisans by her grace and beauty, winning them by smiles and tears, much like April showers.

But when Sir Hugh Spencer and the King heard what was going on in France, they determined to counteract her plans, and not only sent large sums of money to bribe the French, but poisoned the King's mind with suspicions of his sister's intentions. "Do you not perceive," said they, "that she has brought her son to France that he may study the genius and character of the people, and, when seated on the throne of England, will insist on the Salic laws being set aside, and claim the kingdom in right of his mother after your death?"

All this seemed quite clear to the King and his courtiers, and he began to grow cold to Isabelle. In the mean time the King of England wrote a letter to the Pope, entreating him to order Charles to send back to him "the wife of his bosom whom he tenderly loved," and his young son, both of whom he greatly feared were plotting against the peace of France. Great quantities of jewels and plate were sent, as presents, with the letter. In consequence of this letter the Pope threatened to excommunicate the French King if he did not comply with the demand; and Charles forthwith sent to his sister to leave the kingdom with her son immediately.

Alas for poor Isabelle! what was to be done? One friend she found to advise her, and that was her cousin, the Count D'Artois, who came in the dead of the night—"I can do nothing for you here," said he, "for the King has sworn that whoever speaks in your favor shall be banished the kingdom; but I will recommend you to William, Earl of Hainault, and his brother, who are both great lords and wise men, and much dreaded by their enemies."

The Queen departed as quickly as possible with her son and those friends who yet adhered to her. With what anguish did she leave her native land. Not so the young Edward. "Be of good cheer, mother!" said he, "we shall yet find friends."

When the Queen arrived at Hainault, she found Earl William absent; but his brother immediately hastened to her. He was then in the early bloom of manhood, full of generous and bold daring. "Lady," said he, "you see before you your knight, who will not fail to die for you though every one should desert you. I will restore you to your rank in England, by the grace of God, and the assistance of your friends in those parts, nor will we fear any danger from the King of France."

The Queen was sitting down, but she rose, and would have thrown herself at the young knight's feet, but he said, "God forbid that the Queen of England should do such a thing."

"Alas, sir," said the Queen, "I find more comfort in you than in all the world besides, and I give you five hundred thousand thanks."

The young nobleman then conducted her and her son to Valenciennes, where she was received by Lord Williams, of Hainault, with the utmost courtesy, and also by the citizens of the town, who all came to welcome her.

The Countess of Hainault was famed for the grace with which she did the honors of her house. It was filled with the choicest luxuries of the day; but its brightest ornaments were her four daughters, scarcely emerged from childhood. Hitherto Edward had appeared insensible to the dames of France, and his mother deemed him too young to woo or win. Yet now she observed he spoke in raptures of Margaret and Isabelle Hainault; "and what has poor Philippa done?" said she, "to my eye she is fairest of all."

"She is unlike the ladies of the French court," replied he, "and I have no other standard, you know: I scarcely remember my own countrywomen."

The Queen remained at Hainault several weeks. It may not comport with the gravity of history to tell of the feasts and joustings which took place—but this was outward show, for all the time preparations were making for her return to England, and St. John de Hainault was raising followers to aid her cause. For this purpose he sent to Bohemia and Brabant, beseeching them to accompany him in his expedition. Those who did not join him, strove to persuade him to relinquish his intention, but he would not listen to their advice, saying, "he could die but once; that time was in the will of God, and that all true knights were bound to aid ladies and damsels driven from their kingdoms, comfortless and forlorn."

The noble Earl of Hainault could not but tremble for his brother, and he represented to him that he was too young for such a great undertaking; but the young man replied, "My dear lord and brother I am young and believe that God has inspired me with a desire for this enterprise; for I also believe for certain that this lady and her son have been driven from their kingdom wrongfully and unjustly."

When it came to the leave-taking the Queen knew not how to express her thanks to the Earl and Countess of Hainault. It was observed that the young Edward succeeded better with three of the sisters; but Philippa seemed to be sadly neglected. Among his gifts and pledges and keep-sakes, there were none for her; but she did not put herself forward, on the contrary, when the last parting came, she was nowhere to be found.

The Queen and Sir John Hainault proceeded to Dordrecht, and then embarked with all their followers—the fleet making a beautiful appearance. But soon a violent storm arose, and for two days they were in danger of being wrecked. At length the sailors decried the coast of England, and they landed without knowing where they were. They had suffered much, and Isabelle drooped under such fatigues and dangers. After giving a day or two to rest they began their march. A long and dreary one it was over hill and dale, now and then coming to scattered villages; at length they saw a large monastery, and here they determined to halt. The order of Black Friars came out to receive them, and would not part with them till they were fully refreshed. It now began to be rumored abroad

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

that Isabelle had arrived with a powerful army, and the lords who were friendly to her hastened to join her. She learned that the King and Sir Hugh Spencer were at Bristol. The Queen, with her son and Sir John Hainault and all her followers, marched directly for that place. They were received every where with acclamations and joy, and the army rapidly increased; indeed, so greatly was it augmented that all England seemed to be of her side.

The royal monarch had shut himself up in a strong castle surrounded by the sea. The King, perhaps, never less desirous to see the "wife of his bosom" than now, and she on her part seemed to have had as little inclination to renew her intercourse with him.

The Queen and her party besieged Bristol, and the inhabitants finding they could not hold out under such circumstances, surrendered, giving up Sir Hugh Spencer and those most obnoxious to the Queen.

As for the King, he endeavored to escape, but was brought back to Bristol and delivered to the Queen as a prisoner. She ordered him to Berkeley Castle where he was strictly confined—but every proper attention paid him.

The Queen and her son, with Sir John Hainault, and all their followers, proceeded to London. They were received by the people with the utmost delight. We regret to say what executions took place, but it could hardly be otherwise. Sir Hugh Spencer was among the number.

The citizens presented splendid gifts to Isabelle, and after seeing her restored to her kingdom, Sir Hugh Hainault declared he must return home. The Queen used every entreaty to persuade him to remain at least till after Christmas, and he, unable to refuse, at length consented; but there were goings on at the court which hinted that he had remained too long for his own and Isabelle's peace of mind; but history does not make any such record, and as he was several years younger than the Queen, we are greatly inclined to doubt it. Most of his followers returned home. It came now to be considered what should be done with the King, who had proved himself so unworthy to govern the kingdom. It was finally decided that he should be held a prisoner for life and young Edward be crowned in his stead.

Sir John agreed to remain till after the coronation, and all honor was paid to him by every man that bore a British heart. He was feasted by the nobles, and the ladies all strove who should do him most honor—but the time had now arrived when he must part from Isabelle, for he was invited to a great tournament that was to take place at Comdè. A melancholy parting it was, and though the Queen shed many tears, and all saw how deeply she felt, yet so high and noble was her bearing that not a word was uttered, and not a thought conceived against her fair fame.

"You know, my lords and ladies," said the Queen, "how much we owe to Sir John de Hainault and his noble brother; that aid and protection which my husband and brothers denied to me and my son, they granted, and, under God, have restored me to my kingdom. The King, Edward the Third, made not only Sir John but his Esquires valuable presents, and the knight departed loaded with the honors and gratitude of the nation. Most nobly did the diadem grace the brow of the youthful monarch—yet it soon became evident that care pressed upon his mind. "Mother," said he one day, "methinks we have not done all that was required to prove our gratitude to the Earl de Hainault." "Speak out my son," said Isabelle, "if aught remains for us to do, it shall be accomplished."

"He has three daughters," said Edward, the blood mantling to his brow; "ought they not to be mated with the highest nobles of our land?" "You forget, my son, he has four. I think you strangely passed over Philippa while we were there; Philippa, who would grace a diadem!"

"Think you so, my mother?" said Edward, with vivacity. "Then demand her for your son—for your Edward! She is the sole mistress of his heart, his first and only love!"

Shortly after this conversation, the King, the Queen, the Earl of Kent her brother, Henry Earl of Lancaster, and the whole council sent a deputation of Lords, Bishops and great men to beg that the Count of Hainault and Holland would send over one of his daughters to be wife of the King, and that that one might be Philippa. Edward privately gave him a line to the young lady, in which he promised to "love her more dearly than woman was ever loved, both on her own and her father's account."

Though all were in agreement at this proposal, it was necessary to get a dispensation from the Pope, on account of their being cousins-german. This was granted at Avignon. Preparations were made for the nuptials, and Philippa was married by a "procurator" which Edward sent over, as he could not be permitted to quit the kingdom. She landed with her suite at Dover, accompanied by Sir John de Hainault, the never-tiring friend of Isabelle. There they found Edward waiting their arrival. "Have I not redeemed my pledge?" said he, as he pressed his youthful bride to his heart. "Philippa we part no more!"

"How strangely young people manage these things," said Isabelle; "I never suspected that he loved Philippa!"

The Queen-mother gladly resigned her authority to the hands of her son, and devoted the remainder of her life to her younger children, living in domestic retirement. Her death preceded that of the King of France, who, dying without heirs in 1328, was succeeded by Philip of Valois, the peers and barons of France setting aside the rightful claim of Isabelle and her son, in virtue of the Salic law, and declaring that "the kingdom of France was of such great nobleness that it ought not to fall by succession to a female."

It may well be supposed that Edward did not patiently submit to this award, but contended for his right. The many wars that this law has occasioned France, and the blood which has been shed, is not our present theme—we close our sketch with Isabelle.

Should any one question the truth of this history, we refer them to Froissart, where they will find enough to authenticate it.

A CENTENARIAN.—The Centerville, Md. Times says that a free colored man, named Pompey Carpenter, died in the upper part of Caroline county, on the 18th ult., aged 106 years, leaving 13 children, 57 grand children, 68 great grand children, and 8 great great grand children—total 146 descendants.

He had so clear a voice, spoke with such distinctness and deliberation, and amid such silence, that every word he uttered was audible all over the crowd; and anything more unchristian, uncourteous, unfair toward his opponents, and calculated to excite toward them the hatred of the crowd, could hardly have been conceived. In what offensive and indecent terms he spoke of the Established Church and its ministers! of the aristocracy, ("those natural tyrants," he said,) and, indeed of all the best and time-hallowed institutions of dear, glorious old England—which might well blush to own such a creature as he, as one entitled by birth to call himself one of her sons! How he hailed the approaching downfall of priest craft and kingcraft!—"A new light," he said, "was diffusing itself over benighted mankind—it was the pure and steady light of REASON, and all filthy things were flying from before it." (immense cheers followed the announcement of so important and interesting a fact.) He said, "the Bible was a book of excellent common sense; and nothing but villainous priestcraft had attempted to torture and dislocate it into all sorts of fantastic mysteries, which led to rank idolatry and blasphemy, equally revolting to God and man." (Perceiving that this was going a little too rapidly ahead, from the coolness with which it was received, he dropped that subject altogether, and soon regained the ear of his audience, by descending in very declamatory and inflammatory terms upon the resplendent victory which the people had recently gained in the glorious Bill for giving Everybody Everything.) "They had burst their bonds with a noble effort; but their chains would be quickly re-riveted, unless they followed up their advantage, and never stopped short of crushing a heartless and tyrannical oligarchy; unless the people were now true to themselves, and returned to the House of Commons good men and true, to watch over the energies of reviving liberty, lest they should be strangled in their way—the remainder of the sentence was inaudible in the storm of applause which it excited.) Under these circumstances, Providence itself had pointed out an individual whom he was proud and happy to propose to their notice—(here he turned and bowed to Mr. Titmouse, who, plucking off his hat, bobbed in return, and blushed, amid the deafening cheers of all before them, to whom also he bowed repeatedly.) A gentleman who seemed—as it were—made for them; who, in his own person, might be said to afford a lively illustration of the regeneration of society—who, to borrow for a moment an absurd word from his opponents, had by a sort of miracle (with what an infernal emphasis he pronounced this word!) had been placed where he was, in his present proud position; who had totally and happily changed the whole aspect of affairs in the neighborhood, which had already become the scene of his profuse and yet discriminating generosity and hospitality; who stood in bright and bold relief from out a long gloomy line of ancestors, all of whom had lived and died in enmity to the people—also who had distinguished themselves by nothing except their bigotry and hatred of civil and religious liberty. Mr. Titmouse was the first of his ancient family to claim the proud title of—The Man of the People. (Here a voice called out, "three cheers for Mr. Titmouse!"—which were given spontaneously, and most effectively.) His "address" was worthy of him—it did equal honor to his head and his heart (it is impossible to describe the smile which here just glanced over the countenance of Mr. Gammon,)—touching nothing that it did not adorn—at once bold, comprehensive, uncompromising!—He had had the felicity of enjoying the acquaintance, he might venture perhaps to say the friendship, of Mr. Titmouse, since he had taken up his abode at the home of his ancestors, and very proud he was to be able to say so. He could assure the electors, from his own personal knowledge of Mr. Titmouse, that they would have cause to be proud of their future representative—of the choice which they were about to make. (Here the worthy speaker had some sudden misgivings as to the display likely to be made by Titmouse, when it came to his turn to address the electors:—so he added in rather a subdued tone)—It was true that they might not have, in Mr. Titmouse, a magpie in the House, (laughter;) a mere chatterer—much cry and little wool; they had had enough of mere speechifiers at St. Stephen's—but they would have a good working member, (cheers;) one always at his post in the hour of danger, (cheers;) a good committee-man, and one whose princely fortune rendered him independent of party and of the blandishments of power. In the language of the ancient poet (?) Mr. Mudflint would exclaim on such an occasion, "Facta, non verba quæro," (great cheering.) And now a word for his opponent, (groans.) He was a mere puppet, held in the hands of some one out of sight, (laughter)—it might be of a base old boroughmonger, (groans,) who sought to make Yatton a rotten borough, (hisses,) a stepping-stone to ascendancy in the county, (cries of "Will he, though, lad, eh?") who would buy and sell them like slaves, (hisses,) and would never rest satisfied till he had restored the intolerable old vassalage of feudalism, (groans and hisses here burst forth from that enlightened assemblage, at the idea of anything so frightful.) He meant nothing personally offensive to the honorable candidate—but was he worthy of a moment's serious notice? (great laughter.) Had he an opinion of his own? (loud laughter.) Had he not better, to use the language of a book that was much misunderstood, tarry at Jerusalem (!!!) till his beard was grown? Was he not, in fact, a nonentity, unworthy of a reasonable man's serious notice? Was he not reeking from Oxford, (groans,) that hot-bed of pedantic ignorance and venerable bigotry, (hisses,) surrounded by a dismal and lurid halo of superstition?"

Finer and finer was Mr. Mudflint becoming every moment as he warmed with his subject—but unfortunately his audience was beginning very unequivocally to intimate that they were quite satisfied with what they had already heard. A cry for instance was heard—"The rest of my discourse next Sunday!"—for the crowd knew that they were kept all this while from one of their greatest favorites, Mr. Going Gone, who had also himself been latterly rather frequently and significantly winking his eye and shrugging his shoulders. Mr. Mudflint, therefore, with feelings of vivid vexation, pique, and envy, concluded rather abruptly by proposing TITMUSE, ESQUIRE, of YATTON, as a fit and proper person to represent them in Parliament. Up went hats into the air, and shouts of the most joyous and enthusiastic description rent the air for several minutes. Then took off his hat the jolly Mr. Going Gone—a signal for roars of laughter, and cries of coarse and droll welcome, in expectancy of fun. Nor were they disappointed. He kept them in good-humor and fits of laughter during the whole of his "address;" and though destitute of any pretence to refinement, I must say that I could not detect any traces of real ill-nature in it. He concluded by seconding the nomination of Mr. Titmouse, amidst tumultuous cheers; and, after waiting for some few minutes in order that they might subside, Mr. Gold took off his hat, and essayed to address the crowd. Now he really was what he looked, an old man of unaffected and very great good-humor and benevolence; and that, too, was extensive and systematic. He had only the week before distributed soup, blankets, coals, and potatoes to two hundred poor families in the borough, even as had done at that period of the year for many years before. No tale of distress was ever told him in vain, unless palpably fictitious and fraudulent. The moment that his bare head, scantily covered with grey hairs, was visible, there arose, at a given signal from Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck, a dreadful hissing and hooting from all parts of the crowd. If he appeared disposed to persevere in addressing the two or three immediately around him, that only infuriated the mob against the poor old man, who bore it all, however, with great good humor and fortitude. But it was in vain. After some twenty minutes spent in useless efforts to make himself audible, he concluded, in mere dumb show, by proposing the Honorable Geoffrey Lovel Delamere, at the mention of whose name there again arose a perfect tempest of howling, hissing, groaning, and hooting. Then Mr. Milnthorpe came forward, determined not to be "put down." He was a very tall and powerfully-built man; bold and determined, with a prodigious power of voice, and the heart of a lion. "Now, lads, I'm ready to try which can tire the other out first!" he roared, in a truly stentorian voice, that was heard over all their uproar, which it redoubled. How vain the attempt! How ridiculous the challenge! Confident of his lungs, he smiled good-humoredly at the hissing and bellowing mass before him, and for half an hour persevered in his attempts to make himself heard. At length, however, without his having in the slightest degree succeeded, his pertinacity began to irritate the crowd, who, in fact, felt themselves being bullied, and that no crowd that ever I saw or heard of can bear for one instant; and what is one against so many? Hundreds of fists were held up and shaken at him. A missile of some sort or another was flung at him, though it missed him; and then the returning officer advised him to desist from his attempts, lest mischief should ensue; on which he shouted at the top of his voice, "I second Mr. Delamere!" and amidst immense groaning and hissing replaced his hat on his head, thereby owning himself vanquished, which the mob also perceiving, they burst into loud and long-continued laughter.

Now, Mr. Titmouse," said the returning officer; on hearing whose words the gentleman he addressed turned as white as a sheet of paper, and felt very much disposed to be sick. He pulled out of his coat-pocket a well-worn little roll of paper, on which was the speech which Mr. Gammon had prepared for him, as I have already intimated; and with a shaking hand unrolled it, casting at its contents a glance—momentary and despairing. What then would that little fool have given for memory, voice, and manner enough to "speak the speech that had been set down for him!" He cast a dismal look over his shoulder at Mr. Gammon, and took off his hat—Sir Harkaway clapping him on the back, exclaiming, "Now for 't, lad—have at 'em and away—never fear!" The moment that he stood bare-headed, and prepared to address the writhing mass of faces before him, he was greeted with a prodigious shout—hats, some waved, others flung into the air—and it was two or three minutes before the roar abated in the least. With fearful rapidity, however, every species of noise and interruption ceased—and a perfect silence prevailed. The sea of eager, excited faces—all turned towards him—was a spectacle that might for a moment have shaken the nerves of even a man—had he been "unaccustomed to public speaking." The speech, which—brief and simple as it was—he had never been able to make his own, even after copying it out half-a-dozen times, and trying to learn it off for an hour or two daily during the preceding fortnight, he had now utterly forgotten; and he would have given a hundred pounds to retire at once from the contest, or sink unperceived under the floor of the hustings.

"Begin! begin!" whispered Gammon, earnestly. "Ya—s—s—but—what shall I say?" stammered Titmouse.

"Your speech"—answered Gammon, impatiently. "I—I—pon my—soul—I've forgot every word of it!"

"Then read it," said Gammon, in a furious whisper—"Good God, you'll be hissed off the hustings!—Read from the paper, do you hear?" he added, almost gnashing his teeth.

Matters having come to this fearful issue, "Gentlemen," he commenced, faintly—

"Hear him! Hear, hear!—Hush! Ts! Ts!" cried the impatient and expectant crowd.

Now, I happen to have a short-hand writer's notes of every word uttered by Titmouse, together with an account of the reception it met with: and I shall here give the reader, first, Mr. Titmouse's real, and secondly, Mr. Titmouse's supposed speech, as it appeared two or three days afterward in the columns of the Yorkshire Sting.

Mr. Titmouse's REPORTED Speech.

"Silence having been restored, Mr. Titmouse said, that he feared it was but too evident that he was unaccustomed to scenes so exciting as the present one—that was one source of his embarrassment; but the greatest was, the enthusiastic reception with which he was honored, and of which he owned himself quite unworthy, (cheers.) He agreed with the gentleman who had proposed him in so very able and powerful a speech, (cheers.) that we had arrived at a crisis in our national history (cheering.)—a point at which it would be ruin to go back, while to stand still was impossible, (cheers;) and therefore, there was nothing for it but to go forward, (great cheering.) He looked upon the passing of the Bill for giving Everybody Everything, as establishing an entirely new order of things, (cheers.) in which the people have been roused to a sense of their being the only legitimate source of power, (cheering.) They had, like Samson, though weakened by the cruelty and torture of his tyrants, bound down and broken into pieces the gloomy fabric of aristocracy. The words 'Civil and Religious Liberty' were now no longer a by-word and a reproach, (cheers;) but, as was finely observed by the gentleman who so eloquently proposed him to their notice, the glorious truth had gone forth to the ends of the earth, that no man was under any responsibility for his opinions or his belief, any more than for the shape of his nose, (loud cheers.) A spirit of tolerance, amelioration and renovation, was now abroad, actively engaged in repairing our defective and dilapidated constitution, the relic of a barbarous age—with some traces of modern beauty, but more of ancient ignorance and unsightliness, (cheers.) The great Bill he alluded to had roused the masses into political being, and made them sensible of the necessity of keeping down a rapacious and domineering oligarchy. Was not the liberty of the press placed now upon an intelligible and imperishable basis? Already were its purifying and invigorating influences perceptible, (cheering)—and he trusted that it would never cease to direct its powerful energies to the demolition of the many remaining barriers to the improvement of mankind, (cheers.) The corn laws must be repealed, the taxes must be lowered, the army and navy reduced: vote by ballot and universal suffrage conceded, and the quarterly meeting of Parliament secured. He found that there were three words on his banner, which were worth a thousand speeches—Peace, Retrenchment, Reform—which had been happily observed by the gentleman who had so ably proposed him."

[And so, for a column more, in the course of which there were so many flattering allusions to the opening speech of the proposer of Titmouse, that it has often occurred to me as probable, that the "Reverend" Mr. Mudflut had supplied the above report of Mr. Titmouse's speech.]

With this Mr. Titmouse made a great number of very profound bows, and replaced his hat upon his head, amid prolonged and enthusiastic cheering, which, on Mr. Delamere's essaying to address the crowd, was suddenly converted into a perfect hurricane of hissing; like as we now and then find a shower of rain suddenly change into hail. Mr. Delamere stood the pitiless pelting of the storm with calmness, resolution, and good-humor. Ten minutes had elapsed, and he had not been allowed to utter one syllable audible to any one beyond four or five feet from him. Every fresh effort he made to speak caused a renewal of the uproar, and many very offensive and opprobrious epithets were applied to him. Surely this was disgraceful, disgusting! What had he done to deserve such treatment? Had he been guilty of offering some gross indignity and outrage to every person present, individually, could he have fared worse than he did? He had conducted his canvass with scrupulous and exemplary honor and integrity—with the utmost courtesy to all parties, whether adverse or favorable. He was surely not deficient in those qualities of head and of heart—of personal appearance, even, which usually secure man favor with his fellows. Who could lay anything to his charge—except that he had ventured to solicit the suffrages of the electors of Yatton, in competition with Mr. Titmouse? If men of a determined character and of princely means have to calculate upon such brutal usage as this, can those who sanction or perpetrate it wonder at bribery and other undue means being resorted to, in absolute self-defence? Is it meant to deter any one from coming forward that has not a forehead of brass, and heart of marble? After upwards of a quarter of an hour had been thus consumed, without Mr. Delamere's having been permitted to utter two consecutive sentences, though he stood up against it patiently and gallantly, the returning officer, who had often appealed to them in vain, earnestly besought Mr. Titmouse to use his influence with the crowd, in order to secure Mr. Delamere a moment's hearing.

"For my life—I—ch?" quoth Titmouse. "A likely thing! He'd do it for me, would n't he? Every man for himself—all fair at an election, eh, Gammon?"

"Do it, sir!" whispered Gammon, indignantly—"do it, and instantly—or you are not worthy the name of gentleman!"

Titmouse, on this, took off his hat, with a very bad grace, and addressing the crowd, said, "I—I—suppose you'll hear what he's got to say for himself, gents." But all was in vain: "Off! off! No!—Go home!—ah!—a—a—a—h!—St!—St!—Get away home with you, you young boroughmonger!—a—a—h!" came in louder and fiercer tones from the mob. Yet Mr. Delamere did not like to give up without another and a desperate effort to catch the ear of the mob; but while he was in the act of raising his right hand, and exclaiming—"Gentlemen, only a word or two—I pledge my honor that I will not keep you three minutes"—some barbarous miscreant, from the body of the crowd, aimed at him a stone, not a very large one to be sure, yet flung with very considerable force, and hit him just above the centre of the upper lip, which it cut open. He instantly turned pale, and applied to it his white pocket-handkerchief, which was speedily stained with blood which issued copiously from the wound, and must have greatly gratified the crowd. Still the gallant young fellow stood his ground with firmness, and the smile which he endeavored to assume was enough to have brought tears into one's eyes to witness. The instant that Gammon had seen the stone take effect, he rushed over toward where Mr. Delamere stood amidst his agitated friends, who were dissuading him from persevering in his attempt to address the crowd:

"You are severely hurt, sir!" exclaimed Gammon, with much agitation, taking off his hat with an air of earnest and respectful sympathy. Then he turned with an air of excitement toward the crowd, who seemed shocked into silence by the incident which had taken place, and were uttering increasing cries of "shame! shame!"

"Shame!—shame, shame, indeed, gentlemen"—he exclaimed, vehemently—"Where is that atrocious miscreant? In the name of Mr. Titmouse, who is too much agitated to address you himself, I conjure you to secure that abominable ruffian, and let him be brought to justice! If not, Mr. Titmouse protests solemnly that he will withdraw from the election."

"Bravo, Titmouse! bravo! Spoke like a man!" exclaimed several voices. A desperate struggle was soon perceived about that quarter where the man who flung the stone must have been standing; he had been seized, and being in a trice most severely handled, a couple of men almost throttled him with the tightness of their grasp about his neck—these two the very men who had encouraged him to perpetrate the outrage!—and, amidst a shower of kicks and blows, he was hauled off, and deposited, half dead, in the cage.

"Three cheers for Delamere!" cried a voice from the crowd; and never had a more vehement shout issued from them than in response to that summons.

"Delamere! Delamere!—Hear him!—Speak out!—Delamere!" cried a great number of voices of people growing more and more excited as they beheld his handkerchief becoming suffused with blood. But he was not in a condition then to respond to their call. He was suffering really not a little pain; and moreover, his feelings had for a moment—just for a moment—given way, when he adverted to the possibility that Lady de la Zouch might have witnessed the outrage, or received exaggerated accounts of it. Mr. St. Aubyn, however, stood forward in Mr. Delamere's stead, and in a very feeling and judicious but brief address, roused the feelings of the crowd to a high pitch of sympathy for Mr. Delamere, who stood beside him, hat in hand—vehemently, and at length successfully, struggling to repress his rising emotions. If only one out of a hundred of those present had had a vote, this little incident might have changed the fate of the election. The returning officer then proceeded to call for a show of hands, on which a very great number were held up in favor of Mr. Titmouse; but when Mr. Delamere's name was called, it really seemed as if every person present had extended both his hands—there could be no mistake, no room for doubt. Titmouse turned as pale as a sheet, and gazed with an expression of ludicrous consternation at Gammon, who also looked, in common indeed with his whole party, not a little disconcerted. The returning officer, having procured silence, declared that the choice of the electors had fallen upon Mr. Delamere, on which a tremendous cheering followed, which lasted for several minutes; and, luckily recollecting the utter nullity of a show of hands as a test or evidence, either way, of the result of the election, Mr. Gammon directed Mudflut formally to demand a poll on behalf of Mr. Titmouse; on which the returning officer announced that the poll would take place at eight o'clock the next morning; and thereupon the day's proceedings closed. Mr. Delamere, in a very few words, returned thanks to the electors for the honor which they had conferred upon him, and entreated them to go early to the polls. He and his friends then left the hustings. His procession quickly formed; his band struck up with extraordinary energy and spirit—"See the conquering hero come!" but the rolling of the drums, the clashing of cymbals, the rich deep tones of the bassoons, trombones, and French horns, and clear and lively tones of flute and clarinet, were quite overpowered by the acclamations of the crowd which attended them to Mr. Delamere's committee-room. Sir Percival Pickering, throwing open the bow-window of the committee-room, addressed a word or two to the immense crowd, and then, having given three lusty cheers, they withdrew. A glass of weak wine and water quickly refreshed the spirits of Mr. Delamere, and a surgeon having arrived, found it necessary only to direct that a little piece of court-plaster should be applied to the upper lip, assuring him that by the morning no disfiguring traces of the accident would be visible.

As for Mr. Crafty, as soon as he heard what had taken place, he uttered, as he felt bound to do, a few casual expressions of sympathy; but what passed through his thoughts, as he resumed his seat before his papers, was—"What a pity that all those fellows had not had votes, and that the poll had not commenced instantly!" The truly unexpected issue of the day's proceedings, while it elevated the spirits of all Mr. Delamere's friends, produced only one effect upon the imperturbable Mr. Crafty; he strongly suspected that the other side would probably be resorting during the night to measures of a desperate and unscrupulous description, in order to counteract the unfavorable impression calculated to be effected by the defeat of Mr. Titmouse at the show of hands. As for that gentleman, by the way, he became very insolent toward Mr. Gammon on reaching the committee-room, and protested, with fury in his face, that it had all been brought about by the "cursed officious meddling with Mr. Titmouse's name before the mob after the stone had been thrown;" on hearing which, "Go on to the Hall, sir, dine, and get drunk if you choose," said Gammon, bitterly and peremptorily; "I shall remain all night. Powerful as are your energies, they require relaxation after the fatigues of the day!" and with a very decisive, but not violent degree of force, Titmouse was in a twinkling in the outer committee-room. Mr. Gammon had, indeed, as much serious work before him that night as Mr. Crafty, and prepared for secret and decisive action every whit as calmly and effectively as he. Mr. Crafty's arrangements were admirable. During the day he had parcelled out the borough into a number of small departments, each of which he committed to some steady and resolute friend of Mr. Delamere, who was to look after every elector in his division about whom there was the least fear, in respect either of apprehended violent abduction, or of treachery. These gentlemen were to be relieved at intervals; and from one to the other of them, perpetually, were the personal agents of Crafty to go their rounds, in order to see that all was right, and carry any intelligence to head quarters. Then others were intrusted with the ticklish and tiresome duty of watching the movements of the enemy in quarters where Crafty had sure information of intended operations during the night. Complete arrangements had been made, also, for bringing up voters at the poll at the exact times, and in the manner, which might on the morrow be determined on by Mr. Crafty. Names were noted down of those to whom the bribery oath was to be administered. Prudent as were these precautions, they did not entirely prevent the mischief against which they were levelled. As the night wore on, evidence was, from time to time, brought in to Mr. Crafty that the enemy were at work—at their expected tricks.

"The show of hands," says Lord Stowell, in Ankeny v. Senger, 1 Hag. Com. Rep. 133, "is only a rude and imperfect declaration of the sentiments of the electors."

"Jabob Jolliffe is missing. Wife says she knows nothing about him. Inquire."

"Send at least a couple of men to watch Peter Jiggins, or he'll be out of the way when he's wanted."

"Haste—haste. G. Atkins and Adam Hutton, both safe ten minutes ago, are off; enticed out into a post-chaise—gone toward York.—(Half-past eleven.)"

"Send some one to Jolly Snobs to watch the treating going on. Most important. Mr. Titmouse has been there, and drunk a glass of rum with them."

Then more mysterious missives made their appearance from Mr. Crafty's own familiars.

"Q. C. S. H. O.—12."—(i. e. "The Quaint Club still holds out.—Twelve o'clock.")

"Q. C. G. W.— $\frac{1}{2}$  p. 1."—(i. e. "The Quaint Club are going wrong.—Half-past one o'clock.")

"S. B.; G. O.  $\frac{1}{2}$  p. 1.— $\frac{1}{2}$  p. 2."—(i. e. "I have seen Bran. Gammon offers ten pounds, in addition to the ten pounds already given.—They hesitate.—A quarter to two o'clock.")

"3 heard S. B. & M. w. B. O. Q. C. 12—3."—(i. e. "Three of our people have just overheard and seen Bloodsuck and Mudflut, with Bran, offering the Quaint Club twelve pounds.—Three o'clock.")

"Q. C. G. R. w. Y. & C. T. T. Y. M. S. I.—4."—(i. e. "The Quaint Club are getting restive with you, and coming to terms with Titmouse. You must stir instantly.—Four o'clock.")

" $\Delta\Delta$  10 m. 4."—The mysterious symbols caused Mr. Crafty instantly to beat himself. He changed color a little, and went into the adjoining room. The meaning of the communication was—Great danger to both parties.

In the adjoining room, where two candles were burning down in their very sockets, and the fire nearly out, were some four or five trusty friends of Mr. Delamere—gentlemen who had placed themselves entirely at Mr. Crafty's service throughout the night. When he entered, they were all nearly asleep, or at least dozing. Beckoning two of them into his own room, he instructed one of them to go and plant himself openly, as conspicuously as possible, near the door of Mr. Titmouse's committee-room, so as not to fail of being recognized by any one leaving or entering it, as a well-known friend of Mr. Delamere's; in fact, they were to discover that their motions were watched. The other he instructed to act similarly opposite the door of a small house, in a narrow court—the residence, in fact, of Ben Bran, where all the night's negotiations with the Quaint Club had been carried on. Immediately afterward Mr. Crafty felt it his duty, as between man and man, to warn his opponent of the mortal peril in which he was placed; and found means to convey the following note into the committee-room where Mr. Gammon and one or two others were sitting:

"Take care!! You are deceived! betrayed! Q. C. is sold out and out to the Blues!! And part of the bargain, that B. B. shall betray you into bribery in the presence of witnesses—not one man of the club safe; this have just learnt from the wife of one of them. From a well-wishing friend, but obligated to vote (against his conscience) for the Blues."

P. S.—Lord D. in the town with lots of the needful, and doing business sharply."

While Mr. Gammon and his companions were canvassing this letter, in came the two gentlemen who had been watched, in the way I have stated, from Ben Bran's house to Mr. Titmouse's committee-room, pale and agitated, with intelligence of that fact. Though hereat Gammon's color deserted his cheek, he affected to treat the matter very lightly, and laughed at the idea of being deluded by such boy's play. If Lord de la Zouch had hired Crafty only to play tricks like these, he might as well have saved the trouble and expense. Here a slight bustle was heard at the door; and the ostler made his appearance, saying that a man had just given him what he produced to Mr. Gammon, who, taking from the ostler a dirty and ill-folded paper, read as follows:—

"To Squire Titmouse you Are All Wrong, the blues is wide Awake All Night and now all, Lord Dillysough about with One hundred Spies; And look Out for traitors in the Camp. A friend or Enemy as you Will, but loving Fair Play."

"Poh!" exclaimed Gammon, flinging it on the table contemptuously.

Now, I may as well mention here, that about nine o'clock in the evening, Mr. Parkinson brought to Crafty sure intelligence that a very zealous and influential fellow, who was entirely in the confidence of the enemy, had come to him a little while before, and candidly disclosed the very melancholy position of his financial affairs; and Mr. Parkinson happened to be in a condition to verify the truth of the man's statement; that there was a writ out against him for £250, and unless he could meet it he would have to quit the country before day-break, and his very promising prospects in business would be utterly ruined. Mr. Parkinson happened to know these matters professionally; and, in short, Crafty was given to understand, that so disgusted was Mr. M'Do'em with Whig principles (his inexorable creditor being a Whig) and practices, such as the bribery, treating, and corruption at that moment going on, that—his conscience pricked him—and—ahem!—the poor penitent was ready to make all the amends in his power by discovering villany to its intended victims. Crafty having felt the ground pretty safe underneath him, took upon himself to say, that Mr. M'Do'em need be under no further apprehension as to his pecuniary liabilities; but, in the meanwhile, he would certainly wish for a little evidence of the bona fides of his present conduct.

"Come," quoth M'Do'em, after receiving a pregnant wink from Mr. Crafty—"send some one whom you can rely upon with me immediately, to do as I bid him—and let him tell you."

No sooner said than done. A trusty managing clerk of Mr. Parkinson's forthwith accompanied M'Do'em on a secret expedition. They stood at a window, with a broken pane. 'Twas a small ill-furnished kitchen, and in the corner, close to the fire, sat smoking a middle-aged man, in a paper cap. Opposite to him sat two persons, in very earnest conversation with him. They were Mr. Mudflint and Mr. Bloodsuck, Junior.

"Come, come, that's decidedly unreasonable," quoth the former.

"No, Sir, it isn't. It quite cut me to the heart, I assure you, sir, to see Master Delamere so dreadfully used—my good missus, that 's in bed, says to me—says she—"

"But what had Mr. Titmouse to do with it, you know?" said Mudflint, taking out of his pocket a bit of crumpled paper, at which the man addressed gazed listless, and exclaimed, "No it won't do.—He did n't deserve such treatment, poor young gentleman." (Here Bloodsuck and Mudflint whispered—and the latter, with a very bad grace, produced a second bit of crumpled paper.)

"That's something like"—said the man, rather more good-humoredly.

"Now, mind, by a quarter past eight—eh?" inquired Mudflint, very anxiously, and somewhat sullenly.

"I'm in a man of my word—no one can say I ever broke it in earnest; and as for a straight forward bit o' business like this, I say, I'm your man—so here 's my hand."

"Do n't that look rather like business?" inquired M'Do'em, in a whisper, after they had lightly stepped away. "But come along!"

After another similar scene, the two returned to the Hare and Hounds, and the matter was satisfactorily settled between Crafty and M'Do'em—one hundred down, and the rest on the morning after the election. He was to poll for Titmouse, and that, too, early in the day; and be as conspicuous and active as possible in his exertions in behalf of that gentleman—to appear, in short, one of his most staunch and confidential supporters. Whether Lord de la Zouch or his son would have sanctioned such conduct as this, had they had an inkling of it, I leave to the reader to conjecture; but Crafty was easy about the matter—'twas only manœuvring; and all weapons are fair against a burglar or highwayman; and all devices against a swindler. M'Do'em gave Crafty a list of nine voters at Griston, who had received five pounds a-piece; and enabled him to discover a case of wholesale treating, brought home to one of the leading members of Mr. Titmouse's committee. Well, this worthy capped all his honorable services, by hurrying in to Gammon, some quarter of an hour after he had received the second anonymous letter, and with a perfect appearance of consternation, after carefully shutting the door, and eyeing the window, faltered that all was going wrong—traitors were in the camp;—that Lord de la Zouch had bought every man of the Quaint Club two days before, at £30 a-head! half already paid down, the rest to be paid on the morning of the fifteenth day after Parliament had met—(M'Do'em said he did not know what that meant; but Gammon was more influenced and alarmed by it than anything else that had happened;—) that Ben Bran was playing false, having received a large sum—though how much M'Do'em had not yet learned—as head money from Lord de la Zouch; and that, if one single farthing were, after that moment, paid or promised to any single member of the club, either by Mr. Titmouse, or any one on his behalf, they were all delivered, bound hand and foot, into the power of Lord de la Zouch, and at his mercy. That so daring and yet artful was Lord de la Zouch, that his agents had attempted to tamper with even him, M'Do'em! but so as to afford him not the least hold of them. Moreover, he knew a fellow townsman who would, despite all his promises to the liberal candidate, poll for Delamere; but nothing should induce him—M'Do'em—to disclose the name of that person, on account of the peculiar way in which he—M'Do'em—had come to know the fact. On hearing all this, Gammon calmly made up his mind for the worst; and immediately resolved to close all further negotiation with the Quaint Club. To have acted otherwise would have been mere madness, and courting destruction. The more he reflected on the exorbitant demand of the Quaint Club—and so suddenly exorbitant, and enforced by such an insolent sort of quiet pertinacity, the more he saw to corroborate—that that occurred to him as necessary—the alarming intelligence of M'Do'em. Mr. Gammon concealed much of his emotion; but he ground his teeth together with the effort. Toward six o'clock, there was a room full of the friends and agents of Titmouse; to whom Gammon, despite all that had happened, and which was known to only four or five of those present, gave a highly encouraging account of the day's prospects, but impressed upon them all, with infinite energy, the necessity for caution and activity. A great effort was to be made to head the poll from the first, in order at once to do away with the prestige of the show of hands; and the "friends of Mr. Titmouse," (i. e. the ten pounds' worth of mob,) were to be in attendance round the polling booth at seven o'clock, and remain there the rest of the day, in order, by their presence, to encourage and protect (!) the voters of Mr. Titmouse. This and one or two other matters having been thus arranged, Mr. Gammon, who was completely exhausted with his long labor, retired to a bed-room, and directed that he should, without fail, be called in one hour's time. As he threw himself on the bed, with his clothes on, and extinguished his candle, he had at least the consolation of reflecting, that nine of the enemy's voters were safely stowed away, (as he imagined,) and that seven or eight of the accessibles, pledged to Mr. Delamere, had promised to re-consider the matter.

If Gammon had taken the precaution of packing the front of the polling-booth in the way I have mentioned, Mr. Crafty had not overlooked the necessity of securing efficient protection for his voters; and between seven and eight o'clock, no fewer than between four and five hundred stout yeomen, tenants of Lord de la Zouch and others of the surrounding nobility and gentry, made their appearance in the town, and insinuated themselves into the rapidly accumulating crowd; many of them, however, remaining at large, at the command of Mr. Delamere's committee; in order, when necessary, to secure safe access to the poll for those who might require such assistance. It was strongly urged upon Mr. Crafty to bring up a strong body of voters at the commencement, in order to head the polling at the end of the first hour. "Not the least occasion for it," said Crafty quietly—"I do n't care a straw for it: in a small borough no end can be gained, where the voters are so few in number that every man's vote is secured long beforehand, to a dead certainty. There's no prestige to be gained or supported. No. Bring up first all the distant and most uncertain voters—the timid, the feeble, the wavering; secure them early, while you have time and opportunity. Again, for the first few hours poll languidly: it may render the enemy over easy. You may perhaps make a sham rush of about twenty or thirty, between twelve and one o'clock, to give them the idea that you are doing your very best. Then fall off, poll a man now and then only, and see what they will do, how they are playing off their men. If you can hang back till late in the day, then direct, very secretly and cautiously, the bribery oath and the questions to be put to each of their men as they come up; and while you are thus picking their men off, pour in your own before they are aware of your game, and the hour for closing the poll may perhaps arrive while some dozen or so of their men are unpollled. "But above all, gentlemen," said Crafty, "every one to his own work only. One thing at a time throughout the day, which is quite long enough for all you have to do. Do n't try to bring up several at once; if you have one ready, take him up at once and have done with him. Do n't give yourselves the least concern about ascertaining the numbers that have polled, but only those that have yet to be polled: the returns I will look after. Let those stand behind the check-clerks, who are best acquainted with the names, persons, and circumstances of the voters who come up, and can detect imposture of any sort before the vote is recorded and the mischief done. The scoundrel may be thus easily kept off the poll-books whom it may cost you a thousand pounds hereafter to attempt to remove, in vain."

The day was bright and frosty; and long before eight o'clock, the little town was all alive with music, flags, cheering, and crowds passing to and fro. The polling-booth was exceedingly commodious and well constructed, with a view to the most rapid access and departure of the voters. By eight o'clock there were more than a thousand persons collected before the booth; and, significant evidence of the transient nature of yesterday's excitement, the yellow colors appeared as five to one. Just before eight o'clock up drove Mr. Titmouse in a dog-cart, from which he jumped out amidst the cheers of almost all present, and skipped on to the bench, behind his own check-clerk, with the intention of remaining there all day to acknowledge the votes given for him. But Mr. Delamere, with a just delicacy and pride, avoided making his appearance either at or near the booth, at all events till the voting was over. The first vote given was that of Obadiah Holt, the gigantic landlord of the Hare and Hounds, and for Mr. Delamere, the event announced by a tremendous groan; but no one of the crowd ventured any personal incivility to the laughing giant that passed through them. A loud cheer, as well as a sudden bobbing of the head on the part of Titmouse, announced that the second vote had been recorded for him; and, indeed, during the next twenty minutes he polled fifteen for Delamere's eight. At nine o'clock the poll stood thus:

Titmouse.....	31
Delamere.....	18
Majority.....	13
Steadily adhering to Mr. Crafty's system, at ten o'clock the poll stood:
Titmouse.....	53
Delamere.....	29
Majority.....	24
At eleven o'clock:
Titmouse.....	89
Delamere.....	41
Majority.....	48
At twelve o'clock—
Titmouse.....	94
Delamere.....	60
Majority.....	34
At one o'clock—
Titmouse.....	129
Delamere.....	84
Majority.....	45

At this point they remained stationary for some time; but Delamere had polled all his worst votes, Titmouse almost all his best. The latter had, indeed, only seventeen more in reserve, independently of the Quaint Club, and the still neutral twenty accessibles; while Delamere had yet, provided his promises stood firm, and none of his men were hounded or kidnapped, forty-five good men and true—and some faint hopes, also, of the aforesaid twenty accessibles. For a quarter of an hour, not one man came up for either party; but at length two of Delamere's leading friends came up, with faces full of anxiety, and recorded their votes for Delamere, amidst loud laughter. About half past one o'clock, a prodigious—and I protest that it was both to Lord de la Zouch and Mr. Delamere a totally unexpected—rush was made on behalf of Delamere, consisting of the twenty accessibles; who, in the midst of yelling, and hissing, and violent abuse, voted one after another for Delamere. Whether or not a strong pressure had been resorted to by some zealous and powerful gentlemen in their neighborhood, but entirely independent of Mr. Delamere, I know not; but the fact was as I have stated. At two o'clock the poll stood thus:

Titmouse.....	145
Delamere.....	134

Majority.....11
Thus Titmouse had then polled within one of his positive reserve, and yet was only eleven above Delamere, who had still fifteen men to come up!

"Where is the Quaint Club?" began to be more and more frequently and earnestly asked among the crowd; but no one could give a satisfactory answer; and more than one conjecture was hazarded, as to the possibility of their coming up under blue colors. But—where were they? Watching the state of the poll, and under marching orders for the moment when the enemy should be at his extremity? Between two o'clock and a quarter past, not one vote was polled on either side; and the crowd, wearied with their long labors of hissing and shouting, looked dispirited, listless, exhausted. By-and-by Mr. Gammon, and Messrs. Bloodsuck, (senior and junior,) Mudflint, Centipede, Ginblossom, Going Gone, and others, made their appearance in the booth, around Titmouse. They all looked sour, and depressed, and fatigued. Their faces were indeed enough to sadden and silence the crowd. Were Mr. Titmouse's forces exhausted? "Where's the Quaint Club?" roared out a man in the crowd, addressing Mr. Gammon, who smiled wretchedly in silence. The reason of his then appearing at the polling-booth was certainly the one first suggested; but he had another; for he had received information that within a short time Dr. Tatham, and also fourteen of the Yutton tenantry, were coming up to the poll. Mr. Gammon, accordingly, had not stood there more than five minutes, before a sudden hissing and groaning announced the approach of a blue—in fact, it proved to be little Dr. Tatham, who had been prevented from earlier coming up, through attendance on one or two sick parishioners. It cost the quiet, stout-hearted old man no little effort, and occasioned him a little discomposure, elbowed, and jolted, and insulted as he was; but at length there he stood before the poll-clerks—who did not require to ask him his name or residence. Gammon gazed at him with folded arms, and a stern and sad countenance. Presently, inclining slightly toward Mudflint, he seemed to whisper in that gentleman's ear; and—"Administer the bribery oath," said he to the returning officer, eagerly.

"Sir!" exclaimed that functionary, in a low tone, with amazement—"The bribery oath! To Dr. Tatham? Are you in earnest?"

"Do your duty, sir!" replied Mudflint, in a bitter, insulting tone.

"I regret to say, sir, that I am required to administer the bribery oath to you," said the returning officer.

"What? What? The bribery oath? To me?" inquired Dr. Tatham, giving a sudden start, and flushing violently: at which stringent evidence of his guilt—

"Ah, ha!" cried those of the crowd nearest to him—"Come, old gentleman! Thou must bolt it now!"

"Is it pretended to be believed," faltered Dr. Tatham, with visible emotion—"that I am bribed?" But at that moment his eye happened to light upon the exulting countenance of "the Reverend" Mr. Mudflint. It calmed him. Removing his hat, he took the Testament into his hand, while the crowd ceased hooting for a moment, in order to hear the oath read; and with dignity he endured the indignity. He then recorded his vote for Mr. Delamere; and after fixing a sorrowful and surprised eye on Mr. Gammon, who stood with his hat slouched a good deal over his face, and looking in another direction, withdrew; and as he turned his mild and venerable face toward crowd, the hissing subsided.

Shortly afterward came up, amidst great uproar, several of the tenantry of Mr. Titmouse—all of them looking as if they had come up, poor souls! rather to receive punishment for a crime, than to exercise their elective franchise in a free country. Gammon colored a little, took out his pocket-book and pencil, and fixing on the first of the tenantry, Mark Hackett, the eye at it were of a suddenly-revived serpent, wrote down his name in silence—but what an expression was in his face! Thus he acted toward every one of those unhappy and doomed persons; replacing his pocket-book whence he had taken it, as soon as the last of the little body had polled. It was now a quarter to three o'clock, (the poll closing finally at four,) and thus stood the numbers:

Delamere.....	149
Titmouse.....	146
Majority.....	3

On these figures being exhibited by an eager member of Mr. Delamere's committee, there arose a tremendous uproar among the crowd, and cries of "Tear it down! Tear it down! Ah! Bribery and corruption! Three groans for Delamere! O—h! o—h! o—h!" Matters seemed, indeed, getting desperate with the crowd; yet they seemed to feel a sort of comfort in gazing at the stern, determined, yet chagrined countenance of the ruling spirit of the day, Mr. Gammon. He was a "deep hand"—he knew his game; and, depend upon it, he was only waiting till the enemy was clean done, and then he would pour in the Quaint Club, and crush them for ever. Thus thought hundreds in the crowd. Not a vote was offered for a quarter of an hour; and the poll clerks, with their pens behind their ears, employed the interval in munching sandwiches, and drinking sherry out of a black bottle—the crowd cutting many jokes upon them while thus pleasantly engaged. Symptoms were soon visible, in the increasing proportion of blue rosettes in and about the crowd, that this promising state of things was reviving the hopes of Mr. Delamere's party, while it as plainly depressed those in the yellow interest. Not for one moment, during the whole of that close and exciting contest, had Mr. Crafty quitted his little inner apartment, where he had planned the battle, and conducted it to its present point of success. Nor had his phlegmatic temperament suffered the least excitement or disturbance: cold as ice though his heart might be, his head was ever clear as crystal. Certainly his strategy had been admirable. Vigilant, circumspect, equal to every emergency, he had brought up his forces in perfect order throughout the day; the enemy had not caught the least inkling of his real game. By his incessant, ingenious, and safe manœuvring, he had kept that dreaded body, the Quaint Club, in play up to this advanced period of the day—in a state of exquisite embarrassment and irresolution, balancing between hopes and fears; and he had, moreover, rendered a temporary reverse on the field upon which he then fought, of little real importance, by reason of the measures he had taken to cut off the enemy entirely in their very next move. He was now left entirely alone in his little room, standing quietly before the fire with his hands behind him, with real composure, feeling that he had done his duty, and awaiting the issue patiently. The hustings, all this while, exhibited an exciting spectacle. Another quarter of an hour had elapsed without a single vote being added to the poll. The crowd was very great, and evidently experiencing no little of the agitation and suspense experienced by those within the booth—(except Mr. Titmouse, whose frequent potations of brandy and water during the day, had composed him at length to sleep—as he leaned, absolutely snoring, against the corner of the booth, out of sight of the crowd.) The poll clerks were laughing and talking unconcernedly together. The leading Blues mastered strongly in their part of the booth; elated undoubtedly, but with the feelings of men who have desperately fought their way, inch by inch, sword to sword, bayonet to bayonet, up to a point where they expect, nevertheless, momentarily to be blown into the air. What could have become of the Quaint Club? thought they also, with silent astonishment and apprehension. Gammon continued standing, motionless and silent, with folded arms—his dark surtout buttoned carelessly at the top, and his hat slouched over his eyes, as if he sought to conceal their restlessness and agitation. Excitement—intense anxiety—physical exhaustion—were visible in his countenance. He seemed indisposed to speak, even in answer to any one who addressed him.

"O cursed Quaint Club! O cursed Crafty! I am beaten—beaten hollow—ridiculously. How the miscreants have bubbled me! Crafty can now do without them, and won't endanger the election by polling them! We are ruined! And what will be said at head quarters, after what I have led them to believe—bah!"—he almost stamped with the vehemence of his emotions. "There's certainly yet a resource; nay, but that also is too late—a riot—a nod, a breath of mine—those fine fellows there—down with hustings—poll books destroyed. No, no; it is not to be thought of—the time's gone by."

It was now nearly a quarter past three, the poll closing at four. "It's passing strange!" thought Gammon, as he looked at his watch; "what can be in the wind? Not a man of them up! Perhaps, after all, Lord de la Zouch may not have come up to their mark, and may now be merely standing on the chance of our being unable to come to terms with them. But what can I do, without certain destruction, after what I have heard? It will be simply jumping down into the pit." A thought struck him; and with forced calmness he slipped away from the polling booth, and with an affectation of indifference, made his way to a house where a trusty emissary awaited his orders. "T was a Grilston man, a yellow voter, as much at Gammon's beck and call as Ben Bran was represented to be at the command of Lord de la Zouch. Gammon dispatched him on this enterprise—to rush alarmedly among the club, who knew him, but not his devotion to Gammon—to tell them that he had just discovered, by mere accident, the frightful danger in which they were placed, owing to Mr. Gammon's being enraged against them on account of their last proposal—that he had now made up his mind to the loss of the election, and also to commence prosecution for bribery against every single member of the club; for that, having early suspected foul play, he was in a position "to nail every man of them," without fixing himself or Mr. Titmouse. If he succeeded thus far, viz. in alarming them—then, after apparently dire perplexity, he was suddenly to suggest one mode of at once securing themselves, and flogging their bitter enemy, Gammon; viz. hasten up to the poll without a word to any one, and, by placing Titmouse at the top of the poll, destroy Gammon's motive for commencing his vindictive proceedings, and so take him in his own trap. Gammon then returned to the polling booth, (having named the signal by which he was to be apprized of success,) and resumed his former position, without giving to any one near him the slightest intimation of what he had been doing. If he imagined that any movement of his, at so critical a moment, had not been watched, he was grievously mistaken. There were three persons whose sole business it had been, during the whole of that day, to keep a lynx eye upon his every movement, especially as connected with the Quaint Club. But his cunning emissary was equal to the exigency; and having (unseen) reconnoitred the street for a few moments, he imagined he detected one, if not two spies, lurking about. He therefore slipped out of a low back window, got down four or five back yards, and so across a small hidden alley, which enabled him to slip unperceivedly into the back room of the house he wished.

"Ben! Ben!" he gasped, with an air of consternation.

"Hallo, man! what is it?" quoth Ben.

"Done! every man of you sold! Mr. Gammon turned tail on you. Just happened to overhear him swear a solemn oath to Mr. Muddflint, that before four-and-twenty hours—"

"Lord!—you, did you really?"

"So help me—!" exclaimed the man, aghast.

"What's to be done?" quoth Ben, the perspiration hurrying out all over his forehead. "We've been made the cursest fools of by some one. Hang me if I think the old beast at Fotheringham, or the young cub either, has ever meant—"

"What signifies it? It's all too late now."

"Is n't there any way, eh? To be sure, I own I thought we were pitched a little too high with Mr. Gam."

"But he has you now, though; and you'll find he's a devil incarnate. But stop, I see"—he seemed as if a thought had suddenly glanced across his puzzled and alarmed mind—"I'll tell you how to do him, and save yourselves yet."

"O Lord! eh?" exclaimed Ben, breathlessly.

"But are they all together?"

"Oh, ay! In five minutes' time we could all be on our way to the booth."

"Then do n't lose a minute—or all's lost! Do n't explain to them the fix they're in till all's over; and if ever you tell 'em, or any one, the bit of service I've—"

"Never, Thomas, so help me—!" quoth Ben, grasping his companion's hand as in a vice.

"Off all of you to the booth, and poll for life and death, for Titmouse."

"What? Come—come, Master Thomas!"

"Ay, ay—you fool! Do n't you see? Make him win the election, and then in course Gammon's no cause to be at you—he'll have got all he wants."

"My eyes!" exclaimed Ben, as he suddenly perceived the stroke of policy. He snapped his finger, buttoned his coat, popped out of the house—within a few moments he was in the midst of the club, who were all in a back yard, behind a small tavern which they frequented. "Now, lads!" he exclaimed, with a wink of his eye. He took the yellow and the blue colors out of his bosom; returned the blue and mounted the yellow: so in a trice did every one present, not one single question having been asked of Ben, in whom they had perfect confidence.

But, to return to Gammon. It was now a moment or two past the half hour—there was scarcely half an hour more before the election must close. The mob were getting sulky. The Quaint Club were being asked for—now with hisses, then with cheers. All eyes were on Gammon, who felt that it was so. His face bore witness to the intensity of his emotions; he did not even attempt to disguise his desperate disappointment. His nerves were strung to their highest pitch of tension; and his eye glanced incessantly, but half closed, toward a corner house at a little distance: ah! it was suddenly lit up, as it were, with fire—never was such an instantaneous change seen in a man's face before. He had at length caught the appointed signal; a mat appeared at a window, and waved a little stick through it. A mighty sigh escaped from the pent-up bosom of Gammon, and relieved him from a sense of suffocation. His feelings might have been compared to those excited in our great commander, when the Prussians made their appearance at Waterloo. The battle was won; defeat converted into triumph; but suddenly recollecting himself—aware that every muscle of his face was watched—he relapsed into his former gloom. Presently were heard the approaching sounds of music—nearer and nearer came the clash of cymbals, the clangor of trombone and trumpet, the roll of the drum: all the crowd turned their faces toward the quarter whence the sounds came, and within a few seconds time were seen turning the corner, full on its way to the booth, the banner of the Quaint Club, with yellow rosettes streaming from the top of each pole—yellow ribbons on every one's breast. THE PEOPLE'S CAUSE HAD TRIUMPHED! Their oppressors were prostrate! A wild and deafening shout of triumph burst from the crowd as if they had been one man; and continued for several minutes intermingling with the inspiring sounds of the noble air—"Rule Britannia!" played by the two bands, (that of Mr. Titmouse having instantly joined them.) On marched the club, two and two, and arm in arm, with rapid step; their faces flushed with excitement and exultation—their hands vehemently shaken by the shouting crowd, who opened a broad lane for them up to the polling booth. Oh, the contrast exhibited in the faces of those standing there! What profound gloom, what vivid vexation, rigid despair, on the one hand—what signs of frantic excitement, joy, and triumph on the other! "Titmouse!" cried the first member of the club, as he gave his vote; "Titmouse!" cried the second; "Titmouse!" cried the third; "Titmouse!" cried the fourth. The battle was won. Mr. Titmouse was in a majority, which went on increasing every minute amidst tremendous cheering. Mr. Gammon's face and figure would at that moment have afforded a study for a picture; the strongly repressed feeling of triumph yet indicating its swelling influence upon his marked and expressive countenance, where an accurate eye might have detected also the presence of anxiety. Again and again were his hands shaken by those near him. Blood-uck, Centipede, Muddflint, Going Gone, Gimblossom, as they enthusiastically gave him credit for the transcendent skill he had exhibited, and the glorious result it had secured. As the church clock struck four, the books were closed, the election was declared at an end, with eighteen of Mr. Titmouse's votes yet unpolled. Within a few minutes afterward Mr. Going Gone hastily chalked up on the board, and held it up, exultingly to the crowd:

Titmouse, .....	237
Delamere, .....	149
Majority, .....	88!

"Hurrah!—hurrah!—hip, hip, hip, hurrah!" pealed from the crowd; while hands were upraised and whirled round, hats flung into the air, and every other mark of popular excitement exhibited. "Titmouse!—Titmouse!—NINE TIMES NINE FOR MR. TITMOUSE!" was called for, and responded to with thrilling and overpowering effect. The newly elected member, however, could not be pinched, or shaken, or roused, out of the drunken stupor into which, from the combined influence of liquor and excitement, he had sunk. To enable him to go through the responsible duties of the day—viz. bobbing his head every now and then to the worthy and independent electors who came to invest him with the proud character of their representative in the house of Commons—he had brought in his pocket a flask of brandy, which had been thrice replenished: in a word, the popular idol was decidedly not presentable; and under the impulse of strong excitement, Mr. Gammon, infinitely to the disgust of the Reverend Smirk Muddflint, who was charged up to his throat with combustible matter, and ready to go off at an instant's notice, stepped forward, and on removing his hat, was received with several distinct and long-continued rounds of applause. Silence having been at length partially restored—

"Yes, gentlemen," he commenced, in an energetic tone and with an excited and determined air and manner, "well may you utter those shouts of joy, for you have fought a noble fight and won a glorious victory, (great cheering.) Your cause, the cause of freedom and good government, is triumphant over all opposition, (immense cheering.) The hideous forms of bigotry and tyranny are at this moment lying crushed and writhing, (vehement cheering rendered the rest of the sentence inaudible.) Gentlemen, truth and independence have this day met and overthrown falsehood and slavery, (cheers,) in spite of the monstrous weapons with which they came into the field, (groans)—bribery, (groans), corruption, (groans), intimidation, (hisses), coercion and treachery, (mingled groans and hisses.) But, gentlemen, thank God, all was in vain! (enthusiastic cheering.) I will not say that a defeated despot is at this moment sitting with sullen scowl in a neighboring castle ( tremendous shouts of applause;) all his schemes frustrated, a l his gold scattered in vain, and trampled under foot by the virtuous electors whom he sought first to corrupt, and then to degrade into slaves, (great cheering.) Gentlemen, let us laugh at his defeat, (loud and prolonged laughter;) but let us rejoice like men, like freemen, that the degraded and execrable faction to which he belongs is defeated, (cheering.)—Gentlemen, if ever there was a contest in which public spirit and principle triumphed over public and private profligacy, this has been it; and by this time tomorrow, hundreds of constituencies will be told, as their own struggles are approaching, to look at Yatton—to emulate her proud and noble example; and England will soon be enabled to thro' off the hateful incubus that has so long oppressed her, (immense cheering.) But, gentlemen, you are all exhausted, (No! no! and vehement cheers;) we are all exhausted, after he great labor and excitement of this glorious day, and need repose, in order that on the morrow we may meet refreshed to enjoy the full measure of our triumph, (cheering.) In particular, your distinguished representative, Mr. Titmouse, worn out with the excitement of the day, long depressed by the adverse aspect of the poll, was so overpowered with the sudden and glorious change effected by that band of patriots who—(the rest of the sentence was drowned in cheering.) Gentlemen, he is young, and unaccustomed to such extraordinary and exciting scenes, (hear, hear, hear!) but by the morrow he will have recovered sufficiently to present himself before you, (cheers.) In his name, gentlemen, I do from my soul thank you for the honor which you have conferred upon him, and assure you that he considers any past success with which Providence may have blessed him (hear, hear, hear!) as nothing, when compared with the issue of this day's struggle, (cheering.) Rely upon it that his conduct in Parliament will not disgrace you, (no, no, no!) And now, gentlemen, I must conclude, trusting that with victory will cease animosity, and that there will be an immediate declaration of those feelings of frank and manly cordiality, and good feeling, which ought to distinguish free fellow-citizens, and above all, is signally characteristic of Englishmen, (cheering.) Shake hands, gentlemen, with a fallen enemy, (we will, we will!) and forget, when you have conquered, that you ever fought!"

With these words, uttered with the fervor and eloquence which had indeed distinguished the whole of his brief address, he resumed his hat, amidst "three times three for Mr. Titmouse!"—"three times three for Mr. Gammon!"—"nine times nine groans for Mr. Delamere!"—all of which were given with tumultuous energy. The two bands approached; the procession formed; the nearly insensible Titmouse, his face deadly pale and hat awry, was partly supported and partly dragged along between Mr. Gammon and Mr. Going Gone; and to the inspiring air of "See the Conquering Hero comes," and accompanied by the cheering crowd, they all marched in procession to Mr. Titmouse's committee-room. He was hurried up stairs; then led into a bed-room; and there, soon, alas! experienced the overmastering power of sickness, which instantly obliterated all recollection of his triumph, and made him utterly unconscious of the brilliant position to which he had just been elevated—equally to the honor of himself and his constituency, who justly and proudly regarded as the glorious first-fruits to them of the glorious "Bill for giving Everybody Everything."

"TITLLEBAT TITMOUSE, Esq., M. P."

At a late hour that night, an interview took place between Ben Bran and Mr. Gammon, of which all that I shall say at present is, that it was equally confidential and satisfactory. There can be no harm, however, in intimating that Mr. Gammon made no allusion to the arrival of the Greek kalends: but he did to—the fifteenth day after the meeting of Parliament. He satisfied Ben—and through him the Quaint Club—that Lord de la Zouch's agents had been only deluding them, and had laid a deep plan for ensnaring the club—which Gammon had early seen through, and endeavored to defeat. A little circumstance which happened some two or three days afterwards, seemed to corroborate the truth of at least a portion of his statements—viz. eight prosecutions for bribery were brought against some members of the Quaint Club: and on their hastily assembling to consult upon so startling an incident, one still more so, came to light;—five leading members were not to be found. Writs in actions for penalties of £500 each, were on the same day served upon—Barnabas Bloodsuck, Smirk Muddflint (otherwise called the Reverend Smirk Muddflint,) Cephas Woodhouse, and—woe is me that I should have it to record!—"OILY GAMMON, gentleman, one of the attorneys of our lord the king, before the king himself, at Westminster." The amount claimed from him was £4000; from Bloodsuck £3000; and from Muddflint £2500, which would, alas, have alone absorbed all the few rents of his little establishment for one hundred years to come, if his system of moral teaching should so long live. What was the consternation of these gentlemen to discover, when in their turn they called a private meeting of their leading friends, that one of them also was missing, viz., Julian M'Dorm! Moreover, it was palpable that amidst an ominous silence and calmness on the other side—even on the part of the True Blue—the most guarded and systematic and persevering search for evidence was going on, and with all Gammon's self-possession, the sudden sight of Mr. Crafty stealthily quitting the house of an humble Yellow voter, a week after the election, occasioned him somewhat sickening sensations. Gammon was not unaccustomed to wade in deep waters; but these were very deep!

However, a great point had been gained. Mr. Titmouse was M. P. for Yatton; and Mr. Gammon had maintained his credit in high quarters, where he stood pledged as to the result of the election; having been long before assured that every member returned into the new Parliament was worth his weight in gold. Such were the thoughts passing through the acute and powerful mind of Gammon, as he sat late one night alone at Yatton, Mr. Titmouse having retired to his bed-room half stupefied with liquor, and anxious to complete matters by smoking himself to sleep. The wind whistled cheerlessly round the angle of the Hall in which was situated the room where he sat, his feet resting on the fender, his arms folded, and his eyes fixed on the fire. Then he took up the newspaper, recently arrived from town, which contained a report of his speech to the electors at the close of the poll; it was the organ of the Whig party—the Morning Grouse; and its leading article commented in very encomiastic terms upon his address, "given in another part of the paper." His soul heaved with disgust at the thoughts of his own dissimulation;—"Independence!" "Purity of Election!" "Public Principle!" "Triumph of Principle!" "Popular enthusiasm!" "Man of the people!" Look, thought he—ugh—at Titmouse! Is representation an utter farce—a mere imaginary privilege of the people? If not, what but public swindlers are we who procure the return of such idiots as—faugh! Would I had been on the other,——He rose, sighed, lit his chamber candle, and retired—to bed, but not to rest; for he spent several hours in endeavouring to retrace every step which he had taken in the election—with a view to ascertaining how far it could be proved that he had legally implicated himself. The position in which, indeed, he and those associated with him in the election were placed, was one which required his most anxious consideration, with a view, not merely to the retention of the seat so hardly won, but to the tremendous personal liabilities with which it was sought to fix him. The inquiries which he instituted into the practices which he had been led to believe prevailed openly upon the other side, led to no satisfactory results. If the enemy had bribed, they had done so with consummate skill and caution. Yet he chose to assume the air of one who thought otherwise; and gave directions for writs for penalties to be forthwith served upon Mr. Parkinson, Mr. Gold, Mr. St. Aubyn, and Mr. Milnthorpe—all of whom, as indeed he had expected, only laughed at him. But it was woefully different as regarded himself and his friends; for before Mr. Crafty took his departure from Yatton, he had collected a body of evidence against all of them, of the most fearful stringency and completeness. In fact, Lord de la Zouch had determined that, if it cost him ten thousand pounds more, he would spare no effort, as well to secure the seat for his son, as to punish those who had been guilty of the atrocious practices which had been revealed to him.

Need I say with what intense interest, with what absorbing anxiety, the progress of this contest had been watched by the Aubreys? From Lady de la Zouch and other friends, but more especially from Dr. Tatham, who had regularly forwarded the True Blue, and also written frequent and full letters, they had learned, from time to time, all that was going on. Mr. Aubrey had prepared them for the adverse issue of the affair; he had never looked for any thing else; but could he or any of them feel otherwise than a painful and indignant sympathy with the little Doctor, on reading his account of the gross insult which had been offered to him at the hustings? Kate, before she had read half of it, sprang from her chair, threw down the letter, cried bitterly, then kissed the venerable Doctor's hand-writing, and walked to and fro, flashing lightning from her eyes, as her vivid fancy painted to her with painful distinctness that scene of wanton and brutal outrage, on one of the most gentle, benevolent, and spotless of God's creatures, whose name was associated in all their minds with every thing that was pious, pure, and good—indeed they were all powerfully affected. As for the Reverend Smirk Mudflint—"Presumptuous wretch!" quoth Kate, as her flashing eye met that of her brother; and he felt that his feelings, like her own, could not be expressed. The first account she received of the outrage perpetrated on Delamere was in the columns of the True Blue, which, being published that evening, had been instantly forwarded to town by Dr. Tatham. It blanched her cheek; she then felt a mist coming over her eyes—a numbness—a faintness ensued, and she sank upon the sofa and swooned. It was a long while after she had recovered before a flood of tears relieved her excitement. "T was no use disguising matters, even had she felt so disposed, before those who felt so exquisite and vivid a sympathy with her; and who did not restrain their ardent and enthusiastic expressions of admiration at the spirited and noble manner in which Delamere had commenced and carried on his adventure. At whose instance, and to please whom, had it been really undertaken? Kate's heart fluttered intensely at the bare notion of seeing him again in Vivian-street. He would come—she felt—with a sort of claim upon her!—And he made his desired and dreaded appearance some days afterward quite unexpectedly. Kate was playing on the piano and did not hear his knock; so that he was actually in the drawing-room before she was aware of his being in London, or had formed the slightest expectation of such a thing.

"Heavens, Mr. Delamere!—Is it you!" she stammered, rising from the piano, her face having suddenly become pale.

"Ay, sweet Kate—unless I am become some one else, as—the rejected of Yatton!"—he replied fondly, as he grasped her hands fervently in his own, and led her to the sofa.

"Do n't—do n't—Mr. Delamere!"—said she faintly, striving to release one of her hands, which she instantly placed before her eyes to conceal her rising and violent emotion. Her brother and Mrs. Aubrey considerably came to her relief, by engaging Delamere in conversation. He saw their object; and releasing Miss Aubrey, for the present, from his attentions, soon had entered into a long and very animated account of all his Yatton doings. In spite of herself, as it were, Kate drew near the table, and, engrossed with interest, listened, and joined in the conversation, as if it had not been actually DELAMERE who was sitting beside her.—He made very light of the little accident of the wounded lip—but as he went on, Kate looked another way, her eyes obstructed with tears, and her very heart yearning toward him. "Oh, Mr. Delamere!"—she suddenly and vehemently exclaimed—"what wretches they were to use you so!"—and then blushed scarlet. Shortly afterward Mr. Aubrey went down-stairs to fetch up one of Doctor Tatham's letters for a particular purpose; and—what will my lady readers say?—I—in fact, it is useless mincing matters,—Delamere, who was sitting next to Kate, thought that no time was like the present—she never looked so beautiful—he threw his arms round her, and kissed her white forehead half-a-dozen times—

"Fie, fie, Mr. Delamere!" said Mrs. Aubrey, slightly coloring, but not with a very angry air—"are these the tricks you have learned at Yatton?"

"Pray, Mr. Delamere—I beg—I entreat of you—do n't!"—quoth Kate, striving vehemently to detach his arms from her waist, which she barely succeeded in doing before her brother re-entered the room. The faces of all three of them burned like fire—and if Aubrey suspected anything, he said nothing, but was soon engaged with the letter he had gone in quest of.

"Well—see if I'm not M. P. for Yatton, yet!"—said Delamere, with a confident air, just before he rose to go—"and that within a few weeks, too; and then!"

"Do n't be too sure of that," said Aubrey gravely. "Sure? I've no more doubt of it," replied Delamere briskly, "than I have of our now being in Vivian Street—if there be the slightest pretence to fairness in a committee of the House of Commons. Why, upon my honor, we've got no fewer than eleven distinct, unequivocal!"

"If election committees are to be framed of such people as appear to have been returned!"— * * *

Lockhart's Spanish Ballads.

THE PROCLAMATION OF KING HENRY.

The following ballad, taking up the story just where it is left in the preceding one, gives us the Proclamation and Coronation of Don Henry, surrounded, from the courtesy of his manners, El Caballero, and the grief of Pedro's lovely and unhappy mistress, Maria de Padilla. From its structure and versification, I have no doubt it is of much more modern origin than most of those in the first Cañonero.

The picture which Maria gives us of Don Pedro, the hero of so many atrocious and tragical stories, is to me very striking. "He was pale of complexion," says the historian; "his features were high and well formed, and stamped with a certain authority of majesty, his hair red, his figure erect, even to stiffness; he was bold and determined in action and in council; his bodily frame sank under no fatigues, his spirit under no weight of difficulty or of danger. He was passionately fond of hawking, and all violent exercises."

In the beginning of his reign, he administered justice among private individuals with perfect integrity. But even then were visible in him the rudiments of those vices which grew with his age, and finally led him to his ruin; such as a general contempt and scorn of mankind, an insatiable tongue, a proud and difficult ear; even to those of his household. These faults were discernible even in his tender years; to them, as he advanced in life, were added avarice, dissolution in luxury, an utter hardness of heart, and a remorseless cruelty."—[Mariana, Book xvi. ch. 16.]

The reader who understands the German language, will find almost the whole of Don Pedro's history clothed in a strain of glowing and elegant poetry, in a very recent performance of the Baron de la Motte Fouquet. See his "Bertrand Du Guesclin, historisches rittergedicht."—Leipz., 1822.

Yet had he not been Pedro's Cain, his Cain had Pedro been.

At first, in silence down her cheek the drops of sadness roll,
But rage and anger come to break the sorrow of her soul;
The triumph of her haters—the gladness of their cries,

In her hot cheek the blood mounts high, as she stands gazing

ALUMINOUS SALTS.—The body of Gen. Wayne, who died 30 or 40 years ago, at Erie, Pa., and was buried near the Lake, was recently disinterred and removed by his son, and was found to be in a very perfect state of preservation.
Those who had known Gen. Wayne, recognized his features at once. This extraordinary preservation is accounted for in Silliman's Journal, by the fact, that the body had been buried in argillaceous soil, strongly impregnated with a solution of Alum.—[Albany D. Adv.]

BARNABY RUDGE

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XV.

At noon next day, John Willet's guest sat lingering over his breakfast in his own home, surrounded by a variety of comforts, which left the Maypole's highest flight and utmost stretch of accommodation at an infinite distance behind, and suggested comparisons very much to the disadvantage and disfavor of that venerable tavern.

In the broad, old-fashioned window-seat—as capacious as modern sofas, and cushioned to serve the purpose of a luxurious settee—in the broad old-fashioned window-seat of a roomy chamber, Mr. Chester lounged, very much at his ease, over a well furnished breakfast-table. He had exchanged his riding-coat for a handsome morning-gown, his boots for slippers; had been at great pains to atone for the having been obliged to make his toilet when he rose without the aid of dressing-case and tiring equipage; and, having gradually forgotten through these means the discomforts of an indifferent night and an early ride, was in a state of perfect complacency, indolence, and satisfaction.

The situation in which he found himself, indeed, was particularly favorable to the growth of these feelings; for, not to mention the lazy influence of a late and lonely breakfast, with the additional sedative of a newspaper, there was an air of repose about his place of residence peculiar to itself, and which hangs about it, even in these times, when it is more bustling and busy than it was in the days of yore.

There are still, worse places than the Temple, on a sultry day, for basking in the sun or resting idly in the shade. There is yet a drowsiness in its courts, and a dreamy dullness in its trees and gardens; those who pace its lanes and squares may yet hear the echoes of their footsteps on the sounding stones, and read upon its gates, in passing from the tumult of the Strand or Fleet street, "Who enters here leaves noise behind." There is still the splash of falling water in fair Fountain Court, and there are yet nooks and corners where dun-haunted students may look down from their dusty garrets, on a vagrant ray of sunlight patching the shade of the tall houses, and seldom troubled to reflect a passing stranger's form. There is yet, in the Temple, something of a clerkly monkish atmosphere, which public offices of law have not disturbed, and even legal firms have failed to scare away. In summer time, its pumps suggest to thirsty idlers, springs cooler, and more sparkling, and deeper than other wells; and as they trace the spillings of full pitchers on the heated ground, they snuff the freshness, and, sighing, cast sad looks toward the Thames, and think of baths and bays, and saunter on, despondent.

It was in a room in Paper Buildings—a row of goodly tenements, shaded in front by ancient trees, and looking, at the back, upon Temple Gardens—that this, our idler, lounged; now taking up again the paper he had laid down a hundred times; now trifling with the fragments of his meal; now pulling forth his golden toothpick, and glancing leisurely about the room, or out at window into the trim garden-walks, where a few early loiterers were already pacing to and fro. Here a pair of lovers met to quarrel and make up; there a dark-eyed nursery maid had better eyes for Templars than her charge; on this hand an ancient spinster, with her lapdog in a string, regarded both enormities with scornful sidelong looks; on that a weazen old gentleman, ogling the nursery maid, looked with like scorn upon the spinster, and wondered she did not know she was no longer young. Apart from all these, on the river's margin, two or three couple of business-talkers walked slowly up and down in earnest conversation; and one young man sat thoughtfully on a bench, alone.

"Ned is amazingly patient!" said Mr. Chester, glancing at this last named person as he set down his teacup and plied the golden toothpick, "immensely patient! He was sitting yonder when I began to dress, and has scarcely changed his posture since. A most eccentric dog!"

As he spoke, the figure rose, and came toward him with a rapid pace.

"Really, as if he had heard me," said the father, resuming his newspaper with a yawn. "Dear Ned!"

Presently the room-door opened, and the young man entered; to whom his father gently waved his hand, and smiled.

"Are you at leisure for a little conversation, sir?" said Edward.

"Surely, Ned. I am always at leisure. You know my constitution. Have you breakfasted?"

"Three hours ago."

"What a very early dog!" cried his father, contemplating him from behind the toothpick, with a languid smile.

"The truth is," said Edward, bringing a chair forward, and seating himself near the table, "that I slept but ill last night, and was glad to rise. The cause of my uneasiness cannot but be known to you, sir; and it is upon that, I wish to speak."

"My dear boy," returned his father, "confide in me, I beg. But you know my constitution—don't be prosy, Ned."

"I will be plain, and brief," said Edward.

"Do not say you will, my good fellow," returned his father, crossing his legs, "or you certainly will not. You are going to tell me—"

"Plainly this, then," said the son, with an air of great concern, "that I know where you were last night—from being on the spot, indeed—and whom you saw, and what your purpose was."

"You do not say so!" cried his father. "I am delighted to hear it. It saves us the worry, and terrible wear and tear of a long explanation, and is a great relief for both. At the very house! Why did not you come up? I should have been charmed to see you."

"I knew that what I had to say would be better said after a night's reflection, when both of us were cool," returned the son.

"Fore Gad, Ned," rejoined the father, "I was cool enough last night. That detestable Maypole! By some infernal contrivance of the builder, it holds the wind, and keeps it fresh. You remember the sharp east wind that blew so hard five weeks ago? I give you my honor it was rampant in that old house last night, though out of doors there was a dead calm. But you were saying—"

"I was about to say, Heaven knows how seriously and earnestly, that you have made me wretched, sir. Will you hear me gravely for a moment?"

"My dear Ned," said his father, "I will hear you with the patience of an anchorite. Oblige me with the milk." "I saw Miss Haredeale last night," Edward resumed, when he had complied with this request; "her uncle, in her presence, immediately after your interview, and, as of course you know, in consequence of it, so bade me the house, and, with circumstances of indignity, which are of your creation I am sure, commanded me to leave it on the instant."

"For his manner of doing so, I give you my honor, Ned, I am not accountable," said his father. "That you must excuse. He is a mere boor, a log, a brute, with no address in life.—Positively a fly in the jug. The first I have seen this year."

Edward rose, and paced the room. His imperturbable parent sipped his tea.

"Father," said the young man, stopping at length before him, "we must not trifle in this matter. We must not deceive each other, or ourselves. Let me pursue the manly open part I wish to take, and do not repel me by this unkind indifference."

"Whether I am indifferent or no," returned the other, "I leave you, my dear boy, to judge. A ride of twenty-five or thirty miles, through many roads—a Maypole dinner—a tête-à-tête with Haredeale, which, vanity apart, was quite a Valentine and Orson business—a Maypole bed—a Maypole landlord, and a Maypole retinue of idiots and centaurs—whether the voluntary endurance of these things looks like indifference, dear Ned, or like the excessive anxiety, and devotion, and all that sort of thing, of a parent, you shall determine for yourself."

"I wish you to consider, sir," said Edward, "in what a cruel situation I am placed. Loving Miss Haredeale as I do—"

"My dear fellow," interrupted his father with a compassionate smile, "you do nothing of the kind. You do not know anything about it. There is no such thing, I assure you. Now, do take my word for it. You have good sense, Ned—great good sense. I wonder you should be guilty of such amazing absurdities. You really surprise me."

"I repeat," said his son firmly, "that I love her. You have interposed to part us, and have, to the extent I have just now told you of, succeeded. May I induce you, sir, in time, to think more favorably of our attachment, or is it your intention and your fixed design to hold us asunder if you can?"

"My dear Ned," returned his father, taking a pinch of snuff and pushing his box toward him, "that is my purpose, most undoubtedly."

"The time that has elapsed," rejoined his son, "since I began to know her worth, has flown in such a dream that until now I have hardly once paused to reflect upon my true position. What is it? From childhood I have been accustomed to luxury and idleness, and have been bred as though my fortune were large, and my expectations almost without a limit. The idea of wealth has been familiarized to me from my cradle. I have been taught to look upon those means, by which men raise themselves to riches and distinction, as being beyond my heading, and beneath my care. I have been, as the phrase is, liberally educated, and am fit for nothing. I find myself at last wholly dependent upon you, with no resource but in your favor. In this momentous question of my life we do not, and it would seem we never can, agree. I have shrunk instinctively alike from those to whom you have urged me to pay court, and from the motives of interest and gain which have rendered them in your eyes visible objects for my suit. If there never has been such much plain-speaking between us before, sir, the fault has not been mine, indeed. If I seem to speak too plainly now, it is, believe me, father, in the hope that there may be a franker spirit, a worthier reliance, and a kinder confidence between us in time to come."

"My good fellow," said his smiling father, "you quite affect me. Go on, my dear Edward, I beg. But remember your promise. There is great earnestness, vast candor, a manifest sincerity in all you say, but I fear I observe the faintest indications of a tendency to prose."

"I am very sorry, sir."

"I am very sorry too, Ned, but you know that I cannot fix my mind for any long period upon one subject. If you'll come to the point at once, I'll imagine all that ought to go before, and conclude it said. Oblige me with the milk again. Listening, invariably makes me feverish."

"What I would say, then, tends to this," said Edward. "I cannot bear this absolute dependence, sir, even upon you. Time has been lost and opportunity thrown away, but I am yet a young man, and may retrieve it. Will you give me the means of devoting such abilities and energies as I possess, to some worthy pursuit? Will you let me try to make for myself an honorable path in life? For any term you please to name—say for five years if you will—I will pledge myself to move no further in the matter of our difference without your full concurrence. During that period, I will endeavor earnestly and patiently, if ever you did, to open some prospect for myself, and free you from the burden you fear I should become if I married one whose worth and beauty are her chief endowments. Will you do this, sir? At the expiration of the term agreed upon, let us discuss this subject again. Till then, unless it is revived by you, let it never be renewed between us."

"My dear Ned," returned his father, laying down the newspaper at which he had been glancing carelessly, and throwing himself back in the window-seat, "I believe you know how very much I dislike what are called family affairs, which are only fit for plebeian Christmas days, and have no manner of business with people of our condition. But as you are proceeding upon a mistake, Ned—altogether upon a mistake—I will conquer my repugnance to entering on such matters, and give you a perfectly plain and candid answer, if you will do me the favor to shut the door."

Edward having obeyed him, he took an elegant little knife from his pocket, and paring his nails, continued: "You have to thank me, Ned, for being of good family; for your mother, charming person as she was, and almost broken-hearted, and so forth, as she left me, when she was prematurely compelled to become immortal—had nothing to boast of in that respect."

"Her father was at least an eminent lawyer, sir," said Edward.

"Quite right, Ned; perfectly so. He stood high at the bar, had a great name and great wealth, but having risen from nothing—I have always closed my eyes to the circumstance, and steadily resisted its contemplation, but I fear his father dealt in pork, and that his business did once involve cow-hell and sausages—he wished to marry his daughter into a good family. He had his heart's desire, Ned. I was a younger son's younger son, and I married her. We each had our object and gained it. She stepped at once into the politest and best circles, and I stepped into a fortune which I assure you was very necessary to my comfort—quite indispensable. Now, my good fellow, that fortune is among the things that have been. It is gone, Ned, and has been gone—how old are you? I always forget."

"Seven-and-twenty, sir."

"Are you indeed?" cried his father, raising his eyelids in a languishing surprise. "So much! Then I should say, Ned, that as nearly as I remember, its skirts vanished from human knowledge about eighteen or nineteen years ago. It was about that time when I came to live in these chambers (once your grandfather's, and bequeathed by that extremely respectable person to me), and commenced to live upon an inconsiderable annuity and my part-reputation."

"You are jesting with me, sir," said Edward.

"Not in the slightest degree, I assure you," returned his father, with great composure. "These family topics are so extremely dry, that I am sorry to say they do not admit of any such relief. It is for that reason, and because they have an appearance of business, that I dislike them so very much. Well! You know the rest. A son, Ned, unless he is old enough to be a companion—that is to say, unless he is some two or three and twenty—is not the kind of thing to have about one. He is a restraint upon his father, his father is a restraint upon him, and they make each other mutually uncomfortable. Therefore, until within the last four years or so—I have a poor memory for dates, and if I mistake, you will correct me in your own mind—you pursued your studies at a distance, and picked up a great variety of accomplishments. Occasionally we passed a week or two together here, and disconcerted each other as only such near relations can. At last you came home. I candidly tell you, my dear boy, that if you had been awkward and overgrown, I should have exported you to some distant part of the world."

"I wish with all my soul you had, sir," said Edward.

"No you do not, Ned," rejoined his father, coolly; "you are mistaken, I assure you. I found you a handsome, prepossessing, elegant fellow, and I threw you into the society I can still command. Having done that, my dear fellow, I consider that I have provided for you in life, and rely on your doing something to provide for me in return."

"I do not understand your meaning, sir."

"My meaning, Ned, is obvious—I observe another fly in the cream-jug, but have the goodness not to take it out as you did the first, for their walk when their legs are milky, is extremely ungraceful and disagreeable—my meaning is, that you must do as I did; that you must marry well and make the most of yourself."

"A mere fortune-hunter!" cried the son, indignantly.

"What in the devil's name, Ned, would you be?" returned the father. "All men are fortune-hunters, are they not? The law, the church, the court, the camp—see how they are all crowded with fortune-hunters, jostling each other in the pursuit. The Stock-Exchange, the pulpit, the counting-house, the royal drawing room, the Senate—what but fortune-hunters are they filled with? A fortune-hunter! Yes. You are one; and you would be nothing else, my dear Ned, if you were the greatest courtier, lawyer, legislator, prelate, or merchant, in existence. If you are squeamish and moral, Ned, console yourself with the reflection, that at the worst your fortune-hunting can make but one person miserable or unhappy. How many people do you suppose these other kinds of huntsmen crush in following their sport—hundreds at a step? Or thousands?"

The young man leant his head upon his hand, and made no answer.

"I am quite charmed," said the father, rising, and walking slowly to and fro—stopping now and then to glance at himself in a mirror, or survey a picture through his glass, with the air of a connoisseur, "that we have had this conversation, Ned, unpromising as it was. It establishes a confidence between us which is quite delightful, and was certainly necessary, though how you can ever have mistaken our position or designs, I must confess I cannot understand. I conceived, until I found your fancy for this girl, that all these points were tacitly agreed upon between us."

"I knew you were embarrassed, sir," returned the son, raising his head for a moment, and then falling into his former attitude, "but I had no idea we were the beggarly wretches you describe. How could I suppose it, bred as I have been; witnessing the life you have always led; and the appearance you have always made?"

"My dear child," said the father—"for you really talk so like a child that I must call you one—you were bred upon a careful principle; the very manner of your education, I assure you, maintained my credit surprisingly. As to the life I lead, I must lead it, Ned—I must have these little refinements about me. I have always been used to them, and I cannot exist without them. They must surround me, you observe, and therefore they are here. With regard to our circumstances, Ned, you may set your mind at rest upon that score. They are desperate. Your own appearance is by no means despicable, and our joint pocket-money alone devours our income. That's the truth."

"Why have I never known this before? Why have you encouraged me, sir, to an expenditure and mode of life to which we have no right or title?"

"My good fellow," returned his father more compassionately than ever, "if you made no appearance, how could you possibly succeed in the pursuit for which I destined you? As to our mode of life, every man has a right to live in the best way he can; and to make himself as comfortable as he can, or he is an unnatural scoundrel."

Our debts, I grant, are very great, and therefore it the more behoves you, as a young man of principle and honor, to pay them off as speedily as possible."

"The villain's part," muttered Edward, "that I have unconsciously played! I to win the heart of Emma Har-dale! I would, for her sake, I had died first!"

"I am glad you see, Ned," returned his father, "how perfectly self-evident it is, that nothing can be done in that quarter. But apart from this, and the necessity of your speedily bestowing yourself on another (as you know you could to-morrow, if you chose), I wish you'd look upon it pleasantly. In a religious point of view, alone, how could you ever think of uniting yourself to a Catholic, unless she was amazingly rich? You ought to be so very Protestant, coming of such a Protestant family as you do. Let us be moral, Ned, or we are nothing. Even if one could set that object aside, which is impossible, we come to another which is quite conclusive. The very idea of marrying a girl whose father was killed, like meat! Good God, Ned, how disagreeable! Consider the impossibility of having any respect for your father-in-law, under such unpleasant circumstances—think of his having been 'viewed' by jurors, and 'sat upon' by coroners, and of his very doubtful position in the family ever afterwards. It seems to me such an delicate sort of thing that I really think the girl ought to have been put to death by the state to prevent its happening. But I leave you perhaps. You would rather be alone? My dear Ned, most willingly. God bless you. I shall be going out presently, but we shall meet to-night, or if not to-night, certainly to-morrow. Take care of yourself in the mean time, for both our sakes. You are a person of great consequence to me, Ned—of vast consequence indeed. God bless you!"

With these words, the father, who had been arranging his cravat in the glass, while he uttered them in a disconnected careless manner, withdrew, humming a tune as he went. The son, who had appeared so lost in thought as not to hear or understand them, remained quite still and silent. After the lapse of half an hour or so, the elder Chester, gaily dressed, went out. The younger still sat with his head resting on his hands, in what appeared to be a kind of stupor.

CHAPTER XVI.

A series of pictures representing the streets of London in the night, even at the comparatively recent date of this tale, would present to the eye something so very different in character from the reality which is witnessed in these times, that it would be difficult for the beholder to recognise his most familiar walks, in the altered aspect of little more than half a century ago.

They were, one and all, from the broadest and best to the narrowest and least frequented, very dark. The oil and cotton lamps, though regularly trimmed twice or thrice in the long winter nights, burnt feebly at the best; and at a late hour, when they were unassisted by the lamps and candles in the shops, cast but a narrow track of doubtful light upon the footway, leaving the projecting doors and horse-fronts in the deepest gloom. Many of the courts and lanes were left in total darkness; those of the meaner sort, where one glimmering light twinkled for a score of houses, being favored in no slight degree. Even in these places, the inhabitants had often good reason for extinguishing their lamp as soon as it was lighted; and the watch being utterly inefficient and powerless to prevent them, they did so at their pleasure. Thus, in the lightest thoroughfares, there was at every turn some obscure and dangerous spot whither a thief might fly for shelter, and few would care to follow; and the city being belted round by fields, green lanes, waste grounds, and lonely roads, dividing it at that time from the suburbs that have joined it since, escape, even where the pursuit was hot, was rendered easy.

It is no wonder that with these favoring circumstances in full and constant operation, street robberies, often accompanied by cruel wounds, and not unfrequently by loss of life, should have been of nightly occurrence in the very heart of London, or that quiet folks should have had great dread of traversing its streets after the shops were closed. It was not unusual for those who wended home alone at midnight to keep the middle of the road, the better to guard against surprise from lurking footpads; few would venture to repair at a late hour to Kentish Town or Hampstead, or even to Kensington or Chelsea, unarmed and unattended; while he who had been loudest and most valiant at the supper-table or the tavern, and had but a mile or so to go, was glad to see a link-boy to escort him home.

There were many other characteristics—not quite so disagreeable—about the thoroughfares of London then, with which they had been long familiar. Some of the shops, especially those to the eastward of Temple Bar, still adhered to the old practice of hanging out a sign; and the creaking and swinging of these boards in their iron frames on windy nights, formed a strange and mournful concert for the ears of those who lay awake in bed or hurried through the streets. Long stands of hackney-chairs and groups of chairmen, compared with whom the coachmen of our day are gentle and polite, obstructed the way and filled the air with clamor; night-cellars, indicated by a stream of light crossing the pavement, and stretching out half way into the road, and by the stifled roar of voices from below, yawned for the reception and entertainment of the most abandoned of both sexes; under every shed and bulk small groups of link-boys gamed away the earnings of the day; or one more weary than the rest, gave way to sleep, and let the fragments of his torch fall hissing on the puddled ground.

Then there was the watch with staff and lantern crying the hour, and the kind of weather; and those who woke up at his voice and turned them round in bed, were glad to hear it rained, or snowed, or blew, or froze, for very comfort's sake. The solitary passenger was startled by the chairmen's cry of "By your leave there!" as two came trotting past him with their empty vehicle—carried backward to show its being disengaged—and hurried to the nearest stand. Many a private chair too, inclosing some fine lady, monstrously hooped and furbelowed, and preceded by running-footmen bearing flambeaux—for which extinguishers are yet suspended before the doors of a few houses of the better sort—made the way gay and light as it danced along, and darker and more dismal when it had passed. It was not unusual for these running gentry, who carried it with a very high hand, to quarrel in the servants' hall while waiting for their masters and mistresses; and, falling to blows either there or in the street without, to strew the place of skirmish with hair-powder, fragments of bag-wigs, and scattered nosegays. Gaming, the vice which ran so high among all classes (the fashion being of course set by the upper), was generally the cause of these disputes; for cards and dice were as openly used, and worked as much mischief, and yielded as much excitement below stairs as above. While incidents like these, arising out of drums and masquerades, and parties at quadrille, were passing at the west end of the town, heavy stage-coaches and scarce heavier wagons were lumbering slowly toward the city, the coachmen, guard, and passengers, armed to the teeth, and the coach—a day or so, perhaps, behind its time, but that was nothing—despoiled by highwaymen; who made no scruple to attack, alone and single-handed, a whole caravan of goods and men, and sometimes shot a passenger or two, and were sometimes shot themselves, just as the case might be. On the morrow, rumors of this new act of daring on the road yielded matter for a few hours' conversation through the town, and a Public Progress of some fine gentleman (half drunk) to Tyburn, dressed in the newest fashion, and damning the ordinary with unspeakable gallantry and grace, furnished to the populace at once a pleasant excitement and a wholesome and profound example.

Among all the dangerous characters, who, in such a state of society, prowled and skulked in the metropolis at night, there was one man, from whom many an unthought and fierce as he, shrunk with an involuntary dread. Who he was, or whence he came, was a question often asked, but which none could answer. His name was unknown, he had never been seen until within eight days or thereabouts, and was equally a stranger to the old ruffians, upon whose haunts he ventured fearlessly, as to the young. He could be no spy, for he never removed his slouched hat to look about him, entered into conversation with no man, heeded nothing that passed, listened to no discourse, regarded nobody that came or went. But so surely as the dead of night set in, so surely this man was in the midst of the loose concourse in the night-cellar where outcasts of every grade resorted; and there he sat till morning.

He was not only a spectre at their licentious feasts; a something in the midst of their revelry and riot that chilled and haunted them; but out of doors he was the same. Directly it was dark, he was abroad—never in company with any one, but always alone; never lingering or loitering, but always walking swiftly; and looking (so they said who had seen him,) over his shoulder from time to time, and as he did so quickening his pace. In the fields, the lanes, the roads, in all quarters of the town—east, west, north, and south—that man was seen gliding on, like a shadow. He was always hurrying away. Those who encountered him, saw him steal past, caught sight of the backward glance, and so lost him in the darkness.

This constant restlessness and flitting to and fro gave rise to strange stories. He was seen in such distant and remote places, at times so nearly tallying with each other, that some doubted whether there were not two of them, or more—some, whether he had not unearthly means of traveling from spot to spot. The footpad hiding in a ditch had marked him passing like a ghost along its brink; the vagrant had met him on the dark high-road; the beggar had seen him pause upon the bridge to look down upon the water, and then sweep on again; they who dealt in bodies with the surgeons could swear he slept in church-yards, and that they had beheld him glide away among the tombs, on their approach. And as they told these stories to each other, one who had looked about him would pull his neighbor by the sleeve, and there he would be among them.

At last, one man—he was of those whose commerce lay among the graves—resolved to question this strange companion. Next night, when he had eat his poor meal voraciously, (he was accustomed to do that, they had observed, as though he had no other in the day,) this fellow sat down at his elbow.

"A black night, master!"

"It is a black night."

"Blacker than last, though that was pitchy, too. Did n't I pass you near the turnpike, in the Oxford road?"

"It 'slike you may. I do n't know."

"Come, come, master," cried the fellow, urged on by the looks of his comrades, and slapping him on the shoulder; "be more companionable and communicative. Be more the gentleman in this good company. There are tales among us that you have sold yourself to the devil, and I know not what."

"We all have, have we not?" returned the stranger, looking up. "If we were fewer in number, perhaps he would give better wages."

"It goes rather hard with you, indeed," said the fellow, as the stranger disclosed his haggard unwashed face, and torn clothes. "What of that? Be merry, master. A stave of a roaring song now—"

"Sing you, if you desire to hear one," replied the other, shaking him roughly off; "and do n't touch me, if you're a prudent man; I carry arms which go off easily—they have done so before now—and make it dangerous for strangers who do n't know the trick of them, to lay hands upon me."

"Do you threaten?" said the fellow.

"Yes," returned the other, rising and turning upon him, and looking fiercely round as if in apprehension of a general attack.

His voice, and look, and bearing—all expressive of the wildest recklessness and desperation—daunted while they repelled the bystanders. Although in a very different sphere of action now, they were not without much of the effect they had wrought at the Maypole Inn.

"I am what you all are, and live as you all do," said the man sternly, after a short silence. "I am in hiding here like the rest, and if we were surprised, would perhaps do my part with the best of ye. If it 's my humor to be left to myself, let me have it. Otherwise"—and here he swore a tremendous oath—"there 'll be mischief done in this place, though there are odds of a score against me."

A low murmur, having its origin perhaps in the dread of the man and the mystery that surrounded him, or perhaps in a sincere opinion on the part of some of those present, that it would be an inconvenient precedent to meddle too curiously with a gentleman's private affairs, if he saw reason to conceal them, warned the fellow who had occasioned this discussion that he had best pursue it no further. After a short time, the strange man lay down upon a bench to sleep, and when they thought of him again, they found that he was gone.

Next night, as soon as it was dark, he was abroad again and traversing the streets; he was before the locksmith's house more than once, but the family were out, and it was close shut. This night he crossed London bridge and passed into Southwark. As he glided down a bye street, a woman, with a little basket on her arm, turned into it at the other end. Directly he observed her, he sought the shelter of an archway, and stood aside until she had passed. Then he emerged cautiously from his hiding-place, and followed.

She went into several shops to purchase various kinds of household necessaries, and round every place at which she stopped he hovered like her evil spirit; following her when she re-appeared. It was nigh eleven o'clock, and the passengers in the streets were thinning fast, when she turned, doubtless to go home. The phantom still followed her.

She turned into the same bye street in which he had seen her first, which, being free from shops, and narrow, was extremely dark. She quickened her pace here, as though distrustful of being stopped, and robbed of such trifling property as she carried with her. He crept along on the other side of the road. Had she been gifted with the speed of wind, it seemed as if his terrible shadow would have tracked her down.

At length the widow, for she it was, reached her own door, and, panting for breath, paused to take the key from her basket. In a flush and glow, with the haste she had made, and the pleasure of being safe at home, she stooped to draw it out, when, raising her head, she saw him standing silently beside her; the apparition of a dream.

His hand was on her mouth, but that was needless, for her tongue clove to its roof, and the power of utterance was gone. "I have been looking for you many nights. Is the house empty? Answer me. Is any one inside?"

She could only answer by a rattle in her throat.

"Make me a sign."

She seemed to indicate that there was no one there. He took the key, unlocked the door, carried her in, and secured it carefully behind them.

CHAPTER XVII.

It was a chilly night, and the fire in the widow's parlor had burnt low. Her strange companion placed her in a chair, and stooping down before the half-extinguished ashes, raked them together and fanned them with his hat. From time to time he glanced at her over his shoulder, as though to assure himself of her remaining quiet and making no effort to depart; and that done, busied himself about the fire again.

It was not without reason that he took these pains, for his dress was dank and drenched with wet, his jaws rattled with cold, and he shivered from head to foot. It had rained hard during the previous night, and for some hours in the morning, but since noon it had been fine. Wheresoever he had passed the hours of darkness, his condition sufficiently betokened that many of them had been spent beneath the open sky. Besmeared with mire; his saturated clothes clinging with a damp embrace about his limbs; his beard unshaven, his face unwashed, his meagre cheeks worn into deep hollows—a more miserable wretch could hardly be, than this man who now cowered down upon the widow's hearth, and watched the struggling flame with bloodshot eyes.

She had covered her face with her hands, fearing, as it seemed, to look toward him. So they remained for some short time in silence. Glancing round again, he asked at length:

"Is this your house?"

"It is. Why, in the name of Heaven, do you darken it?"

"Give me meat and drink," he answered, sullenly, "or I dare do more than that. The very marrow in my bones is cold, with wet and hunger. I must have warmth and food, and I will have them here."

"You were the robber on the Chigwell road."

"I was."

"And nearly a murderer then."

"The will was not wanting. There was one came upon me and raised the hue-and-cry, that it would have gone hard with, but for his nimbleness. I made a thrust at him."

"You thrust your sword at him?" cried the widow. "Oh God, you bear this man! you hear and saw!"

He looked at her, as with her head thrown back, and her hands tight clenched together, she uttered these words in an agony of appeal. Then, starting to his feet as she had done, he advanced toward her.

"Beware!" she cried in a suppressed voice, whose firmness stopped him midway. "Do not so much as touch me with a finger, or you are lost; body and soul, you are lost!"

"Hear me," he replied, menacing her with his hand. "I, that in the form of a man live the life of a hunted beast; that in the body am a spirit, a ghost upon the earth, a thing from which all creatures shrink, save those cursed beings of another world, who will not leave me; I am, in my deprecation of this night, past all fear but that of the hell in which I exist from day to day. Give the alarm, cry out, refuse to shelter me. I will not hurt you. But I will not be taken alive; and so sure as you threaten me above your breath, I fall a dead man on this floor. The blood with which I sprinkle it, be on you and yours, in the name of the Evil Spirit that tempts me to their ruin!"

As he spoke, he took a pistol from his breast, and firmly clutched it in his hand.

"Remove this man from me, good Heaven!" cried the widow. "In thy grace and mercy, give him one minute's penitence, and strike him dead!"

"It has no such purpose," he said, confronting her. "It is deaf. Give me to eat and drink, lest I do that, it cannot help my doing, and will not do for you."

"Will you leave me, if I do thus much? Will you leave me and return no more?"

"I will promise nothing," he rejoined, seating himself at the table, "nothing but this—I will execute my threat if you betray me."

She rose at length, and going to a closet or pantry in the room, brought out some fragments of cold meat and bread and put them on the table. He asked for brandy, and for water. These she produced likewise; and he ate and drank with the voracity of a famished hound. All the time he was so engaged she kept at the uttermost distance of the chamber, and sat there shuddering, but with her face toward him. She never turned her back upon him once: and although when she passed him (as she was obliged to do in going to and from the cupboard) she gathered the skirts of her garment about her, as if even its touching his by chance were horrible to think of, still, in the midst of all this dread and terror, she kept her face directed to his own, and watched his every movement.

His repast ended—if that can be called one, which was a mere ravenous satisfying of the calls of hunger—he moved his chair toward the fire again, and warming himself before the blaze which had now sprung brightly up, accosted her once more.

"I am an outcast, to whom a roof above his head is often an uncommon luxury, and the food a beggar would reject as delicate fare. You live here at your ease. Do you live alone?"

"I do not," she made answer with an effort.

"Who dwells here besides?"

"One—it is no matter who. You had best begone, or he may find you here. Why do you linger?"

"For warmth," he replied, spreading out his hands before the fire. "For warmth. You are rich, perhaps?"

"Very," said she, faintly. "Very rich. No doubt I am very rich."

"At least you are not penniless. You have some money. You were making purchases to-night."

"I have a little left. It is but a few shillings."

"Give me your purse. You had it in your hand at the door. Give it to me."

She stepped to the table and laid it down. He reached across, took it up, and told the contents into his hand. As he was counting them, she listened for a moment, and sprang toward him.

"Take what there is, take all, take more if more were there, but go before it is too late. I have heard a wayward step without, I know full well. It will return directly. Begone."

"What do you mean?"

"Do not stop to ask. I will not answer. Much as I dread to touch you, I would drag you to the door if I possessed the strength, rather than you should lose an instant. Miserable wretch! fly from this place."

"If there are spies without, I am safer here," replied the man, standing aghast. "I will remain here, and will not fly till the danger is past."

"It is too late!" cried the widow, who had listened for the step, and not to him. "Hark to that foot upon the ground! Do you tremble to hear it! It is my son, my idiot son!"

As she said this wildly, there came a heavy knocking at the door. He looked at her, and she at him.

"Let him come in," said the man, hoarsely. "I fear him less than the dark, houseless night. He knocks again. Let him come in!"

"The dread of this hour," returned the widow, "has been upon me all my life, and I will not. Evil will fall upon him, if you stand eye to eye. My blighted boy! Oh! all good angels who know the truth—hear a poor mother's prayer, and spare my boy from knowledge of this man!"

"He rattles at the shutters!" cried the man. "He calls you. That voice and cry! It was he who grappled with me in the road. Was it he?"

She had sunk upon her knees, and so knelt down, moving her lips, but uttering no sound. As he gazed upon her, uncertain what to do or where to turn, the shutters flew open. He had barely time to catch a knife from the table, sheathe it in the loose sleeve of his coat, hide in the closet, and do all with the lightning's speed, when Barnaby tapped at the bare glass, and raised the sash exultingly.

"Why, who can keep out Grip and me!" he cried, thrusting in his head, and staring round the room. "Are you there, mother? How long you keep us from the fire and the light!"

She stammered some excuse and tendered him her hand. But Barnaby sprang lightly in without assistance, and putting his arms about her neck, kissed her a hundred times.

"We have been afield, mother—leaping ditches, scrambling through hedges, running down steep banks, up and away, and hurrying on. The wind has been blowing, and the rushes and young plants bowing and bending to it, lest it should do them harm, the cowards—and Grip—ha, ha, ha!—brave Grip, who cares for nothing, and when the wind rolls him over in the dust, turns manfully to bite it—Grip, bold Grip, has quarrelled with every little bowing twig—thinking, he told me, that it mocked him—and has worried it like a bull dog. Ha, ha, ha!"

The raven, in his little basket at his master's back, hearing this frequent mention of his name in a tone of exultation, expressed his sympathy by crowing like a cock, and afterward running over his various phrases of speech with such rapidity, and in so many varieties of hoarseness, that they sounded like the murmurs of a crowd of people.

"He takes such care of me besides!" said Barnaby. "Such care, mother! He watches all the time I sleep, and when I shut my eyes, and make-believe to slumber, he practises new learning softly; but he keeps his eye on me the while, and if he sees me laugh, though never so little, stops directly. He won't surprise me till he's perfect."

The raven crowed again in a rapturous manner, which plainly said, "Those are certainly some of my characteristics, and I glory in them." In the meantime Barnaby closed the window and secured it, and coming to the fire-place, prepared to sit down with his face to the closet. But his mother prevented this, by hastily taking that side herself, and motioning him toward the other.

"How pale you are, to-night!" said Barnaby, leaning on his stick. "We have been cruel, Grip, and made her anxious!"

Anxious in good truth, and sick at heart! The listener held the door of his hiding-place open with his hand, and closely watched her son. Grip—alive to every thing his master was unconscious of—had his head out of the basket, and in return was watching him intently with his glistening eye.

"He flaps his wings," said Barnaby, turning almost quickly enough to catch the retreating form and closing door, "as if there were strangers here, but Grip is wiser than to fancy that. Jump, then!"

Accepting this invitation with a dignity peculiar to himself, the bird hopped upon his master's shoulder, from that to his extended hand, and so to the ground. Barnaby unstrapping the basket and putting it down in a corner with the lid open, Grip's first care was to shut it down with all possible despatch, and then to stand upon it. Believing, no doubt, that he had now rendered it utterly impossible, and beyond the power of mortal man, to shut him up in it any more, he drew a great many corks in triumph, and uttering a corresponding number of hurrahs.

"Mother!" said Barnaby, laying aside his hat and stick, and returning to the chair from which he had risen, "I'll tell you where we've been to-day, and what we have been doing—shall I?"

She took his hand in hers, and holding it, nodded the word she could not speak.

"You mustn't tell," said Barnaby, holding up his finger, "for it's a secret, mind, and only known to me, and Grip, and Hugh. We had the dog with us, but he's not like Grip, clever as he is, and does n't guess it yet, I'll wager. Why do you look behind me so?"

"Did I?" she answered faintly. "I did n't know I did come nearer me."

"You are frightened!" said Barnaby, changing color. "Mother—you do n't see—"

"See what?"

"There's—there's none of this about, is there?" he answered in a whisper, drawing closer to her and clasping the mark upon his wrist. "I'm afraid there is, somewhere. You make my hair stand on end, and my flesh creep. Why do you look like that? Is it in the room as I have seen it in my dreams, dashing the ceiling and the walls with red? Tell me. Is it?"

He fell into a shivering fit as he put the question, and shutting out the light with his hands, sat shaking in every limb until it had passed away. After a time, he raised his head and looked about him.

"Is it gone?"

"There has been nothing here," rejoined his mother, soothing him. "Nothing indeed, dear Barnaby. Look! You see but you and me."

He gazed at her vacantly, and, becoming reassured by degrees, burst into a wild laugh.

"But let us see," he said, thoughtfully, "were we talking? Was it you and me? Where have we been?"

"Nowhere, but here."

"Ay, but Hugh and I," said Barnaby, "—that's it. Maypole Hugh, and I, you know, and Grip—we have been lying in the forest, and among the trees by the road side, with a dark-lantern after night came on, and the dog in a noose, ready to slip him when the man came by."

"What man?"

"The robber; the man that the stars winked at. We have waited for him after dark these many nights, and we shall have him. I'd know him in a thousand. Mother, see here! This is the man. Look!"

He twisted his handkerchief round his head, pulled his hat upon his brow, wrapped his coat about him, and stood up before her: so like the original he counterfeited, that the dark figure peering out behind him might have passed for his own shadow.

"Ha, ha, ha! We shall have him," he cried, ridding himself of the semblance as hastily as he had assumed it. "You shall see him, mother, bound hand and foot, and brought to London at a saddle-girth; and you shall hear of him at Tyburn Tree if we have luck. So Hugh says. You're pale again, and trembling. And why do you look behind me so?"

"It is nothing," she answered. "I am not quite well. Go you to bed, dear, and leave me here."

"To bed!" he answered. "I do n't like bed. I like to lie before the fire, watching the prospects in the burning coals—the rivers, hills, and dells, in the deep, red sunset, and the wild faces. I am hungry, too, and Grip has eaten nothing since broad noon. Let us to supper. Grip! To supper, lad!"

The raven flapped his wings, and, croaking his satisfaction, hopped to the feet of his master, and there held his bill open, ready for snapping up such lumps of meat as he should throw him. Of these he received about a score in rapid succession, without the smallest discomposure.

"That's all," said Barnaby.

"More!" cried Grip. "More!"

But it appearing for a certainty that no more was to be had, he retreated with his store; and disgorging the morsels one by one from his pouch, hid them in various corners—taking particular care, however, to avoid the closet, as being doubtful of the hidden man's propensities and power of resisting temptation. When he had concluded these arrangements, he took a turn or two across the room, with an elaborate assumption of having nothing on his mind (but with one eye hard upon his treasure all the time), and then, and not till then, began to drag it out, piece by piece, and eat it with the utmost relish.

Barnaby, for his part, having pressed his mother to eat, in vain, made a hearty supper too. Once, during the progress of his meal, he wanted more bread from the closet, and rose to get it. She hurriedly interposed to prevent him, and, summoning her utmost fortitude, passed into the recess, and brought it out herself.

"Mother," said Barnaby, looking at her steadfastly as she sat down beside him after doing so; "is to-day my birthday?"

"To-day!" she answered. "Do n't you recollect it was but a week or so ago, and that summer, autumn, and winter, have to pass before it comes again?"

"I remember that it has been so till now," said Barnaby.

"But I think to-day must be my birthday too, for all that."

She asked him why?

"I'll tell you why," he said. "I have always seen you. I did n't let you know it, but I have—on the evening of that day, grow very sad. I have seen you cry when Grip and I were most glad; and look frightened with no reason; and I have touched your hand, and felt that it was cold—as it is now. Once, mother, (on a birthday that was, also,) Grip and I thought of this after we went up stairs to bed, and when it was midnight—striking one o'clock—we came down to your door to see if you were well. You was on your knees. I forget what it was you said. Grip, what was it we heard her say that night?"

"I'm a devil!" rejoined the raven promptly.

"No, no," said Barnaby. "But you said something in a prayer; and when you rose and walked about, you looked (as you have done ever since, mother, toward night on my birthday) just as you do now. I have found that out, you see, though I am silly. So I say you're wrong; and this must be my birthday—my birthday, Grip!"

The bird received this information with a crow of such duration as a cock, gifted with intelligence beyond all others of his kind, might usher in the longest day with. Then, as if he had well considered the sentiment, and regarded it as apposite to birthdays, he cried, "Never say die!" a great many times, and flapped his wings for emphasis.

The widow tried to make light of Barnaby's remark, and endeavored to divert his attention to some new subject—too easy a task at all times, as she knew. His supper done, Barnaby, regardless of her entreaties, stretched himself on the mat before the fire—Grip perched upon his leg, and divided his time between dozing in the grateful warmth, and endeavoring (as it presently appeared) to recall a new accomplishment he had been studying all day.

A long and profound silence ensued, broken only by some change of position on the part of Barnaby, whose eyes were still wide open and intently fixed upon the fire; or by an effort of recollection on the part of Grip, who would cry in a low voice, from time to time, "Polly put the ket—" and there stop short, forgetting the remainder, and go off in a doze again.

After a long interval, Barnaby's breathing grew more deep and regular, and his eyes were closed. But even then the unquiet spirit of the raven interposed. "Polly put the ket—" cried Grip, and his master was broad awake again.

At length he slept soundly; and the bird with his bill sunk upon his breast, his breast itself puffed into a comfortable aldermanlike form, and his bright eye growing smaller and smaller, really seemed to be subsiding into a state of repose. Now and then he muttered in a sepulchral voice, "Polly put the ket—" but very drowsily, and more like a drunken man than a reflecting raven.

The widow, scarcely venturing to breathe, rose from her seat. The man glided from the closet, and extinguished the candle.

"—tle on," cried Grip, suddenly struck with an idea and very much excited. "—tle on. Hurrah! Polly put the ket-tle on, we'll all have tea; Polly put the ket-tle on, we'll all have tea. Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah! I'm a devil, I'm a devil, I'm a ket-tle on, keep up your spirits, never say die. Bow wow wow, I'm a devil, I'm a ket-tle, I'm a—Polly put the ket-tle on, we'll all have tea."

They stood rooted to the ground, as though it had been a voice from the grave.

But even this failed to awaken the sleeper. He turned over toward the fire, his arm fell to the ground, and his head drooped heavily upon it. The widow and her unwelcome visitor gazed at him and at each other for a moment, and then she motioned him toward the door.

"Stay," he whispered. "You teach your son well."

"I have taught him nothing that you heard to-night. Depart instantly, or I will rouse him."

"You are free to do so. Shall I rouse him?"

"You dare not do that."

"I dare do anything, I have told you. He knows me well, it seems. At least I will know him."

"Would you kill him in his sleep?" cried the widow, throwing herself between them.

"Woman," he returned between his teeth, as he motioned her aside, "I would see him nearer, and I will. If you want one of us to kill the other, wake him."

With that he advanced, and bending down over the prostrate form, softly turned back the head and looked into the face. The light of the fire was upon it, and its every lineament was revealed distinctly. He contemplated it for a brief space, and hastily arose.

"Observe," he whispered in the widow's ear: "In him, of whose existence I was ignorant until to-night, I have you in my power. Be careful how you use me. Be careful how you use me. I am destitute and starving, and a wanderer upon the earth. I may take a sure and slow revenge."

"There is some dreadful meaning in your words. I do not fathom it."

"There is a meaning in them, and I see you fathom it to its very depth. You have anticipated it for years; you have told me as much. I leave you to digest it. Do not forget my warning."

He pointed, as he left her, to the slumbering form, and stealthily withdrawing, made his way into the street. She fell on her knees beside the sleeper, and remained like one stricken into stone, until the tears which fear had frozen so long, came tenderly to her relief.

"Oh Thou," she cried, "who hast taught me such deep love for this one remnant of the promise of a happy life, out of whose affliction, even, perhaps the comfort springs that he is ever a relying, loving child to me—never growing old or cold at heart, but needing my care and duty in his manly strength as in his cradle-time—help him, in his darkened walk through this sad world, or he is doomed, and my poor heart is broken!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

Gliding along the silent streets, and holding his course where they were darkest and most gloomy, the man who had left the widow's house crossed London Bridge, and arriving in the city, plunged into the back ways, lanes, and courts, between Cornhill and Smithfield; with no more fixedness of purpose than to lose himself among their windings and baffle pursuit, if any one were dogging his steps.

It was the dead time of the night, and all was quiet. Now and then a drowsy watchman's footsteps sounded on the pavement, or the lamp-lighter on his rounds went flashing past, leaving behind a little track of smoke mingled with glowing morsels of his hot red link. He hid himself even from these partakers of his lonely walk, and, shrinking in some arch or doorway while they passed, issued forth again when they were gone, and so pursued his solitary way.

To be shelterless and alone in the open country, hearing the wind moan and watching for day through the whole long weary night; to listen to the falling rain, and crouch for warmth beneath the lee of some old barn or rick, or in the hollow of a tree, are dismal things—but not so dismal as the wandering up and down where shelter is, and beds and sleepers are by thousands, a houseless, rejected creature. To pace the echoing stones from hour to hour, counting the dull chimes of the clocks; to watch the lights twinkling in chamber windows, to think what happy forgetfulness each house shuts in; that here are children coiled together in their beds, here youth, here age, here poverty, here wealth, all equal in their sleep, and all at rest; to have nothing in common with the slumbering world around, not even sleep, heaven's gift to all its creatures, and be akin to nothing but despair; to feel by the wretched contrast with every thing on every hand, more utterly alone and cast away than in a trackless desert—this is a kind of suffering on which the rivers of great cities close full many a time, and which the solitude in crowds alone awakens.

The miserable man paced up and down the streets—so long, so wearisome, so like each other—and often cast a wistful look toward the east, hoping to see the first faint streaks of day. But obdurate night had yet possession of the sky, and his disturbed and restless walk found no relief.

One house in a back street was bright with the cheerful glare of lights; there was the sound of music in it too, and the tread of dancers, and there were cheerful voices, and many a burst of laughter. To this place—to be near something that was awake and glad—he returned again and again; and more than one of those who left it when the merriment was at its height, felt it a check upon their mirthful mood to see him flitting to and fro like an uneasy ghost. At last the guests departed, one and all; and then the house was close shut up, and became as dull and silent as the rest.

His wanderings brought him at one time to the city jail. Instead of hastening from it as a place of ill omen, and one he had cause to shun, he sat down on some steps hard by, and resting his chin upon his hand, gazed upon its rough and frowning walls as though even they became a refuge in his jaded eyes. He paced it round and round, came back to the same spot, and sat down again. He did this often, and once, with a hasty movement, crossed to where some men were watching in the prison lodge, and had his foot upon the steps, as though determined to accost them. But looking round, he saw that the day began to break, and failing in his purpose, turned and fled.

He was soon in the quarter he had lately traversed, and pacing to and fro again as he had done before. He was passing down a mean street, when from an alley close at hand some shouts of revelry arose, and there came straggling forth a dozen madcaps, whooping and calling to each other, who, parting noisily, took different ways in smaller groups.

Hoping that some low place of entertainment which would afford him a safe refuge might be near at hand, he turned into this court when they were all gone, and looked about for a half-opened door, or lighted window, or other indication of the place whence they had come. It was so profoundly dark, however, and so ill-favored, that he concluded they had but turned up there, missing their way, and were pouring out again when he observed them. With this impression, and finding there was no outlet but that by which he had entered he was about to turn, when from a grating near his feet a sudden stream of light appeared, and the sound of talking came. He retreated into a doorway to see who these talkers were, and to listen to them.

The light came to the level of the pavement as he did this, and a man ascended, bearing in his hand a torch. The figure unlocked and held open the grating as for the passage of another, who presently appeared, in the form of a young man of small stature and uncommon self-importance.

"Good night, noble captain," said he with the torch. "Farewell, commander. Good luck, illustrious general!" In return to these compliments, the other bade him hold his tongue, and keep his noise to himself; and laid upon him many similar injunctions, with great fluency of speech and sternness of manner.

"Commend me, captain, to the stricken Miggs," returned the torch-bearer in a lower voice. "My captain flies at higher game than Miggses. Ha, ha, ha! My captain is an eagle, both as respects his eye and soaring wings. My captain breaketh hearts as other bachelors break eggs at breakfast."

"What a fool you are, Stagg!" said Mr. Tappetit, stepping on the pavement of the court, and brushing from his legs the dust he had contracted in his passage upward.

"His precious limbs!" cried Stagg, clasping one of his ankles. "Shall a Miggs aspire to these proportions! No, no, my captain. We will inveigle ladies fair, and wed them in our secret cavern. We will unite ourselves with blooming beauties, captain."

"I'll tell you what, my buck," said Mr. Tappetit, releasing his leg, "I'll trouble you not to take liberties, and not to broach certain questions unless certain questions are broached to you. Speak when you're spoke to on particular subjects, and not otherways. Hold the torch up till I've got to the end of the court, and then kennel yourself, do you hear?"

"I hear you, noble captain."

"Obey then," said Mr. Tappetit, haughtily. "Gentlemen, lead on!" With which word of command (addressed to an imaginary staff or retinue) he folded his arms, and walked with surpassing dignity down the court.

His obsequious follower stood holding the torch above his head, and then the observer saw for the first time, from his place of concealment, that he was blind. Some involuntary motion on his part caught the quick ear of the blind man, before he was conscious of having moved an inch toward him, for he turned suddenly and cried, "Who's there?"

"A man," said the other, advancing. "A friend."

"A stranger?" rejoined the blind man. "Strangers are not my friends. What do you do there?"

"I saw your company come out, and waited here till they were gone. I want a lodging."

"A lodging at this time!" returned Stagg, pointing toward the dawn as though he saw it. "Do you know the day is breaking?"

"I know it," rejoined the other, "to my cost. I have been traversing this iron-hearted town all night."

"You had better traverse it again," said the blind man, preparing to descend, "till you find some lodgings suitable to your taste. I don't let any."

"Stay!" cried the other, holding him by the arm.

"I'll beat this light about that hangdog face of yours (for hangdog it is, if it answers to your voice,) and rouse the neighborhood besides, if you detain me," said the blind man. "Let me go. Do you hear?"

"Do you hear!" returned the other, chinking a few shillings together, and hurriedly pressing them into his hand. "I beg nothing of you. I will pay for the shelter you give me. Death! Is it much to ask of such as you! I have come from the country, and desire to rest where there are none to question me. I am faint, exhausted, worn out, and nearly dead. Let me lie down, like a dog, before your fire. I ask no more than that. If you would be rid of me, I will depart to-morrow."

"If a gentleman has been unfortunate on the road," muttered Stagg, yielding to the other, who, pressing on him, had already gained a footing on the steps—"and can pay for his accommodation—"

"I will pay you with all I have. I am just now past the want of food, God knows, and wish but to purchase shelter. What companion have you below?"

"None."

"Then fasten your grate there, and show me the way. Quick!"

The blind man complied after a moment's hesitation, and they descended together. The dialogue had passed as hurriedly as the words could be spoken, and they stood in his wretched room before he had had time to recover from his first surprise.

"May I see where that door leads to, and what is beyond?" said the man, glancing keenly round. "You will not mind that?"

"I will show you myself. Follow me, or go before. Take your choice."

He bade him lead the way, and, by the light of the torch which his conductor held up for the purpose, inspected all three cellars, narrowly. Assured that the blind man had spoken truth, and that he lived there alone, the visitor returned with him to the first, in which a fire was burning, and flung himself with a deep groan upon the ground before it.

His host pursued his usual occupation without seeming to heed him any further. But directly he fell asleep—and he noted his falling into a slumber, as readily as the keenest-sighted man could have done—he knelt down beside him, and passed his hand lightly but carefully over his face and person.

His sleep was checkered with starts and moans, and sometimes with a muttered word or two. His hands were clenched, his brow bent, and his mouth firmly set. All this, the blind man accurately marked; and, as if his curiosity were strongly awakened, and he had already some inkling of his mystery, he sat watching him, if the expression may be used, and listening, until it was broad day.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1841.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been hitherto somewhat remiss in noticing the favors of our Correspondents. Similar neglect will be avoided in future. We shall be grateful for any suggestions, and hold ourselves quite willing to reply to any interrogatories which may be put to us, either concerning matters of fact or matters of taste. Who will send us good detached critical notices of the present exhibition of the National Academy? They must be done in an artist-like style, though not filled with technical expressions.

We shall hold ourselves particularly obliged to those who will forward to us intelligence from any part of the United States. All near or distant correspondents who will give us news of importance regularly shall be furnished with the NEW WORLD or, if they prefer it, our daily paper—the EVENING SIGNAL—and further compensation if required.

TO THE LADY-READERS OF THE NEW WORLD.

Among the pleasing evidences with which we have, from time to time, been favored by the subscribers to this journal, none have been so gratifying as the letters which have been received from ladies, who have approved our labors, hailed our success, and contributed, by their direct aid, to our advancement. We could, were we at liberty to do so, enumerate instances wherein our lady subscribers, not content with putting their own names upon our lists, have, exerting the influence of their recommendations, sent us other names, which, with their own, we should be proud to publish as proofs of approbation in quarters from which approbation should be most anxiously desired and gratefully received. But since this is, of necessity, denied to us, the least we can do is to express our sense of obligation in this general way, and to ask each of our fair correspondents to appropriate a portion of our gratitude to herself.

The reasons why we have received this species of encouragement is evident to our minds; they exist doubtless as much in what we have avoided as in what we have done. From its incipency to this moment, the New World has never contained an offensive thought or an indelicate allusion—not a line nor a syllable which a modest woman should blush to read. We have shunned coarseness and vulgarity and double entendre—the usual staple of prints which live by ministering to the baser appetites of human nature. We have refused to render our columns a Newgate Calendar—a record of crime and error and debasing vice. We have preferred rather to forego the reputation of telling all the news than to publish that which had better remain untold. By this course we have voluntarily yielded support in one direction for good-will and kind approval in another. And these have been extended to us, not less by men of taste and refinement than by women. Our experiment has triumphantly demonstrated that we felt no unsafe confidence when we threw ourselves upon the virtue and intelligence of the community. It is a fact worthy of mention that THE NEW WORLD, a newspaper which has acquired the immense circulation of TWENTY THOUSAND COPIES a week, (a number stated without exaggeration,) never indulged a vicious taste nor stimulated an unworthy feeling.

Let not this true speaking be called self-flattery. Truth is never flattery. That we speak the truth of this paper, let every number, which has been laid before the public since the 19th of October, 1839, to the present moment, bear indisputable witness. We appeal to our lady-readers; of them we ask confirmation of what we say. Confirmation! Their continued approval is confirmation.

Such, then, being the facts—are we presuming too far, or soliciting too much, when we apply, ladies, directly to yourselves for assistance in carrying out the design of this journal—to print the best literature of a pure and popular character, to print full compends of general intelligence from the old world and the new—avoiding with scrupulous watchfulness all things of which you, as mothers, sisters, wives, would disapprove? If we are not; we pray you favor us, among those who move in the charmed circles of your influence, with your expressed commendations. Every name forwarded to us through your interest, will be especially valued and excite us to fresh efforts to merit the kindness.

We have considered this a fitting occasion, on which to address you immediately; because we have this week the satisfaction to publish a forcible and finely-reasoned essay on the Rights of Woman. The doctrines therein conveyed, we cordially believe, and have, through other channels, though by no means in so original or striking a manner, endeavored to convey. Let the essay be deeply pondered by every woman who respects her sex and who would have it assume that place in the scale of society, of which it has been unjustly deprived by the common law of England, but to which it must, before the lapse of many years, be completely restored by the voice of justice and of common sense. Let it no longer be said by men that they will make use of the very qualities which render women lovely to render them slaves. Not rather let her amiability, her beauty, her weakness, be arguments for her elevation; let her intellect, proved by many glorious examples to be fully equal to that of her master, be allowed to assert her equality; let us be her champions rather than her rulers, and think that we best maintain our own lordliness by acknowledging her independence.

There have appeared, in various quarters, statements and insinuations that Mr. John O. Sargent and Mr. Epes Sargent were in some manner connected with the Evening Signal and the New World. Neither of these gentlemen have the remotest connection with either paper, nor do they influence or control in any manner the paragraphs which appear in their columns. Mr. Epes Sargent retired from the papers in December last, and has not, since that time, been engaged in any way whatsoever as editor or co-editor.

Mr. J. N. REYNOLDS.—This gentleman, after years of active and efficient service in the Whig cause, has opened an office in Wall street, and is now devoting himself to the practice of the law, in which we are confident his talents will win for him rapid advancement and distinction. Mr. Reynolds is one of the most remarkable men of the day. As a writer he is most favorably known to the public by his interesting books of voyages and travels. To his individual enterprise, perseverance and energy of character we are indebted for our South Sea Expedition, which, under the command of Wilkes, has already revealed to science the existence of a new continent.

We have few public speakers amongst us, who in addressing a popular assembly can give such general satisfaction as Mr. Reynolds. He is an admirable debater, and wins his way by appeals to the reason rather than to the imagination and passions of his audience. We should think that before a jury his style of eloquence would be extremely effective. We learn that Mr. Reynolds intends to devote himself more particularly to maritime law, in which, it must be allowed, he is likely to have few competitors. We need not wish success to such men as Reynolds. They have the energy and perseverance to command it sooner or later.

We believe that, if the vote of the citizens of New York could be taken whether or not to break up this practice of moving on May-day, an overpowering majority would record their disapprobation of so inconvenient and expensive a practice. Is it not absurd, on the face of it, that any single day of the year should be set apart by the inhabitants of a great city like this, for a general tumbling out of one set of houses and tumbling into another? Such confusion—such damage—such distraction! They so turmoil the billows of social life that weeks of halcyon calm are required to make them smooth again. "Getting settled" is the thing—what a labor, what an opus!

About these times, the city is like a pool, which long suffered to stagnate, is stirred into motion. The most inodorous scents fill the air; the most unsightly objects meet the eye. The streets are covered over with heaps of rubbish and filth; the air is filled with the smoke of musty straw, burning bonfire-wise, here and there and everywhere, and in the night-time surrounded by squads of shouting, dancing, contortionizing, little ragged urchins who, seen through the lurid effulgence of the irregular flames, resemble imps of darkness at their tricks in the absence of some overseeing devil. Cleanliness is not a striking characteristic of Gotham in the best of seasons—shortly before elections when the sweepers are wanted for the polls—nor are the thoroughfares ever quite destitute of the sweepings of the kitchen and the puddle of the sink; but now, about, before and after the first of May, the intense congregated nastiness cannot be mentioned to "ears polite," though scarcely to be avoided by eyes of the most lofty and refined vision.

Cannot these "moving accidents" be avoided? In parliamentary language, we move that the moving on May-day be utterly abolished. Who seconds the motion?

Washington Correspondence.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1841.

It is understood here that Judge Bronson of the Supreme Court of your State has granted a writ of habeas corpus in favor of McLeod, and that personage is now probably on his way from Lockport to New-York. It is further stated that on his arrival in New-York a motion will be made by his counsel, Mr. Gardner, for the discharge of McLeod, and that it will probably be granted by the court, and this notable person be discharged, and given safe conduct to St. Johns. These facts come from an authentic source; and as this has been the subject of conversation here for a few days in private circles, I am somewhat surprised at having seen no reference to them in the public journals. The ground upon which McLeod's counsel will ask for his discharge is, that the question is now of an international character purely, since the British Government has distinctly recognized the attack on the Caroline.

General Scott has made a very full report to the President and Secretary of State of all the circumstances connected with the Caroline affair. If McLeod should be discharged the case will be relieved of a very productive source of difficulty and exasperation; but yet it will have a very grave aspect, and we can only hope that two governments, whose sole interest and true glory it is to cultivate peace and harmony, will take care to accommodate the difficulty in an honorable and amicable manner. Thus far there has been no communication between Mr. Fox and Mr. Webster on the subject that has not been perfectly respectful, and friendly in its spirit and tendency.

What a creature is this ALEXANDER McLEOD to have thrown into a flame the bellicose spirits on both sides! Undoubtedly he had no more to do with the attack on the vessel in question than you had. His boast was a double entendre, meaning only to boast of his brutal triumph over a young woman named Caroline, whom he had seduced!—but giving the impression that he had boarded the Caroline. The British officers in Canada express freely the utmost scorn and disgust for this profligate character, while they protest against his seizure and imprisonment, and would not cry out much if he were brought to severe punishment on their own side of the lines.

An extraordinary document made its appearance a few days ago in the Globe, signed "Levi Woodbury," and purporting to be a report from the late Secretary of the Treasury to President Van Buren, showing the state of the finances at the close of the late administration. If this thing was bona fide made to the President, why was it not communicated to Congress before the close of the session—even on the last day—for their information, and that of the public? But nobody believes it was presented to Mr. Van Buren. It is a pitiful attempt to blind the people to the bare condition in which Mr. Van Buren left the finances. The document has been a topic of conversation in all circles; and every where it has been treated with unmitigated ridicule. As a composition it is about the most cloudy and clumsy that ever came even from Mr. Woodbury. As a statement of finances there is nothing in it, from beginning to end, stated with any degree of exactness and precision. In my next I will present to your readers some facts as to the true state of the finances, which will show very differently from what Mr. Woodbury would have the public believe. Mr. EWING has opened "new books," and the country needs not the assistance of the Ex-Secretary to illumine now his success in keeping dark and producing confusion worse confounded for eight years past.

When Mr. Woodbury finished his speech in defence of Blair and Rives, at the extra session, Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, said, very keenly, "Well, I am quite disappointed in Woodbury. Really he is quite intelligible. I confess he never made a report I could understand!"

When John Calhoun was in opposition to Van Buren, he used to denounce, in his fierce way, the "unpenetrable darkness of the Treasury Reports" of Mr. Woodbury;—and this is the gentleman, who, now after the lapse of two months, sends from the hills of New Hampshire, a long, prosy, pointless, contumelious string of conjectures, and "probabilities," and computations to make people believe that the Treasury was left in a most prosperous condition; and the Globe proclaims, on the strength of it, that "Mr. Woodbury could carry the Government triumphantly through the year without any additional provision"! Oh! oh!

Mr. GRANGER removed from the Post Office Department yesterday, two clerks, who had been placed there on partisan grounds, and had retained their places by partisan services. Removals, you may expect, will be made from time to time in the offices here, as the evidence of incompetency, or infidelity of trust, or if malversation is presented strong enough for conviction. The reform will certainly be extended to the partisan agents; though it may be more slowly than the Whigs desire.

I perceive that a morning paper in New York contains an attack on the Secretary of War, in the form of a letter from Washington, because he has not removed certain officers in his Department. This blow comes, if I mistake not, from a person who is particularly anxious to be Commissioner of Indian Affairs! There are many applicants for this important and lucrative place; and when some of the many important solicitors clear out from Washington, Mr. Bell will perhaps make the appointment.—Ver. b. Sap.

WASHINGTON, May 4th.

It has been customary to talk of WASHINGTON, as an intolerably dull place, in the recess of Congress. I wonder that any body should think so. Far from dull have I ever found it. On the contrary, not half of the enjoyments the place affords can be known, or at least properly appreciated by him who only makes a visit during the session. The crowd of strangers, then, is so great, and the good people of the city are so much taken up with the crowd, and the eternal round of engagements, and balls, and parties and amusements which fill up every hour from the opening of Congress to its close, that little opportunity is there for ripening acquaintance with the most pleasant families into intimacy, or penetrating into the domestic circles of those who, while they shine in the world, are still more delightful when at home and by their own firesides. No city in the Union can boast of more intelligent, highly cultivated or refined society, than that which belongs to Washington proper—I mean the people who live here year in and year out, as contradistinguished from the multifarious assemblage collected here during the session. Now is the time to see them as they are, not in the glare of fashionable life, but in their own quiet and tasteful drawing-rooms, happy in the bosom of their families, or dispensing a simple and elegant hospitality to a few chosen friends. Now the easy and unceremonious morning-call on the person you really wish to see and converse with, is not disturbed by the sudden incursion of half a score of strangers, whom your friend has never seen before and cares not ever to see again, but to whom civilities are to be paid, and visits made, and invitations, of course, given. Now you may have the quiet family dinner, enlivened by the presence of true friends, not mere chance companions, and the sober glass of as good wine as France, Spain, or Germany can afford. Now is the time for the afternoon drive, or ride, or the promenade in the grounds around the Capitol or the White House.

I might go on, and fill this sheet with details demonstrating that Washington is by no means dull, although the "Assembled Wisdom" is not here to illumine it! The recess is rather a relief. The people live more at ease, and are more themselves. Even the Foreign Ministers and their diplomatic families catch the spirit of the times, and mingle more familiarly than ever in the social circle. I tell you if you wish to know what Washington really is, you must spend a recess here as well as a session.

I have frequently had occasion to remark that a taste for simple enjoyments prevails here to a degree which you would scarcely expect to find in a population, exposed for so great a portion of their lives to all the dissipation and excitements of a Metropolis. It was very pleasantly illustrated last evening at the MAY BALL. This is a juvenile festival, which for many years has been celebrated on the evening of the first of May at Carusi's Saloon. It is an occasion on which all social differences are almost entirely thrown aside, and old and young, and all ranks and classes, meet together to enjoy the spectacle of childish loveliness, innocence and mirth. Owing to the late National bereavement, it was not so well attended as in former years. The President and Heads of Departments, and other ex-officio leaders of society were missed. Indeed it was at first contemplated to omit the ball altogether. But it is the CHILDREN'S HOLIDAY—it only comes once a year—and why should a shadow be cast upon their young days? They waited, however, until the prescribed month of mourning was over; and made the third, instead of the first, the May Day.

It was a beautiful sight to look upon the young and blushing Queen—a graceful girl with the happy name of May—as she entered the room accompanied by her fair attendants, followed by the smallest and most exquisite of pages, and a long train of infantine Floras. When she reached her throne, the page advanced with a chaplet of snow-white flowers, and the mistress of the ceremonies crowned the Queen. Then came a short poetical address from a very beautiful young girl, to which Her May Majesty replied, and the music rang out, and Floras scattered their fragrant offerings over the steps of the throne. A spirited striding then sought the hand of the Queen and led her out—the maids of honor and Floras were quickly appropriated by other miniature beaux, and in a trice the floor was covered by the most lively and happy dancers the world ever saw!

About nine o'clock, other sets, of a larger growth, took the floor—the children went home to dream over the delights of the evening and to long for the return of May-day—and then the hilarity of the night was kept up to a tolerably late hour.

It has been intimated in certain journals that the despatches from Mr. Fox to his Government, sent by the President, were of such a nature that the loss or delay of that vessel would produce serious inconvenience in regard to the negotiations now pending between the United States and Great Britain. This is erroneous. I have learned that the communications were not of the important character alleged. Before Mr. WEBSTER left the city for Boston, he had some correspondence with Mr. Fox. But their whole intercourse was of a perfectly amicable kind. There is no sensation at all here about our relations with Great Britain. No one in the diplomatic circles, or in any other that I know of, has any apprehension of war, or any uneasiness about the termination of the present difficulties.

Mr. Fox has been somewhat indisposed of late. But he is now much better, and is able to go out.

Mr. Ex-Secretary POINSETT has followed the example of Mr. Woodbury, and published his report to Mr. Van Buren, professing to give an account of matters and things connected with the War Department, as they were at the close of the late Administration. These "dying speeches" are unprecedented at least; but I take it, the public will wait to hear what Mr. Bell may have to say at the Extra Session.

Literary Notices.

A COMPLETE GUIDE TO THE ART OF WRITING SHORT-HAND, &c. By T. Towndrow.

After an attentive examination of the work of Mr. Towndrow we are inclined to think it exceedingly well adapted to give the learner an insight into the curious and useful art of short-hand writing. In the matter of explanations and examples this treatise is superior to any of its predecessors, and from the numerous and warm testimonials prefixed to the volume by those who have practically tested it, there can be little doubt but the system of Mr. T. is equal if not superior to any ever invented.

Q. The May number of the Ladies' Companion is embellished with a steel-engraving that would do no discredit to Finden's Galleries. It is exceedingly beautiful, and is entitled "The Young Chief's First Ride." Such embellishments alone entitle this various and excellently edited magazine to the bountiful patronage with which it is favored. We notice certain typographical improvements in this number, which are indications of the good taste of the proprietor.

The literary merit of the Ladies' Companion seems to increase rather than diminish—and, with the editorial labors which are now bestowed upon it, it cannot fail to be pronounced highly creditable to the literature of the country.

Q. We see by the London papers that Thomas Campbell's "Life of Petrarch," which has been so long announced, is at length published. Have you it in press, Messrs. Lea & Blanchard? Or will nothing go down now but Carlyle?

GEORGE W. LIGHT, 1 Cornhill, Boston, has just published a very pleasing little story, embellished with a very poor lithographic frontispiece, entitled "The Tyrolaise Minstrel, or the Romance of Every-day Life. By a lady." 1 vol. duo. pp. 200.

SAXTON AND PIERCE, Boston, and GOULD, NEWMAN AND SAXTON, of New-York, have published a small work, entitled "Musical Anecdotes and Stories. Lives of Haydn and Mozart, written for the young, with sixteen pieces of original and German Music. By the Singing Master." 1 vol. duo. pp. 96.

E. L. CAREY AND A. HART, Chestnut street, Philadelphia, have just issued a copious work under the designation of "Celebrated Trials of all countries and remarkable cases of Criminal Jurisprudence, selected by a member of the Philadelphia Bar." 1 vol. oct. pp. 596.

Latest Intelligence.

THE SEASON AND THE CROPS.—The American Farmer says, under this head, "The observation is universal, that so backward a spring was never known. Work of all kinds in the country is two or three weeks behind hand. Many have not yet sown a bushel of oats, nor run a furrow for corn—every farmer being aware that nothing is so destructive as ploughing land when too wet. Wheat, generally, looks tolerably well."

FROM NEW GRENADA.—Advices from New Grenada have been received up to the latter end of February. A decisive battle had been fought between the government troops, under Gen. Herran, and the insurgents, which resulted in the entire discomfiture of the latter, with the loss of 1000 prisoners and a large number killed, several of them chiefs and officers. The insurgents, who are 2000 strong, have been again routed, and it was supposed the rebellious Provinces would soon be reduced to subjection. Hopes were entertained that tranquillity would soon be restored.

BOUNTY ON SILK.—The Legislature of this State has passed an Act allowing a bounty of 15 cents per pound, for all cocoons produced in the State, and 50 cents per pound for the reeled silk. The act is to continue in effect until June 1, 1846.

Q. DEATHS in New York last week, numbered 140; 30 men; 37 women; 43 boys, and 30 girls. Eighteen were over 50, and 40 under 2 years.

FROM THE PACIFIC.—By the ship Osage, Capt. Mickle from Valparaiso, letters have been received from the U. S. frigate Constitution, dated 27th January, 1841, by which we have intelligence of interest to many readers.

The officers and crew are all well, and since sailing from the United States only four of the five hundred composing the crew of "Old Ironsides" have been overtaken by death. This fact speaks well for the climate—well for the internal police of the ship, and also well for the skill of her medical officers.—[Phil. Nat. Gaz.]

MORE FRESHETS.—The rivers of South Carolina have again overflowed, occasioning a great destruction of stock, &c., along their courses. In some instances one half or two thirds of the cattle and hogs of planters living near the Edisto have been swept away by the flood and lost.

The Congressional delegation will stand as follows: Whigs 10; Van Buren men 10; and one 'independent' or no-party man, R. M. T. Hunter; being a Whig gain of two. The State Senate will consist of 17 Whigs and 15 Van Buren men, being a Whig gain of one member. The character of the House of Delegates is not so certain, from there being several members of doubtful politics returned, but the Whigs claim 68, which gives them a majority of two.

Gale and Loss of Life.—A violent gale and rain storm took place in Massachusetts bay, on the 30th ult. The sloop Warsaw, Captain Godfrey, from Salem to New York, ran aground near Cohasset, about daylight, and, with her cargo, became a total loss. Captain Godfrey was drowned, but the crew, five in number, were saved by the life-boat, placed at Cohasset by the Humane Society. All the men who were saved were unable to speak.

A Steamer Sunk.—We have just learned, says the Pittsburgh American, that the steamboat Czar, heavily loaded with merchandise, on her downward trip from this port, has been sunk near Wellsville, by coming in contact with the Tarquin, on her way up. The loss, it is supposed, will be very heavy. The boat and cargo were insured at different offices in this city, to the amount of $13,000; and the cargo, we understand, more largely in the Philadelphia offices.

Postscript to Quarto Edition. ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

Twelve Days later from Europe. IMPORTANT FROM CHINA.

The Steamship Britannia, Capt. Cleland, arrived at Boston on Thursday morning at 2 o'clock, bringing important intelligence from Europe. The affairs with the Chinese Government, the ministerial papers say, are adjusted. The British squadron had reduced two of their forts, and were carrying on hostilities with great activity when the Chinese authorities proposed a cessation. The tea market had been very much depressed, and the London merchants had remonstrated to Lord Palmerston against the treaty of Admiral Elliot. Cotton remained about the same. Flour dull. The money market was variable. Stocks had rather improved.

Nothing had been heard of the steamship President, and the hope of her safety is nearly abandoned. The rate of insurance upon her is 80 per cent.

Tea has greatly declined in consequence of the China news.

The sales of cotton at Liverpool during the week ending April 16th were 26,260 bales, 5,000 for export and 1,500 on speculation. No change in ordinary; the better qualities were in demand for export, and slightly higher.

Parliament had adjourned for a fortnight.

There has been a change of Ministry in Belgium.

U. S. Bank shares sold in London on the 16th at £5 10s. France is tranquil. The Ministry had declined to enter upon a discussion of the affairs of the East until the pending negotiation between all the Great Powers shall have been concluded.

The differences between England and Persia have been fully adjusted.

Accounts from Armenia state that the whole country around Diarbekir is in a state of insurrection.

Austria has declared that she will withdraw from the Quadruple Alliance against the Pacha of Egypt unless he is treated more favorably.

Frederick Reynolds, the Dramatist, is dead, aged 77.

The Penny Postage is about to be adopted in Belgium.

INDIA.

The Punjab is the theatre of civil war. An adventurer known as Sher Singh had corrupted the military at Lahore, and made a desperate attempt to dethrone the reigning Queen, Rance Chund Koar, mother of the deceased Prince, Nao Nepal Singh, who was accidentally killed while attending the funeral of his father, Runjeet Singh. His success was probable at the last advices.

NEW TREATY OF THE FIVE EUROPEAN POWERS.—The treaty or convention (paraphé) on the 15th ult. by the representatives of the five great European powers and the ambassador of the Porte contains: A preamble of considerable length, stating and recognizing the rights of the Ottoman Porte as an independent power in her relations with the other European nations; Articles 1 and 2, which stipulate the closing of the Dardanelles against all foreign ships of war, without distinction. Article 3, which consists of an invitation to all friendly powers, not parties to the treaty, to accede to it; and article 4, which relates merely to the exchange of the ratifications within a given time.

THE DISPUTE WITH CHINA.—The dispute between England and China was settled after two forts at the passage of the Bogue had been stormed by the British troops, the junks destroyed, and other batteries bombarded. The Governor of Canton then renewed the negotiation, and the following terms were agreed upon. They are not satisfactory to the English merchants.

1. The cession of the island and harbor of Hongkong to the British Crown. All just charges and duties to the empire upon the commerce carried on there, to be paid as if the trade were conducted at Whampoa.

2. An indemnity to the British Government of six millions of dollars, one million payable at once, and the remainder in equal annual instalments, ending in 1846.

3. Direct official intercourse between the countries upon an equal footing.

4. The trade of the port of Canton to be opened within ten days after the Chinese new year, and to be carried on at Whampoa till further arrangements are practicable at the new settlement.

THE EAST.

The Eastern question is considered settled. It was thought probable in Vienna that Mehemet Ali would abdicate in favor of Ibrahim Pacha.

TROUBLE AMONG THE INDIANS.—The Wisconsin Inquirer says, "An express arrived at Fort Crawford and Winnebago, a day or two since, from Fort Snelling, with the intelligence that the warriors of the Sioux tribe of Indians were collecting in great numbers in the vicinity of the last mentioned military station and meditated an attack upon the garrison. A company of dragoons from Fort Crawford and a company of infantry from Winnebago, have been ordered, we understand, to St. Peter's to assist in the defence of the post."

HON. R. M. JOHNSON, late Vice President of the United States, is a candidate for the lower house of the Kentucky Legislature.

¶ We want No. 8 of the 2d Quarto volume. Any of our agents who have this number are requested to return them to this office without delay.

¶ A large number of subscriptions will expire with quarto whole No. 32, June 1st, and notice is hereby given to such to renew them before that time, as all papers are discontinued unless a new remittance is made. For $6 current money the New World will be sent two years, and a copy of SEARS' PICTORIAL BIBLE will be given.

A SPLENDID OFFER.

In looking about for something of suitable character and of eminent value, which we could with satisfaction to ourselves and them, offer as a present to the subscribers of the New World, we have found nothing in point of attraction and popularity, equal to

SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE,

a work embellished with Two Hundred Illustrations of Scriptural scenes and views in the Holy Land, recommended by the press, and also by the most pious and intelligent clergymen in the country—and which, as has been justly remarked, should be possessed by every family in the United States; and, indeed, ought every where to be the companion of the sacred volume.

We therefore respectfully ask every lady and gentleman under whose observation this paper may come, to reflect on the following

PROPOSITIONS:

To gratify the wish which has generally been inspired to possess a copy of SEARS'S CELEBRATED PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BIBLE, the Publisher has concluded to purchase a sufficient number of copies to supply, gratis, all those new subscribers to the New World, who will forward to him—in current bills, postage free—two full years' subscription in advance, (viz. $6.) The price of this beautiful volume is two dollars per copy; so that, by this arrangement, the New World is actually afforded at $4 for two years.

Further—it will be given to every present subscriber who shall pay for two years as above, on the renewal of his subscription—or who may obtain two new subscribers, and remit the money therefor. To this latter proposition particular attention is asked. Each and every one of our present subscribers may easily, if he kindly resolves to make a little exertion, procure us from the circle of his friends and acquaintances two new subscribers. To each one doing this shall be presented a copy of the PICTORIAL BIBLE.

Clubs of ten persons, associating together, and remitting FIFTY DOLLARS, shall receive the New World two years each, and each also a copy of the Pictorial Bible. What more splendid or more liberal offer can be made than this, in prospecting, for so trifling a sum as $5, one of the most charming volumes ever published, and a paper which will give you during two years, new and rare works, choice literature, and popular discourses by eminent divines which could not be purchased in any other form for one hundred dollars.

¶ In every case New-York or Eastern money must be remitted, or the discount allowed; and all letters must be post-paid or free. To prevent misunderstanding, it must be distinctly understood that the whole subscription must be received without deduction for commissions. Every postmaster or agent will be entitled to a copy for each subscription for two years, or for two subscriptions one year, provided the full amount of six dollars is remitted.

¶ All persons in the United States or the British Provinces, are invited to avail themselves of these propositions, to obtain a copy of the Pictorial Illustrations.

Each copy of the Bible so presented will have the name of the subscriber written in a blank leaf; and it will be held subject to his order, and will be forwarded in any way he may choose to point out. The copies will be elegantly bound, and lettered in gold.

Farewell, Dearest! May those smiles
That o'er all hearts have shone,
Now smile, and throw their blessed pow'r
Like sunlight, on thine own.
And may the joy that thou hast given,
For ever with thee dwell;
Sweet thoughts and pleasing dreams be thine,
Then Dearest, fare thee well.

THIRD VERSE.

Farewell, Dearest! Still I stay,
And yet I know not why,
To hear the music of thy voice,
The music of thy sigh.
Once more thy hand is press'd in mine,
Once more I feel its spell,
Oh! give me back one sunny smile.
Then Dearest, fare thee well.

BRITISH ORATORS.

No. I....LORD CHATHAM.

When we consider that the critiques upon our great poets and poetry are both numerous and able, it is somewhat surprising that so little should have been written upon their younger brethren and companions—upon British Orators and Eloquence. Although, since the invention of that mighty master-work, printing, oratory has ceased to be the sole means of directing or embodying public opinion, yet the influence of this great and popular power in our own country, owing to the peculiar form of our government, is scarcely less than it was during the Demosthenean era at Athens.

Many of the speeches of British orators may well challenge comparison with the masterpieces of antiquity. In rhythm and compactness of diction, it is true, that they may not be equal; but this defect (of our language, rather than our orators,) is more than compensated by greater closeness of argumentation, by more extended views, by more profound and varied knowledge, not of human nature and human kind alone, but of all that is glorious and sublime in the truths which science has discovered, and revelation unfolded. Nowhere have the true principles of enlightened and profound policy been more clearly stated or better illustrated, or more sagaciously applied to passing events—nowhere have the absurdity and ruinous tendency of the various schemes with which designing men have deluded the unthinking multitude, been exposed with greater ability than in the debates of the British Senate. The wide extension of political privileges, and still more the irrefragable power of public opinion among all ranks of people in this country, render the diffusion of a knowledge of political philosophy especially desirable; for, as Lord Brougham well observes,* "it is immeasurably important in countries living under a free government that those whom the constitution recognize as sharers, more or less directly, in the supreme power, should have a correct knowledge of the state of their own affairs, and the principles upon which their rights and interests depend."

This knowledge, or, at least, a very considerable portion of it, can hardly fail to be acquired by him who studies the best speeches of the orators of Great Britain. Among the more eminent of these, Lord Chatham will ever stand conspicuous.

Many of his earlier speeches, unfortunately, have shared the fate of those of his great predecessors, Somers, Bolingbroke, Walpole, Chesterfield, Murray, and Fox. The names of these great men are, indeed, recorded by history, in the list of orators; but of their speeches there remains at best but a rare outline of arguments; but the vivid imagery, the keen cuttings, the copious and elegant diction, are irretrievably lost; whilst the lucubrations of writers (then ironically called reporters,) are substituted in their stead. Happily, however, many of Lord Chatham's later speeches, particularly those on the American question, have been preserved to us, in all their fulness and grandeur, with more than usual accuracy, by the Earl of Charlemont and others, who took a deep interest in the debates of that critical period.

Like Demosthenes (who is said to have been his great model,) the peculiar excellence of Lord Chatham's style consisted in pointed and impassioned energy. Beautiful examples of metaphor, hyperbole, and apostrophe, are to be found, gracing his eloquence and enforcing his argument; yet, his forte lies not so much in these, as in clear and convincing exposition of what he deemed to be just policy; in overwhelming invective hurled, as with a giant hand, against opponents; and, in the most thrilling and touching appeals to the noblest feelings of our nature. How grand—how heart-stirring is the following burst of indignant eloquence in reply to Lord Mansfield's vindication of the conduct of the Commons in the expulsion of the celebrated Mr. Wilkes, January 9th, 1770:—

"The Noble Lord assures us that he knows not in what code the law of Parliament is to be found; that the House of Commons, when they act as judges, have no law to direct them, but their own wisdom; that their decision is law; and if they determine wrong, the subject has no appeal but to heaven. What then, my Lords, are all the generous efforts of our ancestors; are all those glorious contentions, by which they meant to secure to themselves and to transmit to their posterity, a known law, a certain rule of living; reduced to the conclusion that, instead of the arbitrary power of a king, we must have the arbitrary power of a House of Commons? If this be true, what benefit do we derive from the exchange? Tyranny, my Lords, is detestable in every shape; but in none is it so formidable as when it is assumed and exercised by a number of tyrants. But, my Lords, this is not the fact; this is not the constitution; we have a law of Parliament; we have a code in which every honest man may find it. We have Magna Charta; we have the Statute Book, and the Bill of Right."

The whole passage is worthy, not only of the disciple, but of the original—of the master himself. The truth of the observation, that "tyranny is never so formidable as when exercised by a number of tyrants," our knowledge of human nature, and the veritable record of history, have overpowered over again palpably demonstrated.

One of the boldest and most striking metaphors that Lord Chatham ever used, occurs in this speech. The mention of Magna Charta led him to exhort their lordships not to degenerate from the glorious example of those "iron barons," by whose exertions that great bulwark of our liberties was secured.

"They were," says he, "the guardians of the people: yet their virtues, my Lords, were never engaged in a question of so much importance as the present. A breach has been made in the constitution; the battlements are dismantled; the citadel is open to the first invader; the walls totter; the constitution is not tenable; what remains, then, but for us to stand foremost in the breach—to repair it, or to perish in it."

The energy and vividness imparted to his manly sentiments by this appropriate metaphor, exemplify Cicero's observation, "that the most striking metaphors are those taken from the sense of sight."

In his speech, on the third reading of the bill for quartering soldiers in America, Lord Chatham depicts, in lively colors, the stern resolution which animated the first settlers in America, and shows the folly of expecting the descendants of such men tamely to surrender their inalienable rights. For generous sentiments, expressed in language at once forcible, ornate, copious, without harshness or superfluity, it will bear a comparison with the passage which immediately precedes the celebrated oath in Demosthenes' masterpiece—his oration on the crown.

"If we take a transient view of those motives which induced the ancestors of our fellow-subjects in America to leave their native country, to encounter the innumerable difficulties of the unexplored regions of the Western World, our astonishment at the present conduct of their descendants will subside. There was no corner of the world into which men of their free and enterprising spirit would not fly with alacrity, rather than submit to the slavish and tyrannical principles which prevailed at that period in their native country. And shall we wonder, my Lords, if the descendants of such illustrious characters spurn with contempt the hand of unconstitutional power that would snatch from them such dear-bought privileges as they now contend for?"

"Τὴν γὰρ οὐκ ἂν ἀγάσαιο τῶν ἀνδρῶν ἐκείνων τῆς ἀρετῆς οἱ καὶ τὴν χώραν καὶ τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην ὑπερβαίνοντες εἰς τὰς τριπλοῦς ἔμβαντες ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ το κτενομένου ποιεῖναι, τὸν μὲν (ταῦτα συμβολήσαντα) Θημιστοκλῆα στρατηγὸν ἔλομενοι, τὸν δ' ἐπακούειν ἀποφραγμένον τοῖς ἐπιταγόμενοις Κερσίλον καταλιθισάντες, οὐ μόνον αὐτοὺς ἀλλὰ καὶ αἱ γυναῖκες αἱ ἑμετέραι τὴν γυναικα αὐτοῦ. Οὐ γὰρ εἴποντο οἱ τοῦ ἀθανάτου οὐτε ῥητορὰ οὐτε στρατηγὸν δι' τοῦ δουλεύουσιν εὐτυχῶς ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ζῆν ἤϊον εἰ μὴ μετ' ἐλευθερίας ἐξέσται τοῦτο ποιεῖν."

"Who can reflect, without astonishment, upon the magnanimity of those who resigned their lands, gave up their city, and embarked in their ships, to avoid the odious state of subjection? Who chose Themistocles, the adviser of this conduct, to command their forces; and when Cræsus proposed that they should yield to the terms prescribed, how they stoned him to death? Nay, the public indignation was not yet allayed. Your very wives inflicted the same vengeance on his wife. For, the Athenians of that day looked for no speaker, no general, to procure them a state of prosperous slavery. They had the spirit to reject even life, unless they were allowed to enjoy it in freedom."

Although, as we have already observed, pathos does not constitute the characteristic excellence of Lord Chatham's oratory, his entreaty that their lordships would "proceed," with regard to the Americans, "like a kind and affectionate parent towards a child whom he tenderly loves; and, instead of harsh and severe proceedings, pass an amnesty on all their youthful errors, and clasp them once more in their fond and affectionate embrace," is touching and pathetic in the extreme.

His speech, on moving an amendment to the address, (Nov. 18, 1777,) after expressing his hearty concurrence in the first part of the address, and his sincere joy on the birth of another princess, and her majesty's happy recovery, thus sternly proceeds:—

"I must stop here; my courtly complaisance will carry me no further: I will not join in congratulation on misfortune and disgrace: I cannot concur in a blind servile address, which approves, and endeavors to sanctify, the monstrous measures which have heaped disgrace and misfortune upon us—which have brought ruin to our doors. This, my Lords, is a perilous and tremendous moment! It is not a time for adulation. The smoothness of flattery cannot now avail—cannot save us in this rugged and awful crisis. It is now necessary to instruct the Throne in the language of truth. We must dispel the delusion and the darkness which envelope it; and display, in its full danger and true colors, the ruin that is brought to our doors."

Having by this gloomy picture gained, the first object of every orator, the attention of his audience, Lord Chatham poured upon "the confounded ministers" a torrent of invective, denouncing their measures as "having reduced this late flourishing empire to ruin and contempt;" and declaring his deep rooted conviction, "that to conquer America was impossible." Warmd by his subject, and entering fully into the lacerated feelings of the Americans, he broke forth into that burst of glowing eloquence, which Grattan (himself no mean orator,) thought finer than any thing in Demosthenes. "If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms—never, never, never!"

The following sublime reply, in this truly magnificent speech, to Lord Suffolk's vindication of the employment of Indians in the war, on the ground, "that it is perfectly justifiable to use all the means which God and nature have put into our hands," is worthy of all praise, and may well lay claim to the same position in English, as the oath of Demosthenes will ever hold in Grecian oratory.

"These abominable principles, and this more abominable avowal of them, demand the most decisive indignation. I call upon that Right Reverend Bench, those holy ministers of the gospel, and pious pastors of our church; I conjure them to join the holy work, and vindicate the religion of their God: I appeal to the wisdom and the law of this learned bench, to defend and support the justice of their country: I call upon the bishops to interpose the unsullied sanctity of their lawn;—upon the learned judges to interpose the purity of their ermine, to save us from this pollution;—I call upon the honor of your lordships, to reverence the dignity of your ancestors, and to maintain your own. I call upon the spirit and humanity of my country, to vindicate the national character: I invoke the genius of the constitution. From the tapestry that adorns these walls, the immortal ancestor, of this noble lord frowns with indignation at the disgrace of his country. In vain he led your victorious fleet against the boasted Armada of Spain; in vain he defended and established the honor, the liberties, the religion—the Protestant religion—of this country against the arbitrary cruelties of popery and the Inquisition, if these more than popish cruelties and inquisitorial practices are let loose amongst us; to turn forth into our settlements, among our ancient connections, friends, and relations, the merciless cannibal, thirsting for the blood of man, woman, and child! to send forth the infidel savage—against whom? against your Protestant brethren; to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and extirpate their race and name with these horrible hell-hounds of savage war!—hell-hounds, I say, of savage war."

How solemn is the adjuration of the highest dignities in Church and State, "to save their country from pollution." The frowning of the glorious commander of that fleet, which triumphed over the Armada, and preserved England from superstition and slavery, is a figure truly bold and poetical; and the terrible picture of the horrors of savage war, makes the blood almost curdle in one's veins. Well might one of our finest poets say, of this consummate orator—

"In him Demosthenes was heard again,
Liberty taught him her Athenian strain,
She clothed him with authority and awe,
Spoke from his lips, and in his looks gave law:
His speech, his form, his action, full of grace,
And all his country beaming in his face;
He stood as some inimitable hand
Would strive to make a Paul or Tully stand.
No sycophant or slave that dare oppose
Her sacred cause, but trembled when he rose;
And every vernal stickler for the yoke,
Felt himself crushed at the first word he spoke."

WEDDING DAYS.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

We had hoped to annex to the following remarks on Wedding Days, like some exquisite fringe to the bridal garment, a whole heap of beautiful passages out of Epithalamiums, or Wedding Songs—wondering that we could not call them to mind on the instant, and resolved to give a delightful rebuke to our memory by ransacking a multitude of the rogues, ancient and modern. But our memory proved correcter than our enthusiasm: so the song, as of old, shall go before the bride; and if we subsequently fall into a train of graver reflection than our outset promised, this, we trust, will not be held inconsistent in people witnessing the delights of others, especially as it will be founded in the very natural regret that every body is not so happy as every body else, nor all exquisite creatures going to be married next Monday. (Imagine if they were—China included!—the Balearic Isles;—all Italy and Spain, and all Tobolski!—one universal bridal hymn rising from the whole globe, like fragrance from a peach!

The poets have not written so many Epithalamiums, by a hundredth part, as might have been expected, nor is the majority of what they have written worth reading. In Italy, it is true, and we suppose in other southern countries, there are poetasters who make a trade of such things, and who send you up a panegyric sonnet from the street-door, on every possible occasion; but we are speaking of what has been written by poets, truly so called; and whether it is, that they themselves have seldom written on such subjects but for patrons, or whether the poem would have been thought too great a display for the parties, or whether the poet felt too much in earnest about them to write even a hearty song, or thought too strongly upon his own case, (good or ill,) or whether he "envied" the man, and wished, as Sir Anthony Absolute says, to "marry the girl himself"—certain it is, that Epithalamiums from celebrated pens have been, for the most part, failures—cold and splendid nothings. See those in the Latin and Italian poets (Tasso and others,) the French, and the old English. They are all escapes from character and feeling, into every species of irrelevancy except one, and that one is badly managed. We have plenty of stately words, plenty of personifications of realms and rivers, plenty of Auroras and Venuses and other mythologies, and plenty of politics. Seine weds Danube, or Danube weds Tiber, or somebody's Marquisate weds somebody's Earldom, and Hymen is invoked, and the bride is very beautiful, and the bridegroom a paragon of manliness, and there is a heap of roses and lilies, and Cupids, and hopes, and tresses, and pearls, and torches, and evening stars, and now and then a plentiful sprinkle of indecorums; but seldom a word of real feeling, much less any distinctions of character—any real portraits of the wedded couple—any such account as we like to have when who has married who, and anticipations are made of the kind of happiness to be looked for from the nature and disposition of the parties. There is a whole volume of Epithalamiums written by Marino, who carried every folly in verse to an extreme; and these might serve for thorough specimens, or involuntary burlesques, of the entire system. The best things about them are the names of the parties. It is difficult to read of unions between "Don Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua, and Donna Margherita of Savoy," or "Don Vincenzo Imperiali" and the lady "Caterina Grimaldi," or the "most illustrious Signor the Conte Filiberto Tesauero" and "Madama di Vernon," without hoping something better to ensue than long canting odes about ancestors and Paphos, or sonnets on doves and turtles. One would almost feel ashamed to think (if his manifestly good heart did not relieve even his horrible debauchery) that the very best bit of genuine tenderness ever effused on these occasions, is to be found in the pages of a Latin poet—and he, one of the most profligate writers that ever lived! Yet so it is. We are aware of nothing in all the land of Epithalamium, comparable to that single exquisite little picture of the infant—the pledge of love—in the poems of Catullus.

Torquatus, volo, parvulus
Matris e gremio sum
Forrigas teneras Manus,
Dulce rident ad patrem
Semihante labella.

"May a young Torquatus soon
Lying next his mother's heart,
Stretch his little hands apart,
And with mouth half-open the while Sweetly at his father smile."

But the version of this passage, be it said (since we have a personal right to make the objection,) does not do it justice. "May there soon be a young Torquatus," says the poet, "who, stretching forth his tender hands from the bosom of his mother, shall sweetly smile at his father with his little half-open mouth."

And what follows, is not unworthy:

Sit suo similis patri
Manlio, et facile incisi
Nocitetur ab ornibus,
Et pudicitie sum
Matris indicet ore.

"May his look his father's be,
So as to strike instantly;
Yet his mother's, too, express,
In a certain bashfulness."

Indeed, the whole poem is full of paintings after nature, and the most genuine feeling. Theocritus, and Homer himself, would have admired it. Nor should we be so ungrateful to the author as to fancy that its most exquisite passages may have been stolen from the Greeks; for though a great poet upon them, he had a rich stock of genius of his own. There is nothing even in Theocritus's Bridal of Helen to compare with it, though the former contains one of the best Epithalamiums extant. We confess we hold it for a shame to the modern world, boasting as it does to surpass the ancients in sentiment, particularly in regard to womanhood, that it can produce nothing of the sort, to rival the effusion of Catullus. Some of the little wedding-songs in Beaumont and Fletcher, are the best we can at present think of; but far indeed from the affectionate tenderness of the Latin poet; and those extraordinary poets almost always spoil what they do, with a mixture of town rakery. Suckling's famous ballad on a wedding, is exquisite of its kind—fresh as a young, a cunning, and good-natured lip; but the kind is unluckily a mixed one, after the same fashion, and difficult to quote. Yet who can ever mention it without repeating the ever-quoted passage?

"Her lips were red, and one was thin,
Compared to that was next her chin;
Some bee had stung it newly."

Nor is the petteir fancy about the feet less original, or hardly less admired; and observe how he effuses, and, as it were, swallows it up, in the larger overwhelming simile of the burst of sunshine:

"Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out,
As if they fear'd the light;
But, oh! she dances such a way!
No sun upon an Easter-day
Is half so fine a sight."

The celebrated Epithalamium of Spenser, perhaps the best altogether in the language, is gorgeous, voluptuous, full of the most refined sensual elegance, and consecrated more-over by the stars; yet, like those of Tasso, it is somehow too stately, and scholar-like—too loftily serious, even in its gaieties. One fancies that a kind of celestial schoolmaster is going to be married. And yet never was mythology so daintily managed. Here is a picture equal to Correggio:

"Behold how goodly my fair love does lie,
In proud humility!
Like unto Maia, when as Jove her took
In Tempe, lying on the flowery grass,
Twixt sleep and wake, when that she weary was
With bathing in the Aoidalian brook."

Next to Spenser's poem, our best Epithalamiums, only ones, we fear, worth much remembrance, are those of a great wit and intellect, who is supposed, by some, to be nothing but a bundle of conceits—Mr. Donne. In occasional passages, they are even superior in depth and feeling, though the veridicality of their truthfulness (honest in that depth) hinders them from being quotable to the "general ear." One of them is upon the marriage of poor wretched Car, Earl of Somerset, with Lady Essex—singular personages for the feeling and thoughtful Donne to panegyricize. The faith expressed in their love, however, by this good and great child-like man, however startling to us when we know under what circumstances they were married, was, no doubt, as far as regards himself, good and true. Let us hope, therefore, there were more circumstances than we are aware of, to extenuate, if possible, their crimes. One thing there certainly was—they were victims of their own beauty.

What made us call these bridal effusions to mind, was the having been present the other day at the marriage of a friend. It is an increasing, and we think laudable fashion, to conduct these matters with as much privacy as possible; for though wedding-favors are a cheerful sight for the eyes of the rest of the world, and cheerful sights are not often enough given them, and although publicity, when it is not to be helped, as in the case of royal marriages, ought to put the best face on the business it can, yet it must be felt by all truly loving couples, as something of a desecration and an impertinence. If we lived in a golden age, and nothing evil were thought of what is not so, or no impertinent consciousness and sense of power assumed over the parties upon the strength of so innocent a bit of knowledge, then, indeed, the case would be altered; and not only would the white ribbons in hats, and the paragraphs in newspapers, and the proclamations in churches, be regarded but as public dues to sympathy and the rights of joy, but the street-musicians might come forth, as of old, and dancers be set forth, and healths drunk at open windows to the populace, and even a license, within the bounds of good taste, be given to all sorts of loving associations of ideas, and merry speeches; but till the planet roll round into that sunny period out of the mists and difficulties in the way of us "honest youth" of the Honi soit principle, delicacy must be allowed to step a pace or two back in the road of progression, by very reason of the multitudes that have become half-cognizant of it; and, therefore, we are for private marriages, single-meanings, and no favors to coachmen. There is meaning enough in the thoughts of every body; and (not to be prudish and hypocritical, which we hate worse than a little license, for there is worse belief in it) very pretty meaning it is, and very allowable, because very human, and not to be helped; but as it is beautiful to see this consciousness manifest itself in the very increase of the respect, mixed with cheerful tenderness, toward the parties, so we heartily sympathize with that honest sea-captain whom Steele mentions somewhere, as present at a wedding-dinner, and who, whenever a silly fellow uttered some distressing impertinence, added, by way of an inverted sort of Amen, "Knock him down."

On a wedding-day, every body, so to speak, is wedded. The servants—the household—think of nothing but the day for a month before; the older relations recall their own; the younger, if marriageable, go through a thousand reflections upon "new ties," hopes, non-hopes, doubts, difficulties, and Mr. Smith; and the youngest of all look as if they had suddenly grown five years older, and had some respectable and matronly thoughts on the subject, apart from sympathies with their brother or sister. The little girl writes a long letter to her friend, Miss Thomson; and having felt herself at a disadvantage in the throng, and being conscious of no ideas on the matter, except that she must vindicate her right to be thought something of, though Susan is married, declares she has acquired a dislike to the "wedded state;" and is very severe on the dresses of some of the parties, and the foolish looks of "that hobbady hoy," Mr. Thomas Gibbs. As to the boys, they are in some extreme, either of politeness or indifference, or else they are very insolent and brotherly, especially if school-boys, and more especially if brothers to the lady. They congratulate her on having "got a husband at last;" and wonder what a figure she will cut, sitting at the head of a table.

But all the grown people (with the exception of such as differ with the match, or were not consulted upon it) are in a state of benevolence; and they meet an equally benevolent party, though strangers, in the clergymen and parish clerk, who await them in the vestry, and the pew-opener who stands curtsying in the chancel. The clergyman, being a gentleman, is not to be supposed to care for his fee in the particular; but neither is it to be expected of him that he should be indifferent to it in the gross. The clerk, breathing a serene clerical atmosphere, adjusts his respectable demeanor to the tranquillity of the clergyman; and if the pew-opener's curtsy has a bland eye to her half-crown, still there is something about herself that is decent and motherly, and not unmixed with a genuine feeling of consideration toward the young-folks as well as the gentle-folks. She, as well as the clerk and the clergyman, has had a wedding of her own; and perhaps she sighs to think how people may be disappointed, even though they come to be married in silks and satins. She has a daughter, also, and is not quite sure that she is happy with the green-grocer. Then there are the passengers who gather at the carriage stops, and make an avenue for the party to the church-door. It must be said, to their credit, that they are generally very staid and well-mannered. Their puzzle is, to be certain that they distinguish the bride and bridegroom; not always an easy matter among a party of friends and bride-maids. In Charles the Second's time, spectators were hardly so considerate, though the internal reflections among them were perhaps not very different. The parties themselves, also, did not carry matters so gravely. "To church in the morning," says Pepys, in one of his memorandums, and there saw a wedding in the church, which I have not seen many a day; and the young people so merry one with another; and strange to see the delight we married people have, to see these poor fools decoyed into our condition, every man and woman gazing and smiling at them." (Vol. I. Chap. IV. p. 384.) Which reminds us of an anecdote of pleasant Jack Taylor, author of "Monsieur Tonson," whom we met, a little before his death, hobbling with an ever-juvenile countenance to a dinner-party. He said one day, "I met So-and-So this morning. He is married, and I congratulated him upon it. And yet, I do not know, poor fellow, why I did so; for he never did me any injury."

On the occasion which gave rise to the present article, the parties assembled in the church were all of a nature which it was agreeable to contemplate. The father, a man of wealth and consequence, with a spirit above the ordinary notions on such points, was at the altar, to give his daughter away to a young man of letters, not poor, but not rich. The latter, no ordinary scholar, with a rare universality of apprehension, and destined, if we are not greatly mistaken, to make a distinguished figure in his career, if he can but subject a certain vehemence of will to the greatness of his heart and understanding, had fancied that this said will would carry him through any scene unshaken; and yet, here he was, trembling as the service began, through every masculine fibre, at the thought of the solemn responsibility he was taking upon him for the happiness of the person he loved. The young lady, than whom none could have been better qualified for his companion, both by good temper and by a like catholic tendency of brain, discernible through that very kind of child-like gaiety and ingenuousness, which is confounded by the undiscerning with a simplicity of a different sort, was more collected than himself, by reason of her being gathered for life under the shadow of his wing. You could only see how she was affected, by the most pleasing of all indications in these cases—the low gentleness of her responses. The rest of us, both young and old, we flatter ourselves, all behaved with an extreme propriety, between cheerfulness and awe; the painted window over the altar (always looking like a bit of heaven) shone down upon us; the very clerk seemed to catch a more than clerical tone of good sense and feeling from the clergyman; and the clergyman it was impossible for any clergyman to surpass, in the emphatic reasonableness, the unaffected grace, and well-tempered Christian emotion, with which he read the service. We are happy to find (as indeed we expected of such a man) that he omitted a part of it, now seldom read, and surely much better dropped, in which a mistaken spirituality is carried to an extreme, degrading to honest and natural affections, and dangerous to the sense of truth. The rest, like almost every part of the services of the church, is delicate and beautiful.

The first marriage ceremony at which we ever attended, was during our childhood; and we remember being astonished at our getting into a corner apart, and pouring out floods of tears. It was an evidence of that remarkable intuition which resides in the feelings, and which every body must have observed in themselves who have thought about the matter—that knowledge, as it were, without knowledge, or intellectual perception without consciousness—of the critical reasons for feeling as we do, long before we can give any account of them. All uncritical people have it at all times more or less, at all times of life. Audiences at theatres are full of it; and laugh and weep in the right places, though one man in fifty might not be able to give a reason for his emotion, in a paragraph in a newspaper. Infants have it, when they reciprocate practical jests and arch looks, before they can speak. It is Nature's reasoning; and twenty to one, if it could speak, would beat hollow that of the critics, considering how diverted from pure reason they are accustomed to be by a hundred sophisticate irrelevancies. What our tears meant, without our knowing it was, that we were in the presence of two people about to unite their destinies for life, and calling upon heaven to witness the care and love they would have for one another, "for better, for worse," come betwixt that time and the grave what might. The whole obscure future of human existence, and the next world besides, was set open before us, and the glimpse overwhelmed us with a sense of all the doubt, weakness, and responsibility, which these two fellow-creatures were taking upon themselves to encounter. Never since have we been able to restrain our eyes quite on similar occasions, though the drops have fallen less and less, and "Years have brought the philosophic mind."

But, on the present occasion, we encountered a new and unexpected source of emotion. The clergyman, such as we have described him, and something more besides—a man with keen eyes, a good-natured smile, and a noble profile—in short, himself an extraordinary man both for reputation and powers, turned out to be one who was supposed to have been the critic, and the very hard critic, of the dearest friend we ever possessed—of one of the rarest and best-intentioned friends the world ever possessed; and to have dealt a severe blow to his reputation, and his heart. The supposition has been declared unfounded, and we have nothing farther to say on that part of the matter: indeed, we should not have touched farther upon it in any case. All that we meant to observe, was, that there, for the first time, stood visible to us this supposed enemy of our friend, and that so loving and unhostile, nevertheless, was the image that that friend retained in our memories, and so the reverse of all that was supposed of him the impression left by his doctrines, mixed as all doctrines are with mistake, that our first and only impulse, as his representative, was to have gone up to his critic, and requested him, in both our names, to shake hands with us. And we should unquestionably have done so, had we thought it would have been as pleasing to his notions of Christianity as to our own; in which doubt we very likely did him a wrong, and assumed too much for ourselves; and we hereby accordingly beg his pardon for it—not with any feelings of an ostentatious charity, God knows, or anything the least resembling it—granting even that we had a right to give charity more than to take it; which we do not pretend. Far from us be any such despicable impertinence. But what we felt, we have stated; to be construed, we hope, in his own and other such minds, after their kindest fashion. We are all human beings alike, the frailest of us, as well as the noblest; and what he and every one else, arrived at the truly Christian time of life and reflection, of which such minds are capable, will, we trust, be glad of, is to see that it is possible for men of the greatest difference of opinion on some points, to mean well, and feel not unkindly, on all.

The contemplation of the happiness of others makes one desire to see all the world happy; and the truly Christian sentiments to be found at the heart of every Christian creed are apt to make us wonder that all the world does not become so. However, all in good time. The root must grow before the flower. Happy they, meanwhile, who can distinguish its buddings, and are sure that it will come.

BATTLE OF WATERLOO!

FROM "STORIES OF MY FOSTER-FATHER."

Well do I remember that evening on which my worthy foster-father, for the very first time, communicated to an admiring and wonder-stricken audience of the villagers, the surprising and most spirit-stirring events of the celebrated struggle, by which the destiny of Europe and Napoleon was finally decided.

Before permitting the historian to speak in his own person, it might be well to furnish my readers with some slight sketch of one who deemed that, on the wide face of the habitable globe, there lived no other man who ever possessed, or was at any time at all likely to possess, the title part of his general information on all possible subjects!

Murty O'Callaghan was at the wrong side of sixty, if one could believe the evidence of Judith Crowley, a daring old woman, who, unimpaired by the certain prospect of the great man's displeasure, did actually swear as to her certainty of his age. Though bowed down, in some degree, by a stoop in his shoulders, he yet possessed considerable activity and strength. He resented, with the most vehement indignation, the least insinuation against his youthfulness, and never could bring himself to pardon the deep affront or withdraw his anger, unless upon a full and frank confession of wilful folly and malignity, by the unlucky individual so offending. Murty also imagined that he came from the hands of Nature "a born beauty," but upon what grounds he founded this imagining, it would be next to an impossibility to divine, as each and every feature presented a striking contrast to any and every standard by which we are accustomed to estimate our notions of beauty. However, it was not one physical excellence that Murty O'Callaghan alone prided himself: it was upon the acknowledged superiority of his "janus," and that janus was equal to any undertaking, from the simple operation of worming a cur dog, to the construction of the most intricate mechanism of a "good watch!" Besides, he was story-teller and historian to the village—he having for ever silenced old Peggy Murphy, in one capacity, and the schoolmaster himself, in the other. Barney Roche, the blacksmith, at one period universally considered to be the ablest politician in the whole barony—a reputation earned by the total neglecting of his forge—dared not now even hazard a single comment upon Peel or O'Connell, in the august presence of Murty, without deferring, with a bitterly-felt and badly assumed humility to the great man's omnipotent opinion on such points! Indeed, if Master Barney Roche were at all wise, and had not his eyes been lamentably obscured by the demon of jealousy, he might possibly have had wit enough to perceive how much he had gained by his loss; for, since the memorable occasion of his rival's signal triumph, Barney's returning customers found him more constantly near the anvil, and more punctual in the performance of their jobs.

An entire volume would hardly suffice to record Mr. O'Callaghan's opinions on men and things, or his noble remarks on the enormity of the tobacco-tax, which was, as he said, "all down on the poor, the chrayturs, who didn't get as much as an inch for a pinny, bekase the govmint was goin to the devil wid it intirely!"

Such was Murty, as, on the evening in question, he sat by his own fire, surrounded by a group of his most faithful and most humble followers. Barney Roche, happily, was not there to mar his complete triumph, by a sneering grin on his unwashed countenance, or by putting some untimely and puzzling query, just as Murty was sailing down the full tide of popularity. My foster-father had indeed appointed this night, as the one on which he was to delight his friends by a particular and veracious account of the battle of Waterloo.

Turf had been heaped in abundance on the fire by my active nurse, Katty O'Callaghan, who, carefully providing the place of honor for her "darlin' Master Frank," meaning myself, then sat opposite to her illustrious husband, gazing on him with a mingled expression of intense pride, anxiety, and affection.

"Yerra, Uncle avick, begin with the shtory," said Murty's nephew, Corney Fogarty; "here's Ellen Griffin and Mary O'Leary, an' they can't con-tain themselves wid waitin' for ye to begin."

The young ladies, alluded to by the roguish Corney, tittered and cried—"Be aisy, will ye, Corney! Don't mind him, Mistor O'Callaghan! he's always joking with his thricks."

A more generally expressed desire to hear Murty at last seemed to induce him to break silence. He commenced:—"Well, thin, I suppose ye all hard about Boney an' the Frinch, and how he becum a king all of a suddint; for, if ye didn't, I'll tell ye."

"God bless ye, sir," was the thankful exclamation on the part of his gaping auditory.

"Well, thin," continued the historian, "wanst upon a time, and a very good time it was, the ould king of the Frinch, Louis, becum mighty hard upon his people, puttin' some ov 'em into prison, thansportin' ov more, an' hangin' more ov 'em for divarshin. He was goin' on this way for some time, whin the people, seein' 'emselves made away wid in that manner, an' for nothin' at all in life, be Jemey, they run'd to the palls, and they tuk the ould fellow pris'ner, in spite ov all the sodergers could do to pravit them from takin' ov him. Well, that same wouldn't plaze their minds, but they should go an' cut off his head, an' do the like to the poor ould queen, the chraytur, that never harmed any one, nor never hurted a hair ov their heads."

"My dear sows, Mistor Boney thin cum wid his palaver, an' he begins to tip 'em the rael Blarney, tellin' 'em what a grate dale he wouldn't be afther doin' for the poor, af they only made king ov him, an' how the devil a bit ov him would be mane enuf to put a tax upon the tobacco, but would lave every livin' sowl to shmoke his own pipe in pace and cumfirt!"

"Good luck to him! for that, Mistor O'Callaghan," was the exclamation, as Murty touched upon a tender point.

"Musha, amin, I say," continued he,—"Well, my dear, Boney used ever an' always to be cursin' ov the English, an', of coorse, the Irish along wid 'em. There was nothin' like this for plazin' the Frinch; an' so to make a long story short, they tuk an' clapped him upon the throne, an' made him a king in no time. The dickens a one ov him was there long, before he begun conquerin' an' batin' the world, an' robbin, an' shtrippin', an' plunderin' all the nashins over; an', be Jingo, doin' what hisself wished wid every haporth in life he could pat his four fingers and thumb upon."

"Sure enuf, the grate Imperir of Jarminee, nothin' 'ud do him but to give his own beautiful daughter, an' make Boney put away wan wife to take the tother, an' make her a rael queen. Well, all in good time, there was as a darlint young prence cum, as ever ye clapped eyes upon; an' maybe 'tis Boney an' his lady war'n proud in 'emselves, an' delighted intirely, bekase ov the babby! Naboclish, war'at they?"

"Boney, bein' soft an account ov the young prence comin' into the world, faix, my dear sows, le tuk it into his head to make friends wid ould George; an' so, out of the greatest civility an' fine breedin', he sint him, be post, an invite for himself, or any of his family that was in the humor, to cum to France, 'an' be at the christnin' on the darlint babby."

"Whin the invite cum, sez George, sez he, to his ould lady, 'I've news for ye, my ducky!'"

"What's that?" sez the ould lady, sez she.

"Yerra, now, be afther guessin', my dear," sez he.

"The devil take the wan ov me that can!" sez the queen.

"Well, thin," sez he, at last, "'tis an invite from Boney, to go all the ways to France to stand gossip to his babby!"

"Yerra, George, 'pon yer sowl, are ye sairiss?" sez the ould lady.

"I never was more so in all my born days," sez he.—"Here, take the letter," sez he.

"With that, the ould lady put her hand in her pocket, an' she tuk out her glasses, an' she put 'em on her nose, an' she read the letter from back to front. Yerra, faix, 'tis she put herself in the rage all out whin she had done readin'; for, ye see, the ould queen hard that Boney's lady sed that the ould queen ov England was nothin' but an ould baste, neither good for king or counthry! So, sez she, 'Bad luck to the imperat bliggard, how dar he, or any upstart like him, prasume to sind sich a letter to the king ov England and Scotland, and ould Ireland, the darlint, into the bargain? I wouldn't budge the length ov my nose; an' as for you, George, ye're nothin' but a poor mane, wake-spereted chraytur, af ye have anythin' in life to do with him, or his babby, or his spitfire ov a wife. I hard, sez the queen, 'that she has the devil ov a crooked peeper, an' that the chin ov her would clane a tobacco-pipe!'"

"Yerra, my dear sows, this was all pure spite; bekase the queen ov France was as purty a faymale as ye ever see in a day's walk."

"Well, there was the devil ov a letter sint from England, tellin' Boney that the king ov England, nor any of his seed, breed, or generashin, would n' deince 'emselves by havin' anythin' to do wid Boney or the like ov him!"

"Oh, blood!" sez Boney, 'is this all my thanks for my civility in axin' sich an omadhaun ov a baste to stand gossip to a decent man's child? Bad luck to him; but 'tis I'll have me revinge'. Naboclish!"

"Sure enuf, as soon as the next day cum, he ordered all the people to assamble in a large field, near the coort, an' he, an' his lady, and the nurse a'carryin' ov the little prence in her arms. Well, Boney, and the wife, and child, all wint up soort ov high big place, that the people, high an' low, gentle an' simple, might be afther seein' and hearin' all he had to say. Whin he got up, he made them as genteel a bow as ever Paddy Corkoran, the dancing-master, was able to do before the leedies, an' he clapt his hand in his breeches-pocket, an' he tuk out the letter, an' he read it at the top of his voice. Oh, murder alive! what a groanin' they set up, whin they hard what the ould strange king wrote to their darlint Boney! My dear, whin Boney see the rage they got into, all on a suddent, faix, he turns about, an' he takes the babby out ov the nurse's arms; an' he sez, 'Will ye have the prence be ansulted by any man, if he was a king tin times over? I say, will ye have the ould on-mannerly nigger, the king ov England grin at him?'"

I declare to ye, the crabbed little rogue looked for all the world as if he knew what Boney was a sayin' ov him, an' he begun to clap his dawny paws, jist as much as to say, 'Be Jemey, this myself do n't care a pinch of snuff for any king ov 'em, barrin' my own daddy!'"

"The Lord love him for that!" ejaculated my nurse, with tears in her eyes, as she listened to her learned husband's interpretation of the royal child's action on the important occasion. "Sure enuf," continued she, "that's jist the dinctical way that Mistor Frank, there, would be crowin' like a game-cock, and clappin' his hands, whin his darlint mother used to cum an' see how he was a'gettin' on."

After obligingly adding the sanction of his authority to my nurse's statement, in reference to my infant peculiarities, Murty resumed:—"Whin Boney axed them would they have any furriner dare lay as much as a toit finger on the prence, they all begin to bawl out, that they'd die tin times over before they'd suffer the likes."

"What am I to do wid the kaanankress ould bliggard," says Boney, "am I to lave the Frinch people, who 're the greatest ov all nashins, to be spit upon by any king alive?'"

"Go to war wid him!" sez they, 'we'll bate the consait ov ov him! We'll go in ships to England, and take the ould fellow prisoner!'" So Boney sed he'd do jist what they told him, an' he quite content to lave his wife and babby to their keepin' till he cum back from the war.

"Whin ould George hard this, in Lunna, faix, sooner than he'd have the Frinch sodergers cum over to his counthry, playin' randy wid his people, he up an' told the grate Juke of Willington to get the Inglish an' the Scotch, an' plenty ov the fine Irish sodergers, an' to go an' bate the saucy Frinch."

"Bravo! ov the ould king!" exclaimed Murty's excited and highly interested auditory, as they fixed their eyes on his animated countenance, radiant with pride and importance. He gave one triumphant smile, and resumed his history.

"Well, both ov the two armies cum together at the Waterloo. Ye see the raisin why they call it the Waterloo, is bekase there's a little shtrame of wather a'runnin' down the middle ov the field—an' that's the waterloo!"

"Boney made a fine illigant speechin' to his army, an' the Juke did the same; an' thin the both ov 'em begin to huzza like mad. 'Damn my buttons,' sez Boney, to a general be his side, that was ridin' on a beutiful stallion, 'I wish to my heart I had sich sodergers as them apposite me there. Take out yer telescope, an' tell what rigement is them wid the nate green facins all on their coats and breeches?'"

"Faix, yer Majesty, sure enuf, them is the best ov sodergers a belongin' to the Juke—they're the Ianiskillen Dhragoons; an' them widout no horses, are the boys that bates Banagher, an' he bates the devil, be all accounts—they're the Connaught Rangers!"

"I'm sorry for 'em," sez Boney, 'sez he, takin' a pinch in the left side ov his nosick, 'I like their look; but my own min 'ill make biled porridge of 'em! Go along,' sez he, 'an' tell 'em to charge down on the Juke, and deaire the cannins to rattle away at his sodergers.' With that the general rides away on his beutiful stallion, an' he told what Boney sed.

"Now boys!" sed the Juke, an' he tuk off his cocked-hat, an' feathers flyin' mighty grand, 'there's the Frinch forist ye; an' if ye don't bate them, why, be gorra, they'll bate ye, an' that all! I tell ye what's more, above that same, they'll pinistrate into yer counthry, an' there'll be no ind to what they'll be afther doin' to every livin' sowl ov yer people, men, women, and babbies!"

"Oh, my dear, 'tis the Juke sed enuf to put 'em on their mettle; an' whin down the cannins begin to rattle, the ould boy himself could n't stand 'em, they war so mad to be at the Frinch! An', to bate it all, the band begin to shtrike up 'Garryowen' an' 'Patrick's Day in the Morning,' so fine, to keep up their sperrets!"

"Oh, thin glory to you, Mistor O'Callaghan, 'tis yerself is the fine warrant for a story!" was the cry.

Returning the compliment by a broader smile than the former one, the elated Murty continued:—

"Well, thin the battle begin'd in rael airmest, the music playin', the horses chargin', the cannons a'rattlin', and the sodergers huzzaing, whin they war puckin' aich other wid the swords, an' preddin' aich other wid the bagnets! There they war dhivin', and pushin', an' skelpin', an' they shtrandin' up to their ancles in blood, all the same as af it war a pool ov wather."

"The Lord be good to us, an' save us from all harm!" ejaculated the group, with a strong expression of horror.

"Oh," said Murty, "t'would take me a week to tell ye the killin', an' murderin', an' batin' they had; an' they no sooner stoppin' for a mouthful of fresh air, than they'd begin as if they'd never get enuf ov the wars! There was wan young Frinch chap, an' the devil a wan ov him, but he killed a hundred-an'-forty min wid a long gun he had! He'd fire an' shoot his man; thin, whin he'd see the balls comin' towards him, faix he'd, cute enuf, go down on his face and hands, an' lave him to go over his own shoulder, an' kill anybody they'd plase! He was risin' his hundred-an'-forty, whin Paddy Magrath, a corporal in the Connaught rangers, see what the party boy was at, an' he sez, 'Be the powers of pewter! my bouchal, but I'll take the coal off ov yer pipe in a hurry. Naboclish!' sez Paddy. Wid that he watched, an' he pretended to take aim at the young Frinch soderger; an' the Frinch fellow throw'd himself down agin, to lave the shot go over him. Faix, Paddy didn't fire till the boy was down, an' thin he tuk him clane an' nate in the small of back, an' the dickens a wan ov the Frinch gladhiator ever riz off ov the airth agin!"

Paddy, had he now been present, would have heard a loud shout of admiration at the mention of his achievement.

"Well," continued Murty, "afther scrimmages here an' there an' everywhere, Boney seen the day a'gois' agin' him; an' he called a sargint ov Frinch Dhragoons, an' he told him to run down, as fast as his horse would carry him, an' to tell his father-in-law, the king of Jarminee, that the battle was a'gois' agin him, an' for him to be afther siadin' up help inmaydhility."

"The sargint wint, sure enuf, an' he soon cum to where all the tints of the king of Jarminee war on the green sod. He seen a general, an' he axed him where was the king, an' that hisself was carryin' a message from Boney to him. The general, civil, an' decent, told him that he'd see him a walkin' before his own tint, wid his dhressin' gown on, an' red shippers on his two feet, an' he readin' a book. So the sargint cum up where the king was apposite a large tint, with a beutiful color a'flyin' out on the top ov it; and he went down on his knees, as be coorse he should, to a ra:l king, an' he sed he cum from Boney."

"How's the battle a goin', ye bliggard?" sez the king, mighty proud.

"'Tis a goin' agin Boney," sez the poor sargint, 'an' I was ordered to cum to yer majesty for help."

"Do ye tell me 'tis goin' agin my son-in-law?" sez the king agin.

"The devil a word ov a lie I'm tellin', but the blessed thruth, as I hope to be saved, amin," sez the sargint, an' he crossin' hisself mighty piess, for he was a rael Roman.

"Well thin, my man, ye may go to the seventeen divils, for all I care about the likes ov you or him; for since I gave him my beutiful daughter, he's keepin' ov me in bilin' wather, an' risin' intimes, like musharoons, up before me. Go away; I'll give the vagabone no help, but to bate him; an' go tell him so for me. Don't say a word, or I'll cut yer head off yer shoulders," sez the king to the onfortunate sargint.

"Wid that, he called the general, an' he told him to get a hundred thousand horseman, an' to jine the Juke ov Willington's army, an' to bang Boney off ov the face ov the airth."

"Oh! my dear sows, down they cum; an' they war jist in time enuf to see my bould Juke batin' ov the Frinch, an' Boney dhivin' away in his coach-an'-six, an' he all wounded in the pole, wid a red handkerchief tied, round about it! Well, the Jarmans purchased the Frinch, an' they murdered an' killed 'em right an' left, till the never a wan ov 'em remained upon t'ie field ov battle.

"An' so that was the way that the Juke an' Boney had their divarshin at the battle of the WATERLOO!"

THE DISTINCTIVE DIE.

BY HENRY COCKTON.

Author of Valentine Vox, Stanley Thorn, George St. George Julian, &c.

When the science of Phrenology shall have established an universal Lynch Law, by virtue of the testimony of a man's own organs being considered legal evidence against him, it must be abundantly manifest to all, save those who are either extremely thick-headed, or whose organs are rather suspiciously developed, that such perfection will be held to be a sound constitutional comfort, per se, by every regular philanthropist alive.

Happily, however, there is no real necessity for waiting until Trial by Phrenology shall have totally superseded our present corrupt system of Trial by Jury, in order to illustrate the strictly scientific proposition, that there is among men no organ so universally developed by either the cerebellum or the cerebrum, as that of Philoprogenitiveness proper. Its influence, moreover, is most powerful: if viewed solely with reference to a man's own offspring, nothing can surpass it in point of strength: it is shed upon every infant, in every social sphere, from the royal angel to the dustman's duck.

Such being the case, then, it will not, by the intellectual, be deemed extraordinary, that Mr. Thomas Trimmer, the respectable individual now about to be introduced, should have had this particular organ large. It will be, notwithstanding, quite right to explain, that its influence, previously to his own little stranger being welcomed, had been so completely unfelt that he never gave the children of his friends the apparition of a chance, although subsequently to that important period of his history, he amused, caressed, and romped with them all, with a daring disregard of those natural consequences with which such temerity commonly teems; for he loved them, and they loved him; even with those who were old enough to judge of the human countenance, he was a favorite, he was so ugly.

It is, of course, well known there are several species of ugliness which are repulsive; but the ugliness of this gentleman was of an interesting caste. His laugh was the most contagious laugh ever beheld; for as he brought every muscle into play, he laughed completely all over his face, which was very agreeable. But, independently of this pleasing characteristic, there was a peculiar charm about his figure; for although he was short, he was strikingly plump, and as he prided himself especially upon the undeniably fashionable cut of his clothes, his appearance, on the whole, was unique.

Now, that a man thus gifted should have an amiable, elegant wife, is not marvellous: the fact, therefore, of Mrs. Trimmer being elegant and amiable, is not stated with the view of inducing the world to wonder, but in order to show how natural it was for Trimmer himself to be happy; for happy, indeed, he was, very happy, and so was Mrs. Trimmer; they loved each other fondly, and when the heir arrived, he was, in the estimation of both, the most extraordinary specimen of his species ever invented. In the annals of infants not one could be found remotely comparable with him. He was, indeed, a phenomenon; there was nothing at all like him alive. He had ten of the most remarkable toes in nature! and so extremely precocious was he, that before he was ten months old he could actually lie upon his back, bring the two great ones up to his mouth, and continue to suck them, like an angel, for hours! Nor was this all! Not by any means; no—in less than twelve months from the period of his birth, he had three of the most wonderful teeth that ever sprang from human gums. They were perfectly unparalleled teeth. Nothing like them had ever been seen. And he would show them!—it was amazing how that child would show those three teeth. Nor did he stop even here! One morning, a fourth was discovered in the act of peeping through, and that discovery led to circumstances which render that particular morning memorable—circumstances which it is now deemed correct to record.

Philosophers who have dived to any depth into the study of human motives, have, in all probability, observed that children, in general, are extremely fond of paper; but whether philosophers have, in reality, observed this or not, it may be stated, that children in general are, and that the value of any paper within reach, is not, in their view, a matter of the smallest importance, for they would just as soon tear up a fifty pound note as they would pick to bits a five-cent-and-a-half representative of the beautiful currency of Natchez or Mississippi.

The propriety of alluding to this fact may not, at present, perhaps, be very apparent; but anon, it will be seen how this singular fondness for paper produced those results which have now to be explained.

Having somewhat miraculously discovered this fourth fancy tooth, Mrs. Trimmer, in the pride of her heart, rushed into the parlor, with the view of showing the novel production to papa; and as the sight of it threw them both into a state of inexpressible rapture, the infant managed, unperceived, to pluck a note from the joyous bosom of Mrs. Trimmer, and to hold it tightly until she had quitted the room alone.

She had scarcely, however, left a single instant before Trimmer, while dancing and singing, and lavishing the usual endearments upon his own little beauty, saw this horrid note, of which the contents were as follow:—

"My dearest Love,

"Indeed, it delights me to think that I shall, this evening, pass another happy hour with you alone. It was kind of you to inform me that Trimmer dines out, and I will give you a thousand kisses for that act of kindness; but till seven, my sweetest, adieu, and believe me to be ever your own ALFRED."

Trimmer groaned on reading this: he groaned fiercely: and having pursed his lips and knitted his brows, groaned again.

"Is it possible?" he exclaimed, as the perspiration sprang from every pore. "Is it, can it be possible! Woman!—woman! oh! woman! Another happy hour!" he added, on recurring with a fiend-like smile to this most unhappy note. "He dines out!—does he? a thousand kisses! I should like to catch him at it! Come here, you little wretch!" he continued, placing the infant upon his knee, and looking at it with an expression of the most intense severity. "If you could tell tales! if you knew what I wish to know! Why what likeness is there between us? Is that my nose? Is that mouth like mine? Would I own such a mouth? You miserable little imp—I almost hate you!"

As the infant had been by no means accustomed to such extremely harsh language, he began to express his feelings of indignation in the usual manner, when Trimmer, with an aspect of disgust, rolled him roughly upon the rug, and rang the bell.

"Take that kid from the room," said he, furiously, as the servant entered; "I'll not have the little wretch squalling here."

The girl looked at her master with an expression of amazement; for she really did not know what to make of it at all! Instead, however, of calling upon him to explain, she demanded an immediate explanation of the child.

"What is the masser wis se little man?" she cried. "What is the masser wis my little ducks of diamonds? Never mind sen!—come and tell me all about it! Come sen!—and sen we'll go aboady. There!—bless his little heart sen!—Is n't he a little ducks?"

"I'm a miserable man!" exclaimed Trimmer, intensely, on being left alone. "Who would have thought it? Who could have conceived it to be possible? I'll strangle him! And as for her!—Monstrous hypocrisy! Oh! monstrous! What's to be done? How am I to act? Shall I tell her at once that I have discovered her perfidy, or shall I watch her, and thereby deprive the base creature of the power to deny her shameless conduct?"

"Dear Tom! Why what on earth is the matter?" exclaimed the lady, as she entered into the room at this moment with the infant in her arms.

"The matter, madam!" echoed Trimmer, with a look of scorn.

"Why, what in the name of goodness can this mean?" "Do you, madam," said Trimmer, severely, and he trembled with violence as he spoke. "Do you perceive any resemblance between that child and me?"

"Resemblance!" said the lady, who could not assert with the slightest show of truth that she did, simply because there really was none. "Why he may resemble you more as he grows up. It's impossible to say; children at his age are so much alike."

"That's the misery. They are much alike! That's the germ of impunity for baseness. There should be some distinctive die, madam!—some DISTINCTIVE DIE!"

"What do you mean?"

"Mean, madam! Can you thus shamelessly look in my face, and with the calmness of innocence, ask what I mean?"

"Shamelessly look in your face! Tom, you are a monster!"

"I know it! I feel it! That ever I should have lived to see this day!"

"I will not put up with it sir! You treat me very ill! My father shall know of your cruelty."

"Weep, madam; weep! But oh! that I could see you weep for shame!"

"Shame! What is it you mean, sir? I insist upon knowing what you mean!"

"I dine out this evening, do I not? You will pass, madam, another happy hour alone! A thousand sweet kisses. Oh! model of deception!—you amaze me!"

"You amaze me, sir!"

"Leave the room, madam!"

"I have never before disobeyed you; but I will not leave the room!—nor shall you, sir! until you have explained."

"Do you require an explanation?"

"I do."

"Then do you happen," said he, with a most sarcastic sneer, as he held the dreadful note in his left hand, and violently struck it with his right: "do you happen to have seen this hand-writing before?"

"I have—it is that of Captain Todd."

"The devil fly away with Captain Todd!—And can you stand confessed—can you stand there and proclaim your shame—without even a blush?"

The lady smiled.

"What!" exclaimed Trimmer. "And are you thus abandoned?"

"I have a great mind to tease you, Tom! I now perceive what you mean. It would serve you quite right, sir!—you richly deserve it."

"Tease me, madam! Though my heart is tortured, though my fond hopes are blighted, though you have driven me almost to madness, I am not to be played with like a child!"

"And is he jealous?"

"No, madam, I am not jealous; but I will be satisfied!"

"Do you see this envelope, Tom?"

Trimmer snatched it from her hand when she had drawn it from her bosom, and found it addressed to his sister!

"Harriet!" he exclaimed, "was this sent to Harriet?"

"Why, of course!"

Trimmer dropped both the note and the envelope, and stood for a moment as if petrified—

"Fool!" said he, at length. "Oh!—fool!"

"Are you satisfied, sir?"

"Oh! Maria, forgive me!"

"Indeed, sir, I shall not. I have given you no cause to doubt my fidelity, and will not tolerate your unjust suspicions. That is all for which you jealous creatures care! You pay no regard whatever to our feelings. Oh! no—wound us as you will; charge us with whatever wickedness you will; you imagine, when you find that you are in error, that all you have to say is, 'Maria, forgive me!'—Indeed, I'll do nothing of the sort."

"But I'm really very sorry: I am, upon my honor. I am fit to strike my head off, for being such an ass. I, indeed, had no idea that they corresponded now; nor did I even know that his name was Alfred!"

"You should have inquired, sir, instead of at once accusing me of wickedness. I am surprised at you!"

"I am wrong, my love; I know that I am wrong; and am anxious to make all the reparation in my power; what can I do, what can I say, more?"

"Tom! Is it not amazing, that men who profess to love their wives—nay, who do love them, fondly—should be so anxious to catch at every word, at every thought, having reference to their infidelity, when they know that the suspicions thus engendered, may alone, however baseless they may be, have the direct effect of withering their happiness for ever?"

"Maria; as a husband and wife are morally, so all men who are jealous of their own honor, must, of necessity, be jealous of the honor of their wives."

"Nay, but when men are jealous, they appear to be most anxious to have their suspicions confirmed!"

"Not when they really love. That is the case only with those who are anxious to repudiate their wives. Do you think, now, that I would rather have my suspicions confirmed than removed?"

"I do n't know."

"You do know, Maria! You know that I would not. You know that you are all the world to me."

"Indeed, I know nothing of the sort. You are very cruel, Tom. I have a great mind to be seriously angry with you."

"Come! you must forgive me! Can you resist?"

At this moment his look was so droll that she could not help smiling, and the moment he perceived that, he kissed her with unfeigned affection.

"This is the way in which you cruel creatures triumph over our weakness," she observed. "But, indeed, I will not love you, if you are jealous."

"I'll be jealous no more. I am now so happy, that I could almost be tempted to let Captain Todd come to the house when he pleased. And you, my little beauty!" he added, taking the infant in his arms, "why, I might have been sure, so far as you were concerned!—those little laughing eyes might alone have convinced me!"

Still he strongly felt, that as in the absence of every test we are left completely in the dark upon the subject, it would be quite as well, not only as an improvement upon phrenology, but as a means of effectually preventing all mistakes, if every child were born with some DISTINCTIVE DIE.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Did, however, the gaudy flower of Titmouse's victory at Yatton contain the seeds of inevitable defeat at St. Stephen's? 'Twas surely a grave question; and had to be decided by a tribunal, the constitution of which, however, the legislature hath since seen fit altogether to alter. With matters, therefore, as they then were—but now are not—I deal freely, as with history.

The first glance which John Bull caught of his new House of Commons, under the Bill for Giving Everybody Everything, almost turned his stomach, strong as it was, inside out; and he stood for some time staring with feelings of alternate disgust and dismay. Really, as far at least as outward appearance and behaviour went, there seemed scarcely fifty gentlemen among them; and those appeared ashamed and afraid of their position. 'Twas, indeed, as though the scum that had risen to the simmering surface of the caldron placed over the fierce fires of revolutionary ardor, had been ladled off and flung upon the floor of the House of Commons. The shock and mortification produced such an effect upon John, that he took for some time to his bed, and required a good deal of severe treatment, before he in any degree recovered himself. It was, indeed, a long while before he got quite right in his head!—As they anticipated a good deal of embarrassment from the presidency of the experienced and dignified person who had for many years filled the office of Speaker, they chose a new one; and then, breathing freely, started fair for the session.

Some fifty seats were contested; and one of the very earliest duties of the new Speaker, was to announce the receipt of "a petition from certain electors of the borough of Yatton, complaining of an undue return; and praying the House to appoint a time for taking the same into its consideration. Mr. Titmouse, at that moment was modestly sitting immediately behind the Treasury bench, next to a respectable pork-butcher, who had been returned for an Irish county, and with whom Mr. Titmouse had been dining at a neighboring tavern, where he had drunk whiskey and water enough to elevate him to the point of rising to present several petitions from his constituents—first, from Smirk Mudflint, and others, for opening the universities of Oxford and Cambridge to Dissenters of every denomination, and abolishing the subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles; secondly, from Mr. Hic Hæc Hoc, praying for a commission to inquire into the propriety of translating the Eton Latin and Greek Grammars into English; thirdly, from several electors, praying the House to pass an act for exempting members of that House from the operation of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency laws, as well as from arrest on mesne and final process; and lastly, from several electors, praying the House to issue a commission to inquire into the cause of the Tick in sheep. I say this was the auspicious commencement of his senatorial career, meditated by Mr. Titmouse, when his ear caught the above startling words uttered by the Speaker, which so disconcerted him—prepared though he was for some such move on the part of his enemies, that he resolved to postpone the presentation of the petitions of his enlightened constituents till the ensuing day. After sitting in a dreadful stew for some twenty minutes or so, he felt it necessary to go out and calm his flurried spirits with a glass of brandy and soda-water. As he went out, a little incident happened to him that was attended with very memorable consequences.

"A word with you, sir," whispered a commanding voice in his ear, as he felt himself caught hold of by some one sitting at the corner of the Treasury Bench—"I'll follow you out—quietly, mind."

The Speaker was a Mr. Swindle O'Gibbet, a tall, elderly, and somewhat corpulent person, with a broad-brimmed hat, a slovenly surtout, and vulgar swaggering carriage; a ruddy shining face, that constantly wore a sort of greasy smile; and an unctuous eye, with a combined expression of cunning, cowardice, and ferocity. He spoke in a rich brogue, and with a sort of confidential and cringing familiarity; yet, withal, 'twas with the air and the tone of a man conscious of possessing great direct influence out of doors, and indirect influence within doors. 'Twas, in a word, at once insinuating and peremptory—submissive and truculent. Several things had concurred to give Titmouse a very exalted notion of Mr. O'Gibbet. First, a noble speech of his, in which he showed infinite "pluck" in persevering against shouts of "order" from all parts of the House for an hour together; secondly, his sitting on the front bench, often close beside little Lord Bulfinch, the leader of the House. His lordship was a Whig; and though, as surely I need hardly say, there are thousands of Whigs every whit as pure and high-minded as their Tory rivals, his lordship was a very bitter Whig. The blood of original Whiggism, however, ripening fast into the rottenness of Radicalism, gave out at length an odor which was so offensive to many of his own early friends, that they were forced to withdraw from him. But personally, he was a gentleman, and a very accomplished scholar; the only one of his family that had achieved personal distinction; and enjoying that Parliamentary influence always secured by the possessor of great tact, experience, and personal respectability. Now, it certainly argued some resolution in Mr. O'Gibbet to preserve an air of swaggering assurance and familiarity beside his aristocratic neighbor, whose freezing demeanor towards him—for his lordship evinced even a sort of shudder of disgust when addressed by him—Mr. O'Gibbet felt to be visible to all around. Misery makes strange bed-fellows, but surely politics stranger still; and there could not have been a more striking instance of it than in Lord Bulfinch and Mr. O'Gibbet sitting side by side—as great a contrast in their persons as in their characters. But the third and chief ground of Titmouse's admiration of Mr. O'Gibbet, was a conversation—private the parties thought it, and unheard, in the lobby of the House; but every word of it had our inquisitive, but not very scrupulous, little friend contrived to overhear—between Mr. O'Gibbet and Mr. Flummery, a smiling, supple Lord of the Treasury, and whipper-in of the Ministry. Though generally confident enough, on this occasion he trembled, frowned, and looked infinitely distressed. Mr. O'Gibbet chuckled him under the chin, confidently and good-humoredly, and said—"Oh, murder and Irish! what's easier?—But it lies in a nutshell. If you won't do it, I can't swim; and if I can't, you sink—every mother's son of you. Oh, come, come—give me a bit of a push at this pinch."

"That's what you've said so often."

"Fait, an' what if I have? And look at the shoves I've given you," said Mr. O'Gibbet with sufficient sternness.

"But—a—a—really we shall be found out! The House suspects already that you and we"—

"Bah! bother! hubbaho! Propose you it; I get up and oppose it—vehemently, do you mind—an' the blackguards opposite will carry it for you, out of love for me, ah, ha!—Aisy, aisy—softly say I! Isn't that the way to get along?" and Mr. O'Gibbet winked his eye.

Mr. Flummery, however, looked unhappy, and remained silent and irresolute.

"Oh, my dear sir—exporrigere frontem! Get along wid you, you know it's for your own good," said Mr. O'Gibbet; and, shoving him on good-humoredly, left the lobby, while Mr. Flummery passed on, with a forced smile, to his seat. He remained comparatively silent, and very wretched, the whole night.

Two hours before the House broke up, but not till after Lord Bulfinch had withdrawn, Mr. Flummery, seizing his opportunity, got up to do the bidding, and eventually fulfilled the prophecy of Mr. O'Gibbet, amidst bitter and incessant jeers and laughter from the opposition.

"Another such victory and we're undone," said he, with a furious whisper, soon afterward to Mr. O'Gibbet.

"Och, go to the old devil wid ye," replied Mr. O'Gibbet, thrusting his tongue into his cheek, and moving off.

Now Titmouse had contrived to overhear almost every word of the above, and had naturally formed a prodigious estimate of Mr. O'Gibbet and his influence in the highest quarters. But to proceed. Within a few minutes' time might have been seen Titmouse and O'Gibbet earnestly conversing together, remote from observation, in one of the passages leading from the lobby. Mr. O'Gibbet spoke all the while in a tone which at once solicited and commanded attention. "Sir, of course you know you've not a ghost of a chance of keeping your seat? I've heard all about it. You'll be beat, dead beat; will never be able to sit in this parliament, sir, for your own borough, and be liable to no end of penalties for bribery, besides. Oh, my dear sir, how I wish I had been at your elbow! This would never have happened!"

"Oh, sir! 'pon my soul—I—I"—stammered Titmouse, quite thunderstruck at Mr. O'Gibbet's words.

"Hush—st—hush, wid your chattering tongue, sir, or we'll be overheard, and you'll be ruined," interrupted Mr. O'Gibbet, looking suspiciously around.

"I—I—beg your pardon, sir, but I'll give up my seat. I'm most uncommon sorry that ever—curse me if I care about being a member!"

"Oh! and is that the way you spake of being a member o' parliament? For shame, for shame, not to feel the glory of your position, sir! There's millions o' gentlemen envying you, just now! Sir, I see that you're likely to cut a figure in the House!"

"But, begging pardon, sir, if it costs such a precious long figure—why I've come down some four or five thousand pounds already," quoth Titmouse, twisting his hands into his hair.

"An' what if ye have? What's that to a gentleman o' your consequence in the country? It's, moreover, only once and for all; only stick in now—and you stay in for seven years, and come in for nothing next time; and now—d'ye hear me, sir? for time presses—retire, and give the seat to a Tory, if you will—(what's the name o' the blackguard? Oh! it's young Delamere)—and have your own borough stink under your nose all your days! But can you keep a secret like a gentleman? Judging from your appearance, I should say yes—sir; is it so?" Titmouse placed his hand over his beating heart, and with a great oath solemnly declared that he would be "mum as death;" on which Mr. O'Gibbet lowered his tone to a faint whisper—"You'll distinctly understand I've nothing to do with it personally, but it's impossible, sir—d'ye hear?—to fight the devil except with his own weapons—and there are too many o' the enemies o' the people in the house—a little money, sir; eh? Aisy, aisy—softly say I! Is n't that the way to get along?" added Mr. O'Gibbet, with a rich leer, and poking Titmouse in the ribs.

"'Pon my life that'll do—and—and what's the figure, sir?"

"Sir, as you're a young member, and of liberal principles," continued Mr. O'Gibbet, dropping his tone still lower, "three thousand pounds."—Titmouse started as if he had been shot. "Mind, that clears you, sir, d'ye understand? Every thing! Out and out, no reservation at all—divil a bit!"

"'Pon my life I shall be ruined between you all!" gasped Titmouse, faintly.

"Sir, you're not the man I took you for," replied O'Gibbet impatiently and contemptuously, "Do n't you see a barley-corn before your nose? You'll be beat after spending three times the money I name, and be liable to ten thousand pounds penalties besides for bribery!"

"Oh, 'pon my life, sir, as for that," said Titmouse, briskly, but feeling sick at heart, "I've no more to do with it than—my tiger!"

"Bah! you're a baby, I see!" quoth O'Gibbet, testily. "What's the name o' your man o' business?—there's not a minute to lose—it's your greatest friend I mean to be, I assure ye—tut, what's his name?"

"Mr. Gammon," replied Titmouse, anxiously.

"Let him, sir, be with me at my house in Ruffian row by nine to-morrow morning to a minute—and alone," said Mr. O'Gibbet, with his lip close to Titmouse's ear—"and once more, d'ye hear, sir—a breath about this to any one, an' you're a ruined man—you're in my power most completely!" With this Mr. O'Gibbet and Mr. Titmouse parted—the former having much similar business on hand, and the latter determined to hurry off to Gammon forthwith; and in fact he was within the next five minutes in his cab, on his way to Thavie's Inn.

Mr. Gammon was at Mr. O'Gibbet's (of whom he spoke to Titmouse in the most earnest and unqualified terms of admiration) at the appointed hour; and after an hour's private conference with him, they both went off to Mr. Flummery's official residence, in Priory place; but what passed there I never have been able to ascertain with sufficient accuracy to warrant me in laying it before the reader.

When the day for taking into consideration the YATTON PETITION had arrived—on a voice calling out at the door of the House, "Counsel in the Yatton petition!" in walked forthwith eight learned gentlemen, four being of counsel for the petitioner, and four for the sitting member—attended by their respective agents, who stood behind, whilst the counsel took their seats at the bar of a very crowded and excited house; for there were several committees to be balloted for on that day. The door of the house was then locked; and the order of the day was read. Titmouse might have been seen popping up and down about the back ministerial benches, like a parched pea. On the front treasury bench sat Mr. O'Gibbet, his hat slouched over his fat face, his arms folded. On the table stood several glasses, containing little rolls of paper, each about two or three inches long, and with the name of every member of the house severally inscribed on them. These glasses being placed before the Speaker, the clerk rose, and taking them out presented them to the Speaker, who, opening each, read out aloud the name inscribed, to the House. Now, the object was, on such occasions, to draw out the names of thirty-three members then present in the House; which were afterward to be reduced, by each party alternately striking off eleven names, to ELEVEN—who were the committee charged with the trial of the petition. Now the astute reader will see that, imagining the House to be divided into two great classes, viz., those favorable and those opposed to the petitioner—according to whose success or failure a vote was retained, lost or gained to the party; and as the number of thirty-three cannot be more nearly divided than into seventeen and sixteen, 'tis said by those experienced in such matters, that in cases where it ran so close—that party invariably and necessarily won who drew the seventeenth name; seeing that each party having eleven names of those in his opponent's interest, to expunge out of the thirty-three, he who luckily drew this prize of the SEVENTEENTH MAN, was sure to have six good men and true on the committee against the other's FIVE. And thus, of course it was, in the case of a greater or less proportion of favorable or adverse persons answering to their names. So keenly was all this felt and appreciated by the whole House, on these interesting—these solemn, these deliberative, and JUDICIAL occasions—that on every name being called, there were sounds heard and symptoms witnessed indicative of eager delight or intense vexation. Now, on the present occasion, it would at first have appeared as if some unfair advantage had been secured by the Opposition; since five of their names were called, to two of those of their opponents; but then only one of the five answered, (it so happening that the other four were absent, disqualified as being petitioned against, or exempt,) while both of the two answered! You should have seen the chagrined faces, and heard the loud exclamations of "Ts!—ts!—ts!" on either side of the House, when their own men's names were thus abortively called over! the delight visible on the other side! The issue long hung in suspense; and at length the scales were evenly poised, and the House was in a state of exquisite anxiety; for the next eligible name answered to would decide which side was to gain or lose a seat.

"Sir Ezekiel Tuddington"—cried the Speaker, amidst profound and agitated silence. He was one of the Opposition—but answered not; he was absent. "Ts! ts! ts!" cried the Opposition.

"Gabriel Grubb."—This was a ministerial man, who rose, and said he was serving on another committee. "Ts! ts! ts!" cried the ministerial side.

"Bennet Barleycorn."—(Opposition)—petitioned against. "Ts! ts! ts!" vehemently cried the Opposition.

"PHELIM O'DOOLLY!"

"Here!" exclaimed that honorable member, spreading triumph over the ministerial, and dismay over the opposition side of the House; and the thirty-three names having been thus called and answered to, a loud buzz arose on all sides—of congratulation or despondency.

The fate of the petition, it was said, was already as good as decided.—The parties having retired to strike the committee, returned in about an hour's time, and the following members were then sworn in, and ordered to meet the next morning at eleven o'clock:—

Ministerials.

- (1.) Sir Simper Silly.
- (2.) Noah No-land.
- (3.) Phelim O'Doodle.
- (4.) Micah M'Squash.
- (5.) Sir Caleb Calf.
- (6.) Och Hubbaboo.

Opposition.

- (1.) Castleton Plume.
- (2.) Charles D'Eresby.
- (3.) Merton Mortimer.
- (4.) Sir Simon Alkmond.
- (5.) Lord Frederick Brackenbury.

And the six, of course, on their meeting, chose the chairman, who was a sure card—to wit, SIR CALEB CALF, BART.

Mr. Delamere's counsel and agents, together with Mr. Delamere himself, met at consultation that evening, all with the depressed air of men who are going on in any undertaking contra spem. "Well, what think you of our committee?" inquired Mr. Berrington, the eloquent, acute, and experienced leading counsel. All present shrugged their shoulders; but at length agreed that even with such a committee, their ease was an overpowering one; no committee could dare to shut their eyes to such an array of facts as were here collected; the clearest case of agency made out—Mr. Berrington declared—that he had ever known in all his practice; and eleven distinct cases of BRIBERY, supported each by at least three unexceptionable witnesses; together with half-a-dozen cases of TREATING; in fact, their case, it was admitted, had been most admirably got up, under the management of Mr. Crafty, (who was present,) and they must succeed.

"Of course, they'll call for proof of AGENCY, first quoth Mr. Berrington, carelessly glancing over his enormous brief; "and we'll at once fix this—what's his name—the Unitarian parson, Mr. Muffin."

"Mudflint—Smirk Mudflint!"

"Ah, ha!—We'll begin with him, and Bloodsuck, and Centipede. Fix them—the rest all follow, and they'll strike, in spite of their committee—or—egad—we'll have a shot at the sitting member himself."

By eleven o'clock the next morning the committee and the parties were in attendance—the room quite crowded—such a quantity of Yatton faces!—There, near the chairman, with his hat perched as usual on his bushy hair, and dressed in his ordinary extravagant and absurd style—his glass screwed into his eye, and his hands stuck into his hinder coat-pockets, and resting on his hips, stood the sitting member, Mr. Titmouse; and after the usual preliminaries had been gone through, up rose Mr. Berrington, with the calm and confident air of a man going to open a winning case; and an overwhelming case he did open—the chairman glancing gloomily at the five ministerials on his right, and then inquisitively at the five opposition members on his left. The statement of counsel was luminous and powerful. As he went on, he disclosed almost as minute and accurate a knowledge of the movements of the Yellows of Yatton, as Mr. Gammon himself could have supplied him with. That gentleman shared in the dismay felt around him. 'Twas clear that there had been infernal treachery; that they were all ruined. "By Jove! there's no standing up against this, unless we break them down at the agency—for Berrington do n't overstate his cases," whispered Mr. Granville, the leading counsel for the sitting member, to one of his juniors, and to Gammon, who sighed, and said nothing. With all his experience in the general business of the profession, he knew as yet little or nothing of what might be expected from a favorable election committee. Stronger and stronger, blacker and blacker, closer and closer, came out the petitioner's case. The five opposition members paid profound attention to Mr. Berrington, and took notes; as for the ministerials, one was engaged with his betting-book, another writing out franks, (in which he dealt,) a third conning over an attorney's letter, and two were quietly playing together at 'Tut-tat-to.' As was expected, the committee called peremptorily for proof of AGENCY; and I will say, only that if Smirk Mudflint, Barnabas Bloodsuck, and Seth Centipede were not fixed as the 'AGENTS' of the sitting member—there is no such relation as that of principal and agents in rerum natura; there never was in this world an agent that had a principal, or a principal that had an agent.—Take only, for instance, the case of Mudflint. He was proved to have been from first to last an active member of Mr. Titmouse's committee; attending daily, hourly, and on hundreds of occasions in the presence of Mr. Titmouse—conversing with him—consulting him—making appointments with him for calling on voters, which appointments he invariably kept; letters in his handwriting, relating to the election, signed some by Mr. Titmouse, some by Mr. Gammon; circulars similarly signed, and distributed by Mudflint, and the addresses in his handwriting; several election bills paid by him on account of Mr. Titmouse; directions given by him and observed, as to the bringing up voters to the poll; publicans' bills paid at the committee-room, in the presence of Mr. Titmouse—and, in short, many other such acts as these were established against all three of the above persons. Such a dreadful effect did all this have upon Mr. Bloodsuck and Mr. Centipede, that they were obliged to go out, in order to get a little gin and water; for they were indeed in a sort of death-sweat. As for Mudflint, he seemed to get sallower and sallower every minute; and felt almost disposed to utter an inward prayer, had he thought it would have been of the slightest use. Mr. Berrington's witnesses were fiercely cross-examined, but no material impression was produced upon them; and when Mr. Granville, on behalf of the sitting member, confident and voluble, rose to prove to the committee, that his learned friend's case was one of the most trumpety that had ever come before a committee—a mere bottle of smoke;—that three gentlemen in question had been no more the agents of the sitting member than was he—the counsel then on his legs—the agent of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and that every one of the petitioner's witnesses was unworthy of belief—in fact perjured—how suddenly awake to the importance of the investigation, became the ministerial members! They never took their eyes off Mr. Granville, except to take notes of his pointed, cogent, unanswerable observations! He called no witnesses. At length he sat down; and strangers were ordered to withdraw—and 'twas well they did: for such an amazing uproar ensued among the committee, as soon as the five opposition members discovered to their amazement and disgust, that there was the least doubt amongst their opponents as to the establishment of agency, as would not, possibly, have tended to raise that committee, as a judicial body, in public estimation. After an hour and a half's absence, strangers were re-admitted. Great was the rush—for the fate of the petition hung on the decision to be immediately pronounced. As soon as the counsel had taken their seats, and the eager, excited crowd been subdued into something like silence, the chairman, Sir Caleb Calf, with a flushed face, and a very uneasy expression, read from a sheet of foolscap paper, which he held in his hand, as follows:—

"Resolved—That the Petitioner's Counsel be directed to proceed with evidence of AGENCY," [i. e. the committee were of opinion that no sufficient evidence had yet been given, to establish Messrs. Mudflint, Bloodsuck, and Centipede, as the agents of Mr. Titmouse, in the election for Yatton!!!] The five Opposition members sat with stern indignant faces, all with their backs turned towards the chairman; and nothing but a very high tone of feeling, and chivalrous sense of their position, as members of a public committee of the House of Commons, prevented their repeating in public their fierce protest against the monstrous decision at which the committee, through the casting voice of the redoubtable chairman, had arrived.

Their decision was not immediately understood or appreciated by the majority of those present. After a pause of some moments, and amidst profound silence—

"Have I rightly understood the resolution of the committee, sir," inquired Mr. Berrington, with an amazed air, "that the evidence already adduced is not sufficient to satisfy the committee, as to the agency of Messrs. Mudflint, Bloodsuck, and Centipede?"

"The committee meant, sir, to express as much," replied the chairman, dryly, and he sealed a letter with affected indifference: affected, indeed! the letter being one addressed to a friend, to desire him forthwith to take a hostile message on his—the chairman's behalf—to Colonel D'Eresby, one of the committee, who had, during the discussion with closed doors, spoken his mind pretty freely concerning the conduct of the aforesaid chairman.

"Good God!" exclaimed Mr. Berrington, (on receiving the chairman's answer,) in a tone of voice loud enough to be heard all over the room, "neither would they believe though one rose from the dead."

"We 'd better strike," said his juniors.

"I think so, too," said Mr. Berrington; adding, as he turned toward the committee with an air of undisguised disgust, "I protest, sir, that never in the whole course of my experience before election committees, have I been so astounded as I am at the decision to which the committee has just come. Probably, under these circumstances, the committee will be pleased to adjourn till the morning, to give us an opportunity of considering the course we will pursue." (This produced a great sensation.)

"Certainly—let it be so," replied the chairman, blandly, yet anxiously: and the committee broke up. Before they met again, three shots a-piece had been exchanged between the chairman and Colonel D'Eresby—"happily without effect," and the parties left the ground in as hostile a spirit as they had reached it. I will say for the Colonel, that he was a plain, straight-forward soldier, who did not understand nonsense, nor could tolerate coquetting with an oath.

"Of course the petition is dropped?" said Mr. Berrington, bitterly, as soon as all were assembled in the evening, in consultation at his chambers.

"Of course," was the answer, in a sufficiently melancholy tone.

"So help me Heaven!" said Mr. Berrington. I feel disposed to say I will never appear again before a committee. This sort of thing cannot go on much longer! To think that every man of that committee is sworn before God to do his duty! I'll take care to strike every one of those six men off from any future list that I may have to do with!"

"I can say only," remarked the second counsel, a calm and experienced lawyer, "that, in my opinion, had all of us sate down to frame, beforehand, a perfect case of agency—with facts at will—we would never have framed one stronger than the one to-day declared insufficient."

"I have been in seven other petitions," said Mr. Berrington, "this very week; but there the sitting members, were Tories: Gracious Heaven! what facts have been there held sufficient proof of agency!—The Barnard Castle committee yesterday, held that, to have been seen once shaking hands in a pastry-cook's shop with the sitting member, was sufficient evidence of agency—and we've lost the seat! In the Cucumber Committee, a man who by chance stood once under a door-way with the sitting member, in a sudden shower of rain—was held thereby to have become his agent; and we there also lost the seat!—Faugh! what would foreigners say if they heard such things?"

"It's, perhaps, hardly worth mentioning," said Mr. Parkinson; "but this afternoon I happened to see Mr. O'Gibbet dining with Mr. O'Doodle, Mr. Hubbaboo, and Mr. M'Squash, off pork and greens, at the Jolly Thieves' Tavern, in Dodge street—I—I—they were talking together very eagerly."

"The less we say about that the better," replied Mr. Berrington; "I have not had my eyes shut, I can tell you! It's a hard case, Mr. Crafty; but after all your pains, and the dreadful expense incurred, it's nevertheless quite farcical to think of going on with a committee like this."

"Of course the petition is abandoned," replied Crafty. The next morning they again appeared before the committee.

"I have to inform the committee," commenced Mr. Berrington, with sufficient sternness, "that my learned friends and I, who had, in our ignorance and inexperience, imagined, till yesterday, that the evidence we then opened was ten times more than sufficient to establish agency before any legal tribunal."

"Counsel will be pleased to moderate their excitement, and to treat the committee with due respect," interrupted the chairman, warmly, and reddening as he spoke; while the ministerial members looked very fiercely at Mr. Berrington, and one or two placed their arms a-kimbo.

"Have come to the determination to withdraw the petitioner's case from before the committee; as, under existing circumstances, it would be utterly absurd to attempt."

"Fait, sir, an' you're mighty indacent—ye are—an' you'd better keep a civil tongue in your head," said Mr. O'Doodle, fiercely, and with an insolent look at Mr. Berrington.

"Sir," said the latter, addressing Mr. O'Doodle, with a bitter smile—"as it is possible to stand where I do without ceasing to be a gentleman, so it is possible—to sit there—without becoming one."

"Sir—Misther Chairman—I'll only just ask you, sir—is n't that a brache of privilege?"

"Oh, be aisy—aisy wid ye—and is n't he hired to say all this?" whispered Mr. Hubbaboo; and the indignant scutator sat down.

"The petition is withdrawn, sir," said Mr. Barrington, calmly.

"Then," subjoined his opponent, as quietly rising as his learned friend had sate down, "I respectfully apply to the committee to vote it Frivolous and Vexatious."

"Possibly the committee will pause before going that length," said Mr. Berrington, very gravely; but he was mistaken. Strangers were ordered to withdraw; and, on their re-admission, the Chairman read the resolution of the committee, that "Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq., had been and was duly elected to serve for the borough of Yatton; and that the petition against his return was Frivolous and Vexatious;" by which decision, all the costs and expenses incurred by Mr. Titmouse were thrown upon his opponent, Mr. Delanere—a just penalty for his wanton and presumptuous attempt. This decision was welcomed by the crowd in the committee-room with clapping of hands, stamping of feet, and cheering. Such was the fate of the YATTON PETITION. Mr. Titmouse, on entering the House that evening, was received with loud cheers from the ministerial benches: and within a few minutes afterward, Lord Frederick Brackenbury, to give the House and the public an idea of the important service performed by the committee, rose and moved that the evidence should be printed—which was ordered.

The next day a very distinguished patriot gathered some of the blooming fruit of the Bill for giving Everybody Everything—not for himself personally, however, but as a trustee for the public; so, at least, I should infer from the following fact, that whereas, in the morning, his balance at his banker's was exactly L.3, 10s. 7½d.—by the afternoon it was suddenly augmented to L.3003, 10s. 7½d.—shortly expressed thus:—

$$L\ 3 : 10 : 7\frac{1}{2}d. \rightarrow L\ 3000 = L.3003 : 10 : 7\frac{1}{2}d.$$

Thus might my friend Titmouse exclaim, "Out of this nettle danger I've plucked the flower safely!" 'T was, indeed, fortunate for the country, that such, and so early, had been the termination of the contest for representation of Yatton; for it enabled Mr. Titmouse at once to enter, with all the energy belonging to his character, upon the discharge of his legislative functions. The very next day after his own seat had been secured to him by the decision of the committee, he was ballotted for, and chosen one of the members of a committee, of which Swindle O' Gibbet, Esquire, was chairman, for trying the validity of the return of two Tory impostors for an Irish county. So marvelously quick an insight into the merits of the case did he and his brethren in the committee obtain, that they intimated, on the conclusion of the petitioners counsel's opening address, that it would be quite superfluous for him to call witnesses in support of a statement of facts, which it was presumed the sitting members could not think of seriously contesting. Against this, the sitting member's counsel remonstrated with indignant energy, on which the committee thought it best to let him take his own course, which would entail its own consequences: viz., that the opposition to the petition would be voted frivolous and vexatious. A vast deal of evidence was then adduced, after which, as might be expected, the committee reported to the House that Lord Beverly de Wynston (who owned half the county for which he had presumed to stand) and Sir Harry Edgington (who owned pretty nearly the other half) had been unduly returned; that two most respectable gentlemen, Mr. O'Shirtless and Mr. O'Toddy, (the one a discarded attorney's clerk, and the other an insolvent publican, neither of whom had ever been in the county till the time of the election,) ought to have been returned; and the clerk of the House was to amend the return accordingly; and that the opposition to the petition had been frivolous and vexatious.

Mr. Titmouse after this formed an intimate acquaintance with the two gentlemen whom, infinitely to their own astonishment, he had helped to seat for the county, and who had many qualities kindred to his own, principally in the matter of dress and drink. Very shortly afterward, he was selected one of a committee to inquire into the state of the operation of the Usury Laws, and another, of a still more important character—viz., to inquire into the state of our relations with foreign powers, with reference to free trade and the permanent preservation of peace. They continued sitting for a month, and thus stated the luminous result of their inquiry and deliberation, in their report to the House: "That the only effectual mode of securing permanently the good will of foreign powers, was by removing all restrictions upon their imports into this country, and imposing prohibitory duties upon our exports into theirs; at the same time reducing our naval and military establishments to a point which should never thereafter occasion uneasiness to any foreign power." He also served on one or two private committees, attended by counsel. In the course of their inquiries many very difficult and complicated questions arose, which called forth great ability on the part of counsel. On one occasion, in particular, I recollect that Mr. Depth, one of the most dexterous and subtle reasoners to be found at the English bar, having started the great question really at issue between the parties, addressed a long and most masterly argument to the committee. He found himself, after some time, making rapid way with them; and, in particular, there were indications that he had at length powerfully arrested the attention of Mr. Titmouse, who, his chin resting on his open hand, and his elbow on the table, leaned forward toward Mr. Depth, on whom he fixed his eye apparently with deep attention. How mistaken, however, was Depth! Titmouse was thinking all the while of two very different matters; viz., whether he could possibly sit it out without a bottle of soda-water, laboring, as he was, under the sickening effects of excessive potatoes over night; and also, whether his favorite little terrier, Titty, would win or lose in her encounter on the morrow with fifty rats—that being the number which Mr. Titmouse had bet three to one she would kill in three minutes' times. The decision to which that committee might come, would affect interests to the amount of nearly a million sterling, and might or might not occasion a monstrous invasion of vested rights!

He still continued to occupy his very handsome apartments at the Albany. You might generally have seen him, about ten o'clock in the morning, (or say twelve, when his attendance was not required upon committees,) reclining on his sofa, enveloped in a yellow-figured satin dressing-gown, smoking an enormous nookah; with a little table before him, with a decanter of gin, cold water, and a tumbler or two upon it. On a large round table near him lay a great number of dinner and evening cards, notes, letters, public and private, vote-papers, and Parliamentary reports. Beside him, on the sofa, lay the last number of the Sunday Flash—to which, and to the Neogate Calendar, his reading was, in fact, almost entirely confined. Over his mantelpiece was a large, hideous oil-painting of two brawny and half-naked ruffians, in boxing attitude; opposite was a very large picture (for which he had given seventy guineas) of Lord Scaramouch's dog Nestor, in his famous encounter with two hundred rats, which he killed in the astonishingly short space of seven minutes and fifteen seconds. Opposite to the door, however, was the great point of attraction—viz., a full length portrait of Titmouse himself. His neck was bare, his ample shirt-collars being thrown down over his shoulders, and his face looking upward. The artist had labored hard to give it that fine indignant expression with which, in pictures of men of genius, they are generally represented as looking upward toward the moon; but nature was too strong for him—his eye too accurate, and his brush too obedient to his eye; so that the only expression he could bring out was one of innocent and stupid wonder. A rich green mantle enveloped his figure; and amidst its picturesque folds, was visible his left hand, holding them together, and with a glittering ring on the first and last fingers. In one corner of the room, on a table, were a pair of foils; and on the ground near them, three or four pairs of boxing gloves. On another table lay a guitar—on another, a violin; on both of which delightful instruments he was taking almost daily lessons. Though the room was both elegantly and expensively furnished, (according to the taste of its former occupant,) it was now redolent—as were Mr. Titmouse's clothes—of the odors of tobacco-smoke and gin and water. Here it was that Mr. Titmouse would often spend hour after hour, boxing with Billy Bully, the celebrated prize-fighter and pickpocket; or, when somewhat far gone in liquor, playing cribbage, or put, with his valet—an artful, impudent fellow, who had gained great influence over him.

As for the House—Modesty (the twin-sister of Merit) kept Mr. Titmouse for a long time very quiet there. He saw the necessity of attentively watching every thing that passed around him, in order to become practically familiar with the routine of business, before he ventured to step forward into action, and distinguish himself. He had not been long, however, thus prudently occupied, when an occasion presented itself, of which he availed himself with all the bold felicitous promptitude of genius—whose prime distinguishing characteristic is the successful seizure of opportunity. He suddenly saw that he should be able to bring into play an early accomplishment of his—an accomplishment of which, when acquiring it, how little he dreamed of the signal uses to which it might be afterward turned! The great Lord Coke hath somewhere said to the legal student, that there is no kind or degree of knowledge whatsoever, so apparently vain and useless that it shall not, if remembered, at one time or other serve his purpose. Thus it seemed about to be with Mr. Titmouse, to whom it chanced in this wise. In early life, while following the humble calling in which he was occupied when first presented to the reader, he used to amuse himself, in his long journeys about the streets, with bundle and yard-measure under his arm, by imitating the cries of oaks, the crowing of cocks, the squeaking of pigs, the braying of donkeys, and the yelping of cars; in which matters he became at length so great a proficient, as to attract the admiring attention of passers-by, and to afford great amusement to the circles in which he visited. There is probably no man living, though ever so great a fool, that cannot do something or other well; and Titmouse became a surprising proficient in the arts I have alluded to. He could imitate a blue-bottle fly buzzing about the window, and, lighting upon it, abruptly ceasing its little noise, and, anon flying off again, as suddenly resume it;—a chicken, picking its way cautiously among the growing cabbages;—a cat, at midnight on the moonlit tiles, pouring forth the sorrows of her heart on account of the absence of her inconstant mate;—a cock, suddenly waking out of some horrid dream—it may be the nightmare—and, in the ecstasy of its fright, crowing as though it would split at once its throat and heart, alarming all mankind;—a little cur, yelping with mingled fear and fury, at the same time, as it were, advancing backwards, in view of a fiendish tom-cat, with high-curved back, flaming eyes, and spitting fury. I only wish you had heard Mr. Titmouse on these occasions; it might, perhaps, even have reminded you of the observation of Doctor Johnson, that genius is great natural powers accidentally directed.

Now there was, on a certain night, about three months after Titmouse had been in the House, a kind of pitched battle between the Ministry and their formidable opponents; in which the speakers on each side did their best to prove that their opponents were apostates; utterly worthless; despicable alike of public and private virtue; unfit to govern; and unworthy of the confidence of the country. My Lord Bulfinch rose, late on the third evening of the debate—never had been so full a House during the session—and in a long and able speech contended, (first,) that the opposite side were selfish, ignorant, and dishonest; and, (secondly,) that Ministers had only imitated their example. He was vehemently cheered from time to time, and sat down amidst a tempest of applause.

Up then rose the ex-minister and leader of the Opposition, and in a very few moments there was scarce a sound to be heard, except that of the delicious voice—at once clear, harmonious, distinct in utterance, and varied in intonation—of incomparably the finest Parliamentary orator of the day, Mr. Vivid. The hearts of those around him, who centred all their hopes in him, beat with anxious pride. He had a noble countenance—a brilliant eye—strongly marked and most expressive features—a commanding figure—a graceful and winning address. His language, refined, copious, and vigorous, every word he uttered told. His illustrations were as rich and apt as his reasonings were close and cogent; and his powers of ridicule were unrivalled. On the present occasion he was thoroughly roused, and put forth all his powers: he and Lord Bulfinch had been waiting for each other during the whole debate; and now Mr. Vivid had the reply, and truly regarded himself as the mouthpiece of a great and grievously slandered party in the state, whom he had risen to vindicate from the elaborate and venomous aspersions of Lord Bulfinch, who sat, speedily pierced through and through with the arrows of poignant sarcasm, amidst the loud laughter of even his own side, so irresistible was the humor of the speaker. Even Mr. O'Gibbet, who had been from time to time exclaiming, half aloud, to those around—"Och, the pitiful fellow! The stupid baste!—Nivir mind him—divil a word, my lord!"—was at length subdued into silence. In fact, the whole House was with the brilliant and impassioned speaker. Every now and then vehement and tumultuous cheering would burst forth from the Opposition as from one man, answered by as vehement and determined cheering from the ministerial benches; but you could not fail to observe an anxious and alarmed expression stealing over the faces of Lord Bulfinch's supporters. His lordship sat immovably, with his arms folded, and eyes fixed on his opponent, and a bitter smile on his face, glancing frequently, however, with increasing anxiety, towards Mr. O'SQUEAL, the only "great gun" he had left—that gentleman having undertaken (infelix puer, atque impar congressus Achilli!) to reply to Mr. Vivid. Poor Mr. O'SQUEAL himself looked pale and dispirited, and would probably have given up all his little prospects to be able to sneak away from the post he had so eagerly occupied, and devolve upon others the responsibility of replying to a speech looming more and more dreadfully upon his trembling faculties every moment, as infinitely more formidable in all points of view than any thing he had anticipated. The speech must electrify the public, even as it was then electrifying the House. He held a sheet of paper in one hand, resting on his knee, and a pen in the other, with which he incessantly took notes—only to disguise his fright; for his mind went not with his pen—all he heard was above and beyond him;—he might as well think of whistling down a whirlwind; yet there was no escape for him. Was the uneasy eye of Lord Bulfinch, more and more frequently directed toward him, calculated to calm or encourage him? or the sight of the adroit, sarcastic, and brilliant debater sitting opposite, who had his eye on Mr. O'SQUEAL, and was evidently to rise and reply to him? Mr. O'SQUEAL began to feel cold as death, and at length burst into a cold perspiration. After two hours' speech, of uncommon power and brilliancy, Mr. Vivid wound up with a rapid and striking recapitulation of the leading points of his policy when in power, which, he contended, were in triumphant contrast with those of his successors, which were wavering, inconsistent, perilous to every national interest, and in despicable subservience to the vilest and lowest impulses. "And now, sir," said Mr. Vivid, turning to the Speaker, and then directing a bold and indignant glance of defiance at Lord Bulfinch—"does the noble lord opposite talk of impeachment? I ask him in the face of this House, and of the whole country, whose eyes are fixed upon it with anxiety and agitation—will he presume to repeat his threat? or will any one on his behalf?"—(turning a glance of withering scorn toward Mr. O'SQUEAL)—"Sir, I pause for a reply!"—And he did—several seconds elapsing in dead silence, which was presently, however, broken in a manner that was perfectly unprecedented, and most astounding. "T was a reply to his question; but such as, had he anticipated it, he would never have put the question, or paused for its answer.

"Cock-a-doodle-do-o-o!" issued, with inimitable fidelity of tone and manner, from immediately behind Lord Bulfinch, who started from his seat as if he had been shot. Every one started; Mr. Vivid recoiled a pace or two from the table—and then a universal peal of laughter echoed from all quarters of the House, not excepting even the strangers' gallery. The Speaker was convulsed, and could not rise to call "order." Lord Bulfinch laughed himself almost into fits; even these immediately behind Mr. Vivid were giving way to uncontrollable laughter, at so comical and monstrous an issue. He himself tried for a moment to join in the laugh, but in vain; he was terribly disconcerted and confounded. This frightful and disgusting incident had done away with the effect of his whole speech; and in twenty-four hours' time, the occurrence would be exciting laughter and derision in every corner of the kingdom.

"Order! order! order!" cried the Speaker, his face red and swollen with scarce subdued laughter. Several times Mr. Vivid attempted to resume, only, however, occasioning renewed laughter. Still he persevered; and, with much presence of mind, made a pointed and witty allusion to Rome saved by the cackling of a goose. "T was, however, plainly useless; and after a moment or two's pause of irresolution, he yielded to his fate, with visible vexation abruptly concluded his observations, gathered hastily together his papers, and resumed his seat and his hat—a signal for renewed laughter and triumphant cheering from the ministerial side of the House. Up then started Mr. O'SQUEAL—and, despite his absurd and extravagant gesticulation, and perfectly frightful tone of voice, dashed boldly off at one or two of the weakest points which had been made by his discomfited adversary, which he dealt with very dexterously; and then threw up a vast number of rhetorical fireworks, amidst the glitter and blaze of which he sat down, and was enthusiastically cheered. "T was my friend Mr. Titmouse that had worked this wonder, and entirely changed the fate of the day. Up rose Mr. O'SQUEAL's dreaded opponent—but in vain; he was quite crestfallen; evidently in momentary apprehension of receiving an interruption similar to that which Mr. Vivid had experienced. He was nervous and fidgety—as well he might be; and would most assuredly have shared the fate of Mr. Vivid, but that Titmouse was (not without great difficulty) restrained by Lord Bulfinch, on the ground that the desired effect had been produced, and would be only impaired by a repetition. The debate came somewhat abruptly to a close, and the Opposition were beaten by a majority of a hundred and thirty, which looked something like a working majority.

This happy occurrence at once brought Mr. Titmouse into notice, and very great favor with his party;—well, indeed, it might, for he had become a most powerful auxiliary, and need it be added how dreaded and detested he was by their opponents? How could it be otherwise, with even their leading speakers, who could scarce ever afterward venture on any thing a little out of the common way—a little higher flight than usual—being in momentary apprehension of some such disgusting and ludicrous interruption as the one I have mentioned, indicating the effect which the speaker was producing upon—a cat, a donkey, a cock, or a puppy? Ah, me! what a sheep's eye each of them cast, as he went on, toward Titmouse? And if ever he was observed to be absent, there was a sensible improvement in the tone and spirit of the Opposition speakers. The ministerial journals all over the country worked the joke well; and in their leading articles against any of Mr. Vivid's speeches, would "sum up all in one memorable word—"cock-a-doodle-doo!"

As is generally the case, the signal success of Mr. Titmouse brought into the field a host of imitators in the House; and their performances, inferior though they were, becoming more and more frequent, gave quite a new character to the proceedings of that dignified deliberative assembly. At length, however, it was found necessary to pass a resolution of the House against such practices; and it was entered on the journals, that thenceforth no honorable member should interrupt business by whistling, singing, or imitating the sounds of animals, or making any other disgusting noise whatsoever.

The political importance thus acquired by Mr. Titmouse—and which he enjoyed till the passing of the above resolution, by which it was cut up root and branch—had naturally a very elevating effect upon him; as you might have perceived, had you only once seen him swaggering along the House to his seat behind the front Treasury bench, dressed in his usual style of fashion, and with his quizzing-glass stuck into his eye. Mr. O'Gibbet invariably greeted him with the utmost cordiality, and would often, at a piaching part of an Opposition speech, turn round and invoke his powers, by the exclamation—"Now, now, Titty!" He dined, in due course, with the speaker—as usual, in full court-dress; and, having got a little champagne in his head, insisted on going through his leading "imitations," infinitely to the amusement of some half dozen of the guests, and all the servants. His circle of acquaintance was extending every day; he became a very welcome guest, as an object of real curiosity. He was not a man, however, to be always enjoying the hospitality of others, without at least offering a return; and, at the suggestion of an experienced friend in the House, he commenced a series of "parliamentary dinners," (presumptuous little puppy!) at the Gliddington Hotel. They went off with much eclat, and were duly chronicled in the daily journals, as thus:—

"On Saturday, Mr. Titmouse, M. P., entertained (his third dinner given this session) at the Gliddington Hotel, the following (amongst others) distinguished members of the House of Commons: Sir Simpson Silly, Mr. Flummery, Mr. O'Gibbet, Mr. Outlaw, Lord Beetle, Mr. O'Shirtless, Sir Too Raladdy, Mr. Tripe, Mr. Scum, and a dozen others."

Mr. Titmouse, at length, thought himself warranted in inviting Lord Bulfinch!—and the SPEAKER!—and LORD FIREBRAND, (the Foreign Secretary;) all of whom, however, very politely declined, pleading previous engagements. I can hardly, however, give Mr. Titmouse the credit of these after proceedings; which were, in fact, suggested to him, in the first instance, by two or three young wags in the House; who, barring a little difference in the way of bringing up, were every whit as great fools and coxcombs as himself, and equally entitled to the confidence of their favored constituencies and of the country, as so calculated for the purpose of practical legislation, and that remodeling of the constitutions of the country upon which the new House of Commons seemed bent. "T was truly delightful to see the tables of these young gentlemen groaning under daily accumulations of Parliamentary documents, containing all sorts of political and statistical information, collected and published with vast labor and expense, for the purpose of informing their powerful intellects upon the business of the country, so that they might come duly prepared to the important discussions in the House, on all questions of domestic and foreign policy. As for Mr. Titmouse, he never relished the idea of perusing and studying these troublesome and repulsive documents—page after page, filled with long rows of figures, tables of prices, of exchanges, &c., reports of the evidence, verbatim et literatim, taken in question and answer before every committee that sat; all sorts of expensive and troublesome "returns," moved for by any one that chose; he rather contented himself with attending to what went on in the House; and at the close of the session, all the documents in question became the perquisite of Mr. Titmouse's valet, who got a good round sum for them (uncut) as waste paper.

It is not difficult to understand the pleasure which my little friend experienced, in dispensing the little favors and courtesies of orders for the gallery, and franks, to those who applied for them; for all his show of feeling it a "bore" to be asked. "T was these little matters which, as it were, brought home to him a sense of his dignity, and made him feel the possession of station and authority. I know not but the following application was not more gratifying to him than any which he received:—

"T. Tagrag's best respects to T. Titmouse, Esq. M. P., and begs to say how greatly he will account y<sup>e</sup> favor of obtaining an order to be Admitted to the Gallery of the House of Commons for to-morrow night, to hear the debate on the Bill for Doing away with the Nuisance of Dustmen's cries, of a morning.

"With Mrs. T.'s & daughter's comp<sup>ts</sup>."

"T. TITMOUSE, Esq. M. P."

On receiving this, Titmouse looked out for the finest sheet of glossy extra-superfine gilt bath post, scented, and wrote as follows:—

"Please To Admit y<sup>e</sup> Barer To The Galery of the House of Commons.—T. TITMOUSE. Wednesday, March 6th, 18—"

But the reader, who must have been highly gratified by the unexpectedly rapid progress of Mr. Titmouse in Parliamentary life, will be, doubtless, as much interested by hearing that corresponding distinction awaited him in the regions of science and literature; his pioneer thither being one who had long enjoyed a very distinguishing eminence; successfully combining the character and pursuits of a scholar and philosopher, with those of a man of fashion—I mean a DOCTOR DIABOLUS GANDER. Though upward of sixty, he found means so effectually to disguise his age, that he would have passed for barely forty. He had himself so strong a predilection for dress, that the moment he saw Titmouse, he conceived a certain secret respect for that gentleman; and, in fact, the two dressed pretty nearly in the same style. The Doctor passed for a philosopher in society. He had spent most of his days in drilling youth in the elements of the mathematics; of which he had the same kind and degree of knowledge that is possessed of English literature by an old governess who has spent her life in going over the first part of Lindley Murray's English grammar with children. Just so much did the Doctor know of the scope, the object, the application, of the mathematics. His great distinguishing mark was, the capability of rendering the most abstruse science, "popular;"—i. e. utterly unintelligible to those who did understand science, and very exciting and entertaining to those who did not.

He had a knack of getting hold of obscure and starving men of genius and science, and secretly availing himself of their labors. He would pay them with comparative liberality to write, in an elegant style, on subjects of pure and mixed science: but when published, the name of Diabolus Gander would appear upon the title-page; and, to enable the doctor to do this with some comfort to his conscience, he would actually copy out the whole of the manuscript, and make a few alterations in it. But, alas! omne quod teligit fœdavit; and it invariably happened that these were the very macula pitched upon, exposed, and ridiculed by reviewers. No man could spread his small stock over a larger surface than Doctor Gander; no man be more successful in ingratiating himself with those persons so useful to an enterprising empiric—viz. wealthy fools. He paid constant court to Titmouse, from the first moment he saw him; and took the liberty of calling—unasked—the very next day, at his rooms in the Albany. He soon satisfied Titmouse that he—Gander—was a great philosopher, whom it was an advantage and a distinction to be acquainted with. He took my little admiring friend, for instance, to hear him—Gander—deliver a lecture at the Hanover Square Rooms, to a crowd of fashionable ladies and old gentlemen, who greatly applauded all he said, upon a subject equally abstruse, interesting, and instructive; viz. the occult qualities of Triangles. In short, he paid anxious and successful court to Titmouse, and was a very frequent guest at his dinner table. He gave Titmouse, on one of these occasions, an amusing account of the distinction belonging to a member of any of the great learned societies; and, in fact, quite inflamed his little imagination upon the subject—sounding him as to his wish to become a member of some great society, in common with half the dukes, marquesses, earls, and barons in the kingdom—in particular his own august kinsman, the Earl of Dreddlington himself.

"Why—a—'pon my soul—" quoth Titmouse, grinning, as he topped off his tenth glass of champagne, with the bland and voluble doctor—"I—should n't much dislike a thingumbob or two at the end of my name—what's the figure?"

"Certainly, I myself, as a zealous lover of science, my dear sir, consider her honors always well bestowed on those eminent in rank and station: though they may not have gone through the drudgery of scientific details, sir, their countenance irradiates the pale cheek of unobtrusive science."

"Yes—a—a, 'pon honor, it certainly does," quoth Titmouse, not exactly, however, comprehending the doctor's fine figure of speech.

"Now look you, Mr. Titmouse," continued the doctor, "the greatest society in all England, out and out, is the CREDULOUS SOCIETY. I happen to have come tertile influence there, through which I have been able, I am happy to say, to introduce several noblemen."

"Have you, by Jove? What the devil do they do there?"

"Do, my dear sir! They meet for the purpose of—consider the distinguished men that are fellows of that society! It was only the other day that the Duke of Tadcaster told me, (the very day after I had succeeded in getting his Grace elected,) that he was as proud of the letters "F. C. S." added to his name, as he was of his dukedom!"

"By Jove!—No—but—'pon honor bright—did he? Can you get me into it?" inquired Titmouse eagerly.

"I—oh—why—you see, my very dear sir, you're certainly rather young," quoth the doctor, gravely, pausing and rubbing his chin; "if it could be managed, it would be a splendid thing for you—eh?"

"By jingo, I should think so!" replied Titmouse.

"I think I've been asked by at least a dozen noblemen for my influence, but I've not felt myself warranted."

"Oh, well! then in course there's an end of it," interrupted Titmouse, with an air of disappointment; "and curse me if ever I cared a pin about it—I see I've not the ghost of a chance."

"I do n't know that either," replied the doctor, musingly. His design had been all along to confer sufficient obligation on Titmouse, to induce him to lend the doctor a sum of four or five hundred pounds, to embark in some wild scheme or other, and also to make Titmouse useful to him for other purposes, from time to time. "As you are so young, I am afraid it will be necessary in some sort of way to give you a sort of scientific pretension—ah, by Archimedes! but I have it!—I have it! You see, I've a treatise in the press, and nearly ready for publication, upon a particularly profound subject—but, you'll understand me, explained in a perfectly popular manner—in fact, my dear sir, it is a grand discovery of my own, which will in future ages be placed side by side of that of Sir Isaac Newton!"

"Is he a member of it too?" inquired Titmouse.

"No, my dear sir! Not bodily; but his spirit is with us. We feel it influencing all our deliberations; though he died a quarter of a century before we were established! But to return to the discovery I was mentioning; as Sir Isaac discovered the principle of GRAVITATION, (otherwise weight, or heaviness,) so, Mr. Titmouse, I have discovered the principle of LIGHTNESS!"

"You do n't say so! 'Pon my life, amazing!" exclaimed Mr. Titmouse.

"And equally true, as amazing. As soon as I shall have indicated its tendencies and results, my discovery will effect a revolution in the existing system of physical science."

"Ah! that's what they talked about in the House last night—Revolution. 'Pon my soul, I do n't like revolution, though!" exclaimed Titmouse, uneasily.

"I am speaking of something quite different, my dear Titmouse," said Dr. Gander, with a slight appearance of pique; "but to proceed with what I had intended. Since I have been sitting here, my dear sir, it has occurred to me that I have an excellent opportunity of evincing my sense of your kindness toward me. Sir, intend to DEDICATE my work to you;"

"Sir, you're amazing kind—most uncommon polite!" quoth Titmouse, who had not the slightest notion of what a "dedication" meant. Within a week or two's time, sure enough, appeared a handsome octavo volume beautifully printed and splendidly bound, entitled,

"Researches into Physical Science, with a view to the Establishment of a New Principle—

"LIGHTNESS.

And it bore the following "Dedication:"

This volume is respectfully inscribed,

The work being vigorously pushed, and systematically puffed in all directions, of course brought the honored name of Mr. Titmouse a good deal before the scientific public; and about three weeks afterward might have been seen the following "Testimonial," suspended against the screen of the public room of the Credulous Society, in support of Mr. Titmouse's pretensions to be elected into it:

"Testimonial.—We, the undersigned, Fellows of the Credulous Society, hereby certify that, from our knowledge of TITMUSE, ESQUIRE, M. P., we believe him to be a gentleman greatly attached to recondite science, and desirous of promoting its interests; and as such, deserving of being elected a Fellow of the Credulous Society.

"DREDDINGTON.

"TANTALLAN.

"WOODEN SPOON.

"FLIMSY CROTCHETT.

"DIABOLUS GANDER.

"PERIWINKLE PARALLELOGRAM.

"PLACID NOODLE."

The above distinguished names were procured by Dr. Gander; and thereupon the election of Mr. Titmouse became almost a matter of certainty—especially as, on the appointed day, Dr. Gander procured the attendance of some amiable old gentlemen, fellows of the Society, who believed the doctor to be all he pretended to be. The above testimonial having been read from the chair, Mr. Titmouse was balloted for, and declared elected unanimously a Fellow of the Credulous Society. He was prevented from attending on the ensuing meeting by a great debate, and an expected early division; then, by sheer intoxication; and again by his being unable to return in time from Croydon, where he had been attending a grand prize-fight, being the backer of one of the principal ruffians, Billy Bully, his boxing-master. On the fourth evening, however, having dined with the Earl of Dreddington, he drove with his lordship to the Society's apartments, was formally introduced, and solemnly admitted; from which time he was entitled to have his name stand thus:

"TITMUSE, ESQ., M. P., F. C. S."

—And heaven knows how much higher he might not have immediately mounted, in the scale of social distinction, but that he came to a very sudden rupture with his "guide, philosopher, and friend," Dr. Gander, who, on at length venturing to make his long-meditated application to Titmouse for a temporary loan, to enable him, Dr. Gander, to prosecute some extensive philosophical experiments—[i. e., inter nos, on public credulity]—was unhesitatingly refused by Titmouse; who, on being pressed by the Doctor, abused him in no very choice terms—and finally ordered him out of the room! He quitted the presence of his ungrateful protégé with disgust, and in despair—nor without reason—for that very night he received a propulsion toward the Fleet Prison, which suggested to his philosophical mind several ingenious reflections concerning the attraction of repulsion. There he lay for three months till he sent for the creditor who had deposited him there, and who had been his bookseller and publisher; and the doctor so puzzled him by the outline of a certain literary speculation—to be called THE GANDER GALLERY—that his credulous creditor relented, and set his ingenious and enterprising debtor once more at large.

But to return to Mr. Titmouse. It was not long after his election in the Credulous Society, that a deputation from the committee of the Society for the Promotion of Civil and Religious Discord waited upon him at his apartments in the Albany, to solicit him, in terms the most flattering and complimentary, to preside at the next annual meeting at the Stonemasons' Hall; and, after some modest expressions of distrust as to his fitness for so distinguished a post, he yielded to their anxious entreaties.

He ordered in, while they were with him, a very substantial lunch, of which they partook with infinite relish; and having done ample justice to his wines and spirits, the worthy gentlemen withdrew, charmed with the intelligence and affability of their distinguished host, and anticipating that they should have in Mr. Titmouse one of the most rising young men in the liberal line, a very effective chairman, and who would make their meeting go off with great eclat. How Titmouse could have got through the task he had undertaken, the reader must be left to conjecture; seeing that, in point of fact, "circumstances, over which he had no control," prevented him from fulfilling his promise. The meeting waited for him at least three-quarters of an hour; when, finding that neither he nor any tidings of him came, they elected some one else into the chair, and got on as well as they could. I dare say the reader is rather curious to know how all this came to pass; and I feel it my duty to state the reason frankly. On the evening of the day before that on which he had promised to preside at Stonemasons' Hall, he dined out with one or two choice spirits; and, about two o'clock in the morning, they all sallied forth, not a bit the better for wine, in quest of adventures. Mr. Titmouse gave some excellent imitations of donkeys, cats, and pigs, as they walked along arm in arm; and very nearly succeeded in tripping up an old watchman, who had crawled out to announce the hour. Then they rung every bell they passed; and, encouraged by impunity, proceeded to sport of a still more interesting and exciting description; viz., twisting knockers off doors. Titmouse was by far the most drunk of the party, and wrenched off several knockers in a very resolute and reckless manner, placing them successively in his pocket—where, also, his companions contrived, unknown to him, to deposit their spoils—till the weight was such as seriously to increase the difficulty of keeping his balance. When tired of this sport, it was agreed that they should extinguish every lamp they passed. No sooner said than done; and Titmouse volunteered to commence. Assisted by his companions, he clambered up a lamp post at the corner of St. James's street; and holding with one hand by the bar, while his legs clung round the iron post, with the other hand he opened the window of the lamp; and while in the act of blowing it out, "Watch! watch!" cried the voices of several people rushing round the corner; a rattle was sprung; away scampered his companions in different directions; and after holding on where he was for a moment or two, in confusion and alarm, down he slid, and dropped into the arms of three watchmen, around whom was gathered a little crowd of persons, all of whom had been roused from sleep by the pulling of their bells, and the noise made in wrenching off their knockers. A pretty passion they all were in, shaking their fists in the face of the captured delinquent, and accompanying him, with menacing gestures, to the watch-house.

There having been safely lodged, he was put into a dark cell, where he presently fell asleep; nor did he wake until he was summoned to go to the police office. There he found a host of victims of his over-night's exploits. He stoutly denied having been concerned in despoiling a single door of its knocker—on which a breeches-maker near him furiously lifted up the prisoner's coat-tails, and exclaimed, eagerly, "Your worship, your worship! see, he's got his knocker full of pockers! he's got his knocker full of pockers—see here, your worship!"—"What do you mean, sir, by such gibberish?" inquired the magistrate, in so stern a tone as drew the speaker's attention to the little transposition of letters which he had made in his head-long haste to detect the falsehood of the delinquent; who, finding the dismal strait to which he was driven, and feeling really very ill, begged for mercy, which, after a very severe rebuke, confronted by seven knockers lying before him in a row, all of them having been taken out of his own pockets, he obtained, on condition of his making compensation to the injured parties, who compounded with him for twelve pounds. After paying a couple of pounds to the poor-box, he was discharged; crawled into a coach, and, in a very sad condition, reached his rooms about one o'clock, and got into bed in a truly deplorable state—never once recollecting that, at that precise hour, he ought to have been taking the chair of the meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Civil and Religious Discord. As, however, his misfortunes were, in the newspapers, assigned, not to "Titmouse," but to one "John Smith," the exact state of the case never transpired to the worthy gentlemen who had been so unaccountably deprived of his services; and who, on inquiry, were told by his fluent valet, that Mr. Titmouse's late hours at the House had brought on a slight and sudden attack of—jaundice; on hearing which, they begged he might be assured of their respectful sympathy, and hearty wishes for his restoration; and tried very hard to sound the valet on the subject of his master's compensating for his absence by some donation or subscription; but the fellow was very obtuse, and they were compelled to depart disappointed.

I should have thought that the foregoing would have proved a lesson to Mr. Titmouse, and restrained him for some time from yielding to his cursed propensity to drink. Yet was it otherwise—and I shall tell the matter exactly as it happened. Within a fortnight after the mischance which I have above described, Titmouse dined with the members of a sort of pugilistic club, which met every fortnight, for the purpose of settling matters connected with the "ring." On the present occasion there had been a full muster, for they had to settle the preliminaries for a grand contest for the championship of England—to which Titmouse's master, Mr. Billy Bully, aspired. Titmouse had scarcely ever enjoyed himself more than on that exciting occasion; and, confident of his man, had backed his favorite pretty freely. Toward eleven o'clock, he found the room very close—and it was not to be wondered at, when you considered the dreadful quantity of hard ale, harder port wine, and poisonous gin and water, which the little wretch had swallowed since sitting down to dinner—however, about the hour I have named, he, Sir Pumpkin Puppy, and one or two others, all with cigars in their mouths, sallied forth to walk about town, in search of sport. I have hardly patience to write it—but positively they had not got half way down the Haymarket, when they got into a downright "row;" and, egged on by his companions, and especially inwardly impelled by the devil himself, the miserable Titmouse, after grossly insulting a little one-eyed, one-legged, bald-headed old waterman attached to the coach-stand there, challenged him to fight, and forthwith flung away his cigar, and threw himself into a boxing attitude amid the jeers and laughter of the spectators—who, however, formed a sort of ring, in a trice. At it they went instanter. Titmouse squared about with a sort of disdainful showiness—in the midst of which he suddenly received a nasty teaser on his nose and shoulder, from his active, hardy, and experienced antagonist, which brought him to the ground, the blood gushing from his nose in a copious stream. Sir Pumpkin quickly picked him up, shook him, and set him fairly at his man again. Nearer and nearer stamped the old fellow to the devoted "swell," who, evidently groggy, squared in the most absurd way imaginable for a moment or two, when he received his enemy's one, two in his eye, and on his mouth, and again dropped down.

"He's drunk—he can't fight no more than a baby; I won't stand against him any more," quoth the fair and stout-hearted old waterman. "It warn't any o' my seeking; but if he thought to come it over an old cripple like me!"

"Bravo! bravo!" cried his comrades; "come along, old chap—come along!" said one; "if I do n't give you a jolly quarter, may I stick here without a fare all this blessed night?" and the speaker led off the victor to the public house opposite, while Titmouse's friends led him off, nearly insensible, to a tavern a few doors off. Having given directions that he should be forthwith taken to a bedroom and washed, they ordered broiled bones and mulled claret for themselves. After about an hour and a half's nap, Titmouse, who probably had benefited rather than suffered from his blood-letting, rejoined his friends, and called for a cigar and a glass of cold brandy and water; having had which, they set off homeward; he reached his rooms about one o'clock, with a very black eye, a swollen nose and mouth, a very thick and indistinct speech, and unsteady step: in fact, in a much worse pickle than he had as yet exhibited to his valet, who told him, while preparing for him a glass of brandy and soda water, that no fewer than five messengers had been at his rooms. While he was yet speaking, a thundering knock was heard at the outer door, and its being opened, in rushed, breathlessly, Mr. Phelim O'Doodle.

"Titmouse!—Titmouse. Och, murder and thunder, where are ye? Where have ye been, wid ye?" he gasped—

"When—a—hen—on—water—swims—
Too-ra-laddy
Too-ra-lad lad-lad!"

drowsily sung Titmouse—it being part of a song he had heard thrice encored that evening after dinner—at the same time staggering toward O'Doodle.

"Och, botheration take your too-ra-laddy! Come, fait—by Jesus! clap your hat on and button your coat, and off to the House—immediately—or it's all up with us, an' out we go every mother's son of us—an' the bastely Tories 'll be in. Come! come!—off wid ye, I say! I've a coach at the door!"

"I—(hiccup)—I sha' n't—can't—'pon my life!"

"Och, off wid ye!—is n't it mad that Mr. O'Gibbet is wid ye?"

"He's one eye—ah, ha!—end on leg—Too-ra-laddy," hiccupped the young senator.

"Divil burn me if I do n't tie ye hand an' foot together!" cried O'Doodle, impetuously. "What the divil have ye been about wid that black eye o' yours, and—but I'll spake about it in the coach. Off wid ye! Is n't time worth a hundred pounds a minute?"

Within a minute or two's time, O'Doodle had got him safely into the coach, and down to St. Stephen's they rattled at top speed. There was going on, indeed, a desperate fight—a final trial of strength between Ministers and the Opposition on a vote of want of confidence; and a division expected every minute. Prodigious had been the efforts of both parties—the whip unprecedented. Lord Bulfinch had, early in the evening, explicitly stated that Ministers would resign unless they gained a majority; and, to their infinite vexation and astonishment, three of their staunch adherents—Titmouse being one—were missing just at the critical moment. The Opposition had been more fortunate; every man of theirs had come up—and were shouting tremendously, "Divide! divide! divide!"—while, on the other hand, Ministers were putting up men, one after another, to speak against time, though not one syllable they said could be heard, in order to get a chance of their then missing men coming up. If none of them came, Ministers would be exactly even with their opponents; in which case they resolved to resign. Up the stairs and into the lobby came O'Doodle, breathlessly, with his prize.

"Och, my dear O'Doodle!—Titmouse, ye little drunken divil, where have ye been?" commenced O'Gibbet, on whom O'Doodle stumbled suddenly.

"Thank Heaven! Good God, how fortunate!" exclaimed Mr. Flummery, both he and O'Gibbet being in a state of intense anxiety and great excitement.

"In with him!—in with him!—by Jove, they're clearing the gallery!" gasped Mr. Flummery, while he rushed into the House, to make the way clear for O'Doodle and O'Gibbet, who were literally carrying in Titmouse between them.

"Sir!—Mr. Flummery!" gasped O'Doodle; "ye wo n't forget what I've done to-night, will ye?"

"No, no—honor! In with you! In with you! A moment, and all's lost."

However, they reached the House in safety, Mr. O'Gibbet waving his hand in triumph.

"Oh, ye droll little divil! where have ye been hiding?" he hastily whispered, as he deposited him on the nearest bench, and sat beside him. He took off his hat, and wiped his reeking head and face. Gracious Heavens, what a triumph!—and in the very nick of time!—he had saved the Ministry! Tremendous was now the uproar in the House, almost every one present shouting, "Divide!—divide!"

"Strangers, withdraw," cried the Speaker.

At it they went, with an air of tumultuous and irrepressible excitement; but, through Titmouse, the Ministers triumphed. The numbers were announced:

Ayes, 301
Noes, 300

Majority for Ministers.

On which burst forth immense cheering on the ministerial side of the House, and vehement counter-cheering on the opposition side, which lasted for several minutes. The noise, indeed, was so prodigious, that it almost roused Titmouse from the sort of stupor into which he had sunk. Mr. O'Doodle accompanied him home; and, after taking a couple of tumblers of whisky and water with him, took his departure—caring nothing that he had left Titmouse on the floor, in a state of dangerous insensibility; from which, however, in due time, he recovered, but was confined to his bed, by a violent bilious attack, for nearly a week. Mr. O'Doodle's services to the Government were not forgotten. A few days afterward he vacated his seat, having received the appointment of sub-inspector of political caricatures in Ireland, with a salary of six hundred pounds a year for life. His place in the House was immediately filled up by his brother, Mr. Trigger O'Doodle. Profuse were Phelim's thanks to Mr. O'Gibbet, when that gentleman announced to him his good fortune, exclaiming, at the same time, with a sly smile, "Ye see what it is to render service to the state—ah, ah! Aisy, aisy!—softly, say I. Isn't that the way to get along?"

The injuries which Titmouse had received in his encounter with the waterman—I mean principally his black eye—prevented him from making his appearance in public, or at Lord Dreddlington's, or in the House, for several days after he had recovered from the bilious attack of which I have spoken. His non-attendance at the House, however, signified little, since both parties had been so thoroughly exhausted by their late trial of strength, as to require for some time rest and quietness, to enable them to resume the public business of the country. As soon as his eye was fairly convalescent, the first place to which he ventured out was his new residence in Park lane, which, having been taken for him, under the superintendence of the Earl of Dreddlington and Mr. Gammon, some month or two before, was now rapidly being furnished, in order to be in readiness to receive his lady and himself, immediately after his marriage—his parliamentary duties not admitting of a prolonged absence from town. His marriage with the Lady Cecilia had, as usual, been already prematurely announced in the newspapers several times, as on the eve of taking place. Their courtship went on very easily and smoothly. Neither of them seemed anxious for the other's society, though they contrived to evince, in the presence of others, a decent degree of gratification at meeting each other. He did all which he was instructed to be necessary for a man of fashion to do. He attended her and the Earl to the opera repeatedly, as also to other places of fashionable resort: he had danced with her occasionally; but, to tell the truth, it was only at the vehement instance of the Earl her father, that she ever consented to stand up with one whose person, whose carriage, whose motions, were so unutterably vulgar and ridiculous as those of Mr. Titmouse, who was yet her affianced husband. He had made her several times rather expensive presents of jewelry, and would have purchased for her a great stock of clothing, if she would have permitted it. He had, moreover, been a constant guest at the Earl's table, where he was under greater restraint than anywhere else. Of such indiscretions and eccentricities as I have just been recording, they knew, or were properly supposed to know, nothing. "I was not for them to have their eyes upon him while sowing his wild oats—so thought the Earl; who, however, had frequent occasion for congratulating himself in respect of Mr. Titmouse's political celebrity, and also of the marks of distinction, conferred upon him in the literary and scientific world, of which the Earl was so distinguished an ornament. Titmouse had presented copies, gorgeously bound, of Dr. Gander's Treatise on Lightness, both to the Earl and the Lady Cecilia; and the very flattering dedication to Titmouse, by Dr. Gander, really operated not a little in his favor with his future lady.

What effect might have been produced upon her ladyship, had she been apprised of the fact, that the aforesaid dedication had appeared in only a hundred copies, having been cancelled directly Dr. Gander had ascertained the futility of his expectations from Titmouse, I do not know; but I believe she never was apprised of the fact. As far as his dress went, she had contrived, through the interference of the Earl and of Mr. Gammon, (for whom she had conceived a singular respect,) to abate a little of its fantastic absurdity—its execrable vulgarity. Nothing, however, seemed capable of effecting any material change in the man, although his continued intercourse with refined society could hardly fail to effect an advantageous change in his manners. As for any thing further, Tittlebat Titmouse remained the same vulgar, heartless, presumptuous, ignorant creature he had ever been. Though I perceive in the Lady Cecilia no qualities to excite our respect or affection, I pity her from my very soul when I contemplate her coming union with Titmouse. One thing I know, that as soon as ever she had bound herself irrevocably to Mr. Titmouse, she began to think of at least fifty men whom she had ever spurned, but whom now she would have welcomed with all the ardor and affection of which her cold nature was susceptible. As she had never been conspicuous for animation, vivacity, or energy, the gloom which more and more frequently overshadowed her, whenever her thoughts turned toward Titmouse, attracted scarce any one's attention. There were those, however, who could have spoken of her mental disquietude at the approach of her cheerless nuptials—I mean her maid Annette and Miss Macepleuchan. To say that she loathed the bare idea of her union with Titmouse—of his person, manners, and character—would not perhaps be exactly correct, since she had not the requisite strength of character; but she contemplated her future lord with mingled feelings of apprehension, dislike, and disgust. She generally fled for support to the comfortable notion of "fate," which had assigned her such a husband. Heaven had denied poor Lady Cecilia all powers of contemplating the future, of anticipating consequences, of reflecting upon the step she was about to take. Miss Macepleuchan, however, did so for her; but, being placed in a situation of great delicacy and difficulty, acted with cautious reserve whenever the subject was mentioned. Lady Cecilia had not vouchsafed to consult her before her ladyship had finally committed herself to Titmouse; and, after that, interference was useless and unwarrantable.

Lady Cecilia late one afternoon entered her dressing-room, pale and dispirited, as had been latterly her wont; and, with a deep sigh, sunk into her easy chair. Annette, on her ladyship's entrance, was leaning against the window frame, reading a book, which she immediately closed and laid down. "What are you reading there?" inquired Lady Cecilia, languidly.

"Oh, nothing particular, my lady!" replied Annette, coloring a little; "it was only the prayer-book. I was looking at the marriage-service, my lady. I wanted to see what it was that your ladyship has to say."

"It's not very amusing, Annette. I think it very dull and stupid."

"La, my lady—now I should have thought it quite interesting, if I had been in your ladyship's situation!"

"Well, what is it that they expect me to repeat?"

"Oh! I'll read it, my lady—here it is," replied Annette, and read as follows:

"Then shall the priest say unto the woman, 'N, wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband, to live together, after God's ordinance, in the holy state of matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, serve him, love, honor, and keep him, in sickness and in health, and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?'"

"The woman shall answer, 'I will.'"

"Well, it's only a form, you know, Annette, and I dare say no one ever gives it a thought," said Lady Cecilia, struggling to suppress a sigh.

"Then," continued Annette, "your ladyship will have to say a good deal after the parson—but I beg your ladyship's pardon—it's (in your case) the bishop. Here it is:

"I, N, take thee M, to be my wedded husband, to have and to hold, from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish—"

"Yes, yes—I hear," interrupted Lady Cecilia, faintly, turning pale; "I know it all—that will do, Annette."

"There's only a word more, my lady."

"And obey, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I give thee my troth." All this, your ladyship sees, your ladyship says, with your right hand holding Mr. Titmouse's." Here a visible tremor passed through Lady Cecilia. "You may leave me alone, Annette, a little while," said she; "I don't feel quite well."

"La, my lady, an't your ladyship late already! Your ladyship knows how early her Grace dines ever since her illness."

"There's plenty of time; I'll ring for you when I want you. And—stay—you may as well leave your prayer-book with me for a moment; it will answer me to look in it." Annette did as she was bid; and the next moment her melancholy mistress was alone. She did not, however, open the book she had asked for, but fell into a reverie, which was disturbed only by her maid tapping at the door; and who, on entering, told her that she had not one moment to lose; that his lordship had been dressed for some time. On this her ladyship rose, and commenced her toilet with a very deep sigh.

"Your ladyship, I suppose, wears your gold-colored satin? It matches so well with the pearls," said Annette, going to the jewel-case.

"I sha'n't wear any pearls to-day."

"Oh! my lady! not that beautiful spray of Mr. Titmouse's? Your ladyship does look so well in it."

"I sha'n't wear any thing of Mr. Tit—I mean," she added, coloring; "I sha'n't wear any thing in my hair to-day!"

Many and anxious, it may be easily believed, had been the conferences and negotiations between the Earl, Mr. Titmouse and Mr. Gammon, with reference to the state of his property, and the settlement to be made on Lady Cecilia. It appeared that the extent of the incumbrances on the Yatton property was £35,000, and which Gammon had many ways of accounting for, without disclosing the amount of plunder which had fallen to the share of the firm—or rather to the senior partner. The interest on this sum (£1750) would reduce Mr. Titmouse's present income to £8250 per annum; but Gammon pledged himself that the rental of the estates could, with the greatest ease, be raised to £12,000, and that measures, in fact, were already in progress to effect so desirable a result. Then there was a sum of £20,000 due to Mr. Titmouse from Mr. Aubrey, on account of the same profits, £10,000 of which was guaranteed by Lord de la Zouch, and would very shortly become payable, with interest; and the remaining £10,000 could be at any time called in. The sum finally determined upon, as a settlement upon Lady Cecilia, was £3000 a year—surely a very substantial "consideration" for the "faithful promise" to be, by-and-by, made by her at the altar—and which, moreover, she conceived she had a prospect of having entirely to herself—really "for her separate use, exempt from the control, debts, and engagements of her said intended husband." I am sorry to say that Lady Cecilia clung to the prospect of an almost immediate separation; which, she learned from several confidential friends, some of whom were qualified, by personal experience, to offer an opinion, was a very easy matter, becoming daily more frequent, on the ground of incompatibility of temper. A faint hint of the kind which she had once dropped to Miss Macepleuchan, was received in such a manner as prevented her from ever repeating it. As for the Earl, her father, I cannot say that he did not observe a depression of spirits in his daughter, increasing with the increasing proximity of her marriage. Since, however, he had entirely reconciled himself to it—and was delighted at the approaching long-coveted re-union of the family interests—he did not think of her having any real objection to the arrangements. As for her lowness of spirits, and nervousness, doubtless every woman on the point of being married experienced similar feelings. She herself, indeed, seldom if ever named the matter to her father in such a way as occasion him uneasiness. In short, the affair seemed to be going on just as it ought to do; and even had it assumed an untoward aspect, circumstances had arisen which would have prevented the Earl from giving his wonted attention to what in any degree concerned his daughter.

In the first place, on his lordship's party coming in to power, to his infinite amazement his old post of Lord High Steward was filled up by some one else! So also was the office of Lord President of the Council; and so, moreover, was every other office; and that, too, without any apology to the offended peer, or explanation of such a phenomenon as his entire exclusion from office. The Premier, in fact, had never once thought of his lordship while forming his administration; and on being subsequently remonstrated with by a venerable peer, a common friend of the Premier and Lord Dreddlington, the Premier very calmly and blandly expressed his regret that Lord Dreddlington had not given him notice of his being still—even in his advanced years—disposed to hold office; and trusted that he should yet be able, and before any long time should have elapsed, to avail himself of the very valuable services "of my Lord Dreddlington." This was all that he could get from the courteous but marble-hearted Premier; and, for a long while, the Earl could think of only one mode of soothing his wounded feelings—viz. going about to his friends, and demonstrating that the new Lord Steward and the new Lord President were every day displaying their unfitness for office; and that their only error committed by the Premier, in the difficult and responsible task of forming a government, was that of selecting two such individuals as he had appointed to those distinguished posts. He was also greatly comforted and supported, at this period of vexation and disappointment, by the manly and indignant sympathy of—Mr. Gammon, who had succeeded in gaining a prodigious ascendancy over the Earl, who, on the sudden death of his own solicitor, old Mr. Peunce, adopted Gammon in his stead; and infinitely rejoiced his lordship was, to have thus secured the services of one who possessed an intellect at once so practical, masterly, and energetic; who had formed so high an estimate of his lordship's powers; and whom his lordship's condescending familiarity never for one moment caused to lose sight of the vast distance and difference between them. He appeared, moreover, to act between Titmouse and the Earl with the scrupulous candor and fidelity of a high-minded person, consciously placed in a situation of peculiar delicacy and responsibility. At the least, he seemed exceedingly anxious to secure Lady Cecilia's interests; and varied—or appeared to vary—the arrangements, according to every suggestion of his lordship. The Earl was satisfied that Gammon was disposed to make Titmouse go much further than of his own accord he would have felt disposed to go, toward meeting the Earl's wishes in the matter of the settlements;—in fact, Gammon evinced great anxiety to place her ladyship in that position to which her high pretensions so justly entitled her.

But this was not the only mode by which he augmented and secured his influence over the weak old peer. Not only had Gammon, in the manner pointed out in a previous portion of this history, diminished the drain upon his lordship's income which had so long existed in the shape of interest upon money lent him on mortgage, (and which embarrassments, by the way, had all arisen from his foolish state and extravagance when Lord High Steward;) not only, I say, had Gammon done all this, but infinitely more;—he had enabled his lordship, as it were, "to strike a blow in a new hemisphere," and at once evince his fitness for the conduct of important and complicated affairs of business, acquire an indefinite augmentation of fortune, and also great influence and popularity.

England, about the time I am speaking of, was smitten with a sort of mercantile madness—which showed itself in the shape of a monstrous passion for JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES. John Bull all of a sudden took it into his troubled head, that no commercial undertaking of the least importance could any longer be carried on by means of individual energy, capital, and enterprise. A glimmering of this great truth he discovered that he had had from the first moment that a private partnership had been adopted; and it was only to follow out the principle—to convert a private into a public partnership, and call it a "Joint stock Company." This bright idea of John's produced prompt and prodigious results—a hundred joint-stock companies in the metropolis alone, within one twelvemonth's time. But then came the question, upon what were these grand combined forces to operate? Undertakings of commensurate magnitude must be projected—and so it was. It really mattered not a straw how wild and ludicrously impracticable was a project—it had but to be started, and announced, to call forth monied people among all classes, all making haste to be rich—and ready to back the speculation, even to the last penny they had in the world; pouring out their capital with a recklessness, of which the lamentable results may prevent their recurrence. Any valuble visionary who was unluckily able to reach the ear of one or two persons in the city, could expand his crotchets into a "company" with as little effort as an idiot could blow out a soap-bubble. For instance: one wiseacre (who ought never to have been at large) conceived a plan for creating ARTIFICIAL RAIN at an hour's notice over any extent of country short of three miles; a second, for conveying MILK to every house in the metropolis in the same way as water is at present conveyed, viz. by pipes, supplied by an immense reservoir of milk to be established at Islington, and into which a million of cows were to be milked night and morning; and a third for converting saw-dust into solid wood.

"rose like an exhalation"

WHITTIER.—The Christian World, is noticing the poet Whittier, says: "We have long admired his genius, and shall henceforth cherish the image of his person. It is a delightful thing to witness the ascendancy of the moral over the intellectual in such men. Goodness alone is greater than genius."

CAMPBELL, the poet, being asked by a young lady to write something "original" in her album, answered as follows:

An original something, dear maid, you would win me
To write, but how shall I begin?
For I'm sure I have nothing original in me,
EXCEPTING Original Sin.

GUY FAWKES.

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER XIII. . . . The Flight of the Conspirators.

On the same night, and at the same hour that Guy Fawkes was captured, the other conspirators held their rendezvous in Lincoln's Inn Walks. A presentiment of the fate awaiting them filled the breasts of all, and even Catesby shared in the general depression. Plan after plan was proposed, and, as soon as proposed, rejected; and they seemed influenced only by alarm and irresolution. Feeling, at length, that nothing could be done, and that they were only increasing their risk by remaining together longer, they agreed to separate, appointing to meet at the same place on the following night, if their project should not, in the interim, be discovered.

"Before daybreak," said Catesby, "I will proceed to the cellar under the Parliament House, and ascertain whether anything has happened to Guy Fawkes. My heart misgives me about him, and I reproach myself that I have allowed him to incur this peril alone."

"Guy Fawkes is arrested," said a voice near them, "and is at this moment under examination before the King." "It is Tresham who speaks," cried Catesby; "secure him."

The injunction was instantly obeyed. Tresham was seized, and several weapons pointed against his breast. He did not, however, appear to be dismayed, but so far as could be discerned in the obscurity, seemed to maintain great boldness of demeanor.

"I have again ventured among you at the hazard of my life," he said, in a firm tone, "to give you this most important intelligence; and am requited, as I have ever been of late, with menaces and violence. Stab me, and see whether my death will avail you in this extremity. I am in equal danger with yourselves, and whether I perish by your hands, or by those of the executioner, is of little moment."

"Let me question him before we avenge ourselves upon him," said Catesby to Rookwood. "How do you know that Guy Fawkes is a prisoner?"

"I saw him taken," replied Tresham, "and esteem myself singularly fortunate that I escaped the same fate. Though excluded from further share in the project, I could not divest myself of a strong desire to know how matters were going on, and I resolved to visit the cellar secretly at midnight. As I stealthily approached it, I remarked several armed figures beneath a gateway, and conjecturing their purpose, instantly concealed myself behind a projection of the wall. I had not been in this situation many minutes, when the cellar door opened, and Guy Fawkes issued from it."

"Well!" cried Catesby, breathlessly.

"The party I had noticed immediately rushed forward, and secured him before he could offer any resistance," continued Tresham. "After a brief struggle, certain of their number dragged him into the cellar, while others kept watch without. I should now have flown, but my limbs refused their office, and I was therefore compelled, however reluctantly, to see the end of it. In a short time Guy Fawkes was brought forth again, and I heard some one in authority give directions that he should be instantly taken to Whitehall, to be interrogated before the King and the Privy Council. He was then led away, and a guard placed at the door of the cellar. Feeling certain I should be discovered, I continued for some time in agony of apprehension, not daring to stir. But, at length, summoning up sufficient resolution, I crept cautiously along the side of the wall, and got off unperceived. My first object was to warn you."

"How did you become acquainted with our place of rendezvous?" demanded the elder Wright.

"I overheard you, at our last interview at White Webbs, appoint a midnight meeting in this place," replied Tresham, "and I hurried hither in the hope of finding you, and have not been disappointed."

"When I give the word plunge your swords into his breast," said Catesby, in a low tone.

"Hold!" cried Percy, taking him aside. "If we put him to death in this spot, his body will be found, and his slaughter may awaken suspicions against us. Guy Fawkes will reveal nothing."

"Of that I am well assured," said Catesby. "Shall we take the traitor to some secure retreat, where we can detain him till we learn what takes place at the palace, and if we find he has betrayed us, despatch him?"

"That would answer no good purpose," returned Percy. "The sooner we are rid of him the better. We can then deliberate as to what is best to be done."

"You are right," rejoined Catesby. "If he has betrayed us, life will be a burthen to him, and the greatest kindness we could render him would be to rid him of it. Let him go. Tresham," he added, in a loud voice, "you are free. But we meet no more."

"We have not parted yet," cried the traitor, springing backwards, and uttering a loud cry. "I arrest you all in the King's name."

The signal was answered by a band of soldiers, who emerged from behind the trees where they had hitherto been concealed, and instantly surrounded the conspirators. "It is now my turn to threaten," laughed Tresham.

Catesby replied by drawing a petronel, and firing it in the supposed direction of the speaker. But he missed his mark. The ball lodged in the brain of a soldier who was standing beside him, and the ill-fated wretch fell to the ground.

A desperate conflict now ensued. Topcliffe, who commanded the assailing party, ordered his followers to take the conspirators alive, and it was mainly owing to this injunction that the latter was indebted for their safety. Whispering his directions to his companions, Catesby gave the word, and making a simultaneous rush forward, they broke through the opposing ranks, and instantly disappearing, and favored by the gloom, they baffled pursuit.

"We have failed in this part of our scheme," said Tresham to Topcliffe, as they met half an hour afterward. "What is to be done?"

"We must take the Earl of Salisbury's advice upon it," returned Topcliffe. "I shall now hasten to Whitehall to see how Guy Fawkes's interrogation proceeds, and will communicate with his lordship."

Upon this they separated. None of the conspirators met again that night. Each fled in a different direction, and, ignorant of what had happened to the rest, sought some secure retreat. Catesby ran toward Chancery lane, and passing through a narrow alley, entered the large gardens which then lay between this thoroughfare and Fetter lane. Listening to hear whether he was pursued, and finding nothing to alarm him, he threw himself on the sod beneath a tree, and was lost in painful reflection.

"All my fair schemes are marred by that traitor Tresham," he muttered. "I could forgive myself by being duped by him, if I had slain him when he was in my power. But that he should escape to exult in our ruin, and reap the reward of his perfidy, afflicts me even more than failure."

Tortured by thoughts like these, and in vain endeavoring to snatch such brief repose as would fit him for the fatigue he might have to endure on the morrow, he did not quit his position till late in the morning of a dull November day—it was, as will be recollected, the memorable Fifth—had arrived.

He then arose, and slouching his hat, and wrapping his cloak around him, shaped his course toward Fleet street. From the knots of persons gathered together at different corners—from their muttered discourse and mysterious looks—as well as from the general excitement that prevailed—he felt sure that some rumor of the plot had gone abroad. Shunning observation as much as he could, he entered a small tavern near Fleet Bridge, and called for a flask of wine and some food. While discussing these, he was attracted by the discourse of the landlord, who was conversing with his guests about the conspiracy.

"I hear that all the Papists are to be hanged, drawn and quartered," cried the host; "and if it be true, as I have heard, that this plot is their contrivance, they deserve it. I hope I have no believer in that faith—no recusant in my house."

"Do not insult us by any such suspicion," cried one of the guests. "We are all loyal men—all good Protestants."

"Do you know whether the conspirators have been discovered, sir?" asked the host of Catesby.

"I do not even know of the plot," replied the other. "What was the object?"

"What is its object?" cried the host. "You will scarcely credit me when I tell you. I tremble to speak of it. Its object was to blow up the Parliament House, and the King and all the nobles and prelates of the land along with it."

"Horrible!" exclaimed the guests.

"But how do you know it is a scheme of the Papists?" asked Catesby.

"Because I have been told so," rejoined the host. "But who else could devise such a monstrous plan? It would never enter into the head or heart of a Protestant to conceive so detestable an action. We love our King too well for that, and would shed the last drop of our blood rather than a hair of his head should be injured. But these priest-ridden Papists think otherwise. They regard him as a usurper; and having received a dispensation from the Pope to that effect, fancy it to be a pious act to remove him. There will be no tranquility in the kingdom while one of them is left alive; and I hope his Majesty will take advantage of the present ferment to order a general massacre of them, like that of the poor Protestants on Saint Bartholomew's day in Paris."

"Ay, massacre them," cried the guests, "that's the way. Burn their houses, and cut their throats. Will it be lawful to do so without further authority, mine host? If so, we will set about it immediately."

"I cannot resolve you on that point," replied the landlord. "You had better wait a short time. I dare say their slaughter will be publicly commanded."

"Heaven grant it may be so!" cried one of the guests, "I will bear my part in the business."

Catesby arose, paid his reckoning, and strode out of the tavern.

"Do you know," mine host," said the guest who had last spoken, "I half suspect that tall fellow, who has just left us, is a Papist."

"Perhaps a conspirator," said another.

"Let us watch him," cried a third.

"Stay," cried the host, "he has paid me double my reckoning. I believe him to be an honest man and a good Protestant."

"What you say confirms my suspicions," rejoined the first speaker. "We will follow him."

On reaching Temple Bar, Catesby found the gates closed, and a guard stationed at them,—no one being allowed to pass through without examination. Not willing to expose himself to this scrutiny, Catesby turned away, and in doing so perceived three of the persons he had just left in the tavern. The expression of their countenances satisfied him they were dogging him; but affecting not to perceive it, he retraced his steps, gradually quickening his pace, until he reached a narrow street leading into Whitefriars, down which he darted. The moment his pursuers saw this, they hurried after him, shouting, "A Papist—a Papist!—a conspirator!"

But Catesby was now safe. Claiming the protection of certain Alsatians who were lounging at the door of a tavern, and offering to reward them, they instantly drew their swords, and drove the others away; while Catesby, tossing a few pieces of money to his preservers, passed through a small doorway into the Temple, and making the best of his way to the stairs, leapt into a boat, and ordered the waterman to row to Westminster. The man obeyed, and plying his oars, soon gained the middle of the stream. Little way, however, had been made, when Catesby descried a large wherry, manned by several rowers, swiftly approaching them, and instinctively comprehending whom it contained, ordered the man to rest on his oars till it had passed.

In a few moments the wherry approached them. It was filled with sergeants of the guard and halberdiers, in the midst of whom sat Guy Fawkes. Catesby could not resist the impulse that prompted him to rise, and the movement attracted the attention of the prisoner. The momentary glance they exchanged convinced Catesby that Fawkes perceived him, though his motionless features gave no token of recognition, and he immediately afterwards fixed his eyes towards heaven, as if to intimate—at least Catesby so construed the gesture,—that his earthly career was well-nigh ended. Heaving a deep sigh, Catesby watched the wherry sweep on towards the Tower—its fatal destination—until it was lost to view.

"All is over, I fear, with the bravest of our band," he thought, as he tracked his course; "but some effort must be made to save him. At all events, we will die sword in hand, and like soldiers, and not as common malefactors."

Abandoning his intention of proceeding to Westminster, he desired the man to pull ashore, and landing at Arundel Stairs, hastened to the Strand. Here he found large crowds collected, the shops closed, and business completely at a stand. Nothing was talked of but the conspiracy, and the most exaggerated and extraordinary accounts of it were circulated and believed. Some would have it that the Parliament House was already blown up, and that the city of London itself had been set fire to in several places by the Papists. It was also stated that numerous arrests had taken place, and it was certain that the houses of several Catholic nobles and wealthy gentlemen had been searched. To such a height was the popular indignation raised, that it required the utmost efforts of the soldiery to prevent the mob from breaking into these houses, and using violence towards their inmates.

Every gate and avenue to the palace was strictly guarded, and troops of horse were continually scouring the streets. Sentinels were placed before suspected houses, and no one was suffered to enter them, or to go forth without special permission. Detachments of soldiery were also stationed at the end of all the main thoroughfares. Bars were thrown across the smaller streets and outlets, and proclamation was made that no one was to quit the city, however urgent his business, for three days.

On hearing this announcement, Catesby saw at once that if he did not effect his escape immediately, it would be impracticable. Accordingly, he hurried towards Charing Cross, and turning up Saint Martin's Lane, at the back of the King's Mews, contrived to elude the vigilance of the guard, and speeded along the lane,—for it was then literally so, and surrounded on either side by high hedges,—until he came to Saint Giles's,—at this time nothing more than a few scattered houses intermixed with trees. Here he encountered a man mounted on a powerful steed, and seeing this person look hard at him, would have drawn out of the way, if the other had not addressed him by name. He then regarded the equestrian more narrowly, and found it was Martin Heydocke.

"I have heard what has happened, Mr. Catesby," said Martin, "and can imagine the desperate strait in which you must be placed. Take my horse,—it may aid your flight. I was sent to London by my master, Mr. Humphrey Chetham, to bring him intelligence of the result of your attempt, and I am sure I am acting in accordance with his wishes in rendering you such a service. At all events I will risk it. Mount, sir,—mount, and make the best of your way hence."

Catesby needed no further exhortation, but springing into the saddle, hastily murmured his thanks, and striking into a lane on the right, rode off at a swift pace towards Highgate.

On reaching the brow of this beautiful hill, he drew in the bridle for a moment, and gazed towards the city he had just quitted. Dark and bitter were his thoughts as he fixed his eye upon Westminster Abbey, and fancied he could discern the neighboring pile, whose destruction he had meditated. Remembering that from this very spot, when he had last approached the capital, in company with Guy Fawkes and Viviana Radcliffe, he had looked in the same direction, he could not help contrasting his present sensations with those he had then experienced. At that time, he was full of ardor, and confident of success. Now, all was lost to him, and he was anxious for little more than self-preservation. Involuntarily, his eye wandered along the great city, until passing over the mighty fabric of Saint Paul's it settled upon the Tower,—upon the place of Guy Fawkes's captivity.

"And can nothing be done for his deliverance?" sighed Catesby, as he turned away, his eyes filling with moisture:—"must that brave soldier die the death of a felon—must he be subjected to the torture—horror! If he had died defending himself, I should scarcely have pitied him. And if he had destroyed himself, together with his foes, as he resolved to do, I should have envied him. But the idea of what he will have to suffer in that dreadful place—nay, what he is now, perhaps, suffering—makes the life-blood curdle in my veins. I will never fall alive into their hands."

With this resolve, he struck spurs into his steed, and, urging him to a swift pace, dashed rapidly forward. He had ridden more than a mile, when hearing shouts behind him, he perceived two troopers galloping after him as fast as their horses could carry them. They shouted to him to stay, and as they were better mounted than he was, it was evident they would soon come up with him. Determined, however, to adhere to the resolution he had just formed, and not to yield himself with life, he prepared for a conflict, and suddenly halting, he concealed a petronel beneath his cloak, and waited till his foes drew near.

"I command you in the King's name to surrender," said the foremost trooper, riding up. "You are a rebel and a traitor."

"Be this my answer," replied Catesby, aiming at the man, and firing with such certainty, that he fell from his horse mortally wounded. Unsheathing his sword, he then prepared to attack the other trooper. But, terrified at the fate of his comrade, the man turned his horse's head, and rode off.

Without bestowing a thought on the dying man, who lay groaning in the mire, Catesby caught hold of his horse, and satisfied that the animal was better than his own, mounted him, and proceeded at the same headlong pace as before.

In a short time he reached Finchley, where several persons rushed from their dwellings to inquire whether he brought any intelligence of the plot, rumors of which had already reached them. Without stopping, Catesby replied that most important discoveries had been made, and that he was carrying despatches from the King to Northampton. No opposition was, therefore, offered him, and he soon left all traces of habitation behind him. Urging his horse to its utmost, he arrived, in less than a quarter of an hour, at Chipping Barnet. Here the same inquiries were made as at Finchley, and returning the same answer,—for he never relaxed his speed for a moment—he pursued his course.

In less than three-quarters of an hour after this, he arrived at Saint Albans, and proceeding direct to the post-house, asked for a horse. But instead of complying with the request, the landlord of the Rose and Crown—such was the name of the hotel—instantly withdrew, and returned the next moment with an officer, who desired to speak with Catesby before he proceeded further. The latter, however, took no notice of the demand, but rode off.

The clatter of horses' hoofs behind him soon convinced him he was again pursued, and he was just beginning to consider in what way he should make a second defence, when he observed two horsemen cross a lane on the left, and make for the main road. His situation now appeared highly perilous, especially as his pursuers, who had noticed the other horsemen at the same time as himself, shouted to them. But he was speedily relieved. These persons, instead of stopping, accelerated their pace, and appeared as anxious as he was to avoid those behind him.

They were now within a short distance of Dunstable, and were ascending the lovely downs which lie on the London side of this ancient town, when one of the horsemen in front chancing to turn round, Catesby perceived it was Rookwood. Overjoyed at the discovery, he shouted to him at the top of his voice; and the other, who, it presently appeared, was accompanied by Keyes, instantly stopped. In a few seconds, Catesby was by their side, and a rapid explanation taking place, they all three drew up in order of battle.

By this time, their pursuers had arrived within a hundred yards of them, and seeing how matters stood, and not willing to hazard an engagement, after a brief consultation, retired. The three friends then pursued their route, passed through Dunstable, and without pausing a moment on the road, soon neared Fenny Stratford. Just before they arrived at this place Catesby's horse fell from exhaustion. Instantly extricating himself from the fallen animal, he ran by the side of his companions till they got to the town, where Rookwood, who had placed relays on the road, changed his horse, and the others were fortunate enough to procure fresh steeds.

Proceeding with unabated impetuosity, they soon cleared a few more miles, and had just left Stoney Stratford behind them, when they overtook a solitary horseman, who proved to be John Wright, and a little further on they came up with Percy, and Christopher Wright.

Though their numbers were thus increased, they did not consider themselves secure, but flinging their cloaks away to enable them to proceed with greater expedition, hurried on to Towcester. Here Keyes quitted his companions, and shaped his course into Warwickshire, where he was afterwards taken; while the others, having procured fresh horses, made the best of their way to Ashby Saint Leger's.

About six o'clock, Catesby and his companions arrived at his old family seat, which he had expected to approach in triumph, but which he now approached with feelings of the deepest mortification and disappointment. They found the house filled with guests, among whom was Robert Winter—who were just sitting down to supper. Catesby rushed into the room in which these persons were assembled, covered with mud and dirt—his haggard looks and dejected appearance proclaiming that his project had failed. His friends followed, and their appearance confirmed the impression that he had produced. Lady Catesby hastened to her son, and strove to comfort him, but he rudely repulsed her.

"What is the matter?" she anxiously inquired.

"What is the matter?" cried Catesby in a furious tone, and stamping his foot to the ground. "All is lost! our scheme is discovered; Guy Fawkes is a prisoner, and ere long we shall all be led to the block. Yes, all," here panted, gazing sternly around.

"I will never be led thither with life," said Robert Winter.

"Nor I," added a young Catholic gentleman, named Acton of Ribbesford, who had lately joined the conspiracy; "though the great design has failed, we are yet free, and have swords to draw, and arms to wield them."

"Ay," exclaimed Robert Winter, "all our friends are assembled at Dunchurch. Let us join them instantly, and we may yet stir up a rebellion which may accomplish all we can desire. I myself accompanied Humphrey Littleton to Dunchurch this morning, and know we shall find everything in readiness."

"Do not despair," cried Lady Catesby, "all will yet be well. Every member of our faith will join you, and you will soon muster a formidable army."

"We must not yield without a blow," cried Percy, pouring out a bumper of wine, and swallowing it at a draught.

"You are right," said Rookwood, imitating his example, "we will sell our lives dearly."

"If you will adhere to this resolution, gentlemen," rejoined Catesby, "we may yet retrieve our loss. With five hundred staunch followers, who will stand by me to the last, I will engage to raise such a rebellion in England as shall not be checked, except by the acknowledgment of our rights, or the dethronement of the King."

"We will all stand by you," cried the others.

"Swear it," cried Catesby, raising the glass to his lips.

"We do," was the reply.

"Wearied as we are," cried Catesby, "we must at once proceed to Dunchurch, and urge our friends to rise in arms with us."

"Agreed," cried the others.

Summoning all his household, and arming them, Catesby then set out with the rest for Dunchurch, which lay about five miles from Ashby Saint Leger's. They arrived there in about three-quarters of an hour, and found the mansion crowded with Catholic gentlemen and their servants. Entering the banquet hall, they found Sir Everard Digby at the head of the board, with Garnet on his right hand. Upwards of sixty persons were seated at the table. Their arrival was greeted with loud shouts, and several of the guests drew their swords and flourished them over their heads.

"What news?" cried Sir Everard Digby. "Is the blow struck?"

"No," replied Catesby: "we have been betrayed."

A deep silence prevailed. A change came over the countenances of the guests. Significant glances were exchanged, and it was evident that general uneasiness prevailed.

"What is to be done?" cried Sir Everard Digby, after a pause.

"Our course is clear," returned Catesby. "We must stand by each other. In that case, we have nothing to fear, and shall accomplish our purpose, though not in the way originally intended."

"I will have nothing further to do with the matter," said Sir Robert Digby of Coleshill, Sir Everard's uncle. And rising, he quitted the room with several of his followers, while his example was imitated by Humphrey Littleton, and others.

"All chance for the restoration of our faith in England, is over," observed Garnet, in a tone of despondency.

"Not so, father," replied Catesby, "if we are true to each other. My friends," he cried, stopping those who were about to depart, "in the name of our holy religion I beseech you to pause. Much is against us now. But let us hold together, and all will speedily be righted. Every Catholic in this county, in Cheshire, in Lancashire, and Wales, must flock to our standard when it is once displayed. Do not desert us—do not desert yourselves—for our cause is your cause. I have a large force at my command; so has Everard Digby, and together we can muster nearly five hundred adherents. With these, we can offer such a stand as will enable us to make conditions with our opponents, or even to engage with them with a reasonable prospect of success. I am well assured, moreover, if we lose no time, but proceed to the houses of our friends, we shall have a large army with us. Do not fall off, then. On you depends our success."

This address was followed by loud acclamations, and all who heard it agreed to stand by the cause in which they had embarked to the last.

As Catesby left the banquet-hall with Sir Everard to make preparations for their departure, they met Viviana and a female attendant.

"I hear the enterprise has failed," she cried, in a voice suffocated by emotion. "What has happened to my husband? Is he safe? Is he with you?"

"Alas! no," replied Catesby; "he is a prisoner."

Viviana uttered a cry of anguish, and fell senseless into the arms of the attendant.

CHAPTER XIV.—The Examination.

Disarmed by Sir Thomas Knevet and his followers, who found upon his person a packet of slow matches and touchwood, and bound hand and foot, Guy Fawkes was dragged into the cellar by his captors, who instantly commenced their search. In a corner behind the door they discovered a dark lantern, with a light burning within it; and moving with the utmost caution,—for they were afraid of bringing sudden destruction upon themselves,—they soon perceived the barrels of gunpowder ranged against the wall. Carefully removing the planks, billets, and iron bars with which they were covered, they remarked that two of the casks were staved in, while the hoops from a third were taken off, and the powder scattered around it. They also noticed that several trains were laid along the floor,—everything, in short, betokening that the preparations for the desperate deed were fully completed.

While they were making this investigation, Guy Fawkes, who, seeing that further resistance was useless, had remained perfectly motionless up to this moment, suddenly made a struggle to free himself; and so desperate was the effort, that he burst the leathern thong that bound his hands, and seizing the soldier nearest to him, bore him to the ground. He then grasped the lower limbs of another, who held a lantern, and strove to overthrow him, and wrest the lantern from his grasp, evidently intending to apply the light to the powder. And he would unquestionably have executed his terrible design, if three of the most powerful of the soldiers had not thrown themselves upon him, and overpowered him. All this was the work of a moment, but it was so startling, that Sir Thomas Knevet and Topcliffe, though both courageous men, and used to scenes of danger—especially the latter—rushed toward the door, expecting some dreadful catastrophe would take place.

"Do him no harm," cried Knevet, as he returned to the soldiers, who were still struggling with Fawkes,— "do him no harm. It is not here he must die."

"A moment more, and I had blown you all to perdition," cried Fawkes. "But heaven ordained it otherwise."

"Heaven will never assist such damnable designs as yours," rejoined Knevet. "Thrust him into that corner," he added to his men, who instantly obeyed his injunctions, and held down the prisoner so firmly that he could not move a limb. "Keep him there. I will question him presently."

"You may question me," replied Fawkes, sternly; "but you will obtain no answer."

"We shall see," returned Knevet.

Pursuing the search with Topcliffe, he counted thirty-six hogheads and casks of various sizes, all of which were afterward found to be filled with powder. Though prepared for this discovery, Knevet could not repress his horror at it, and gave vent to execrations against the prisoner, to which the other replied by a disdainful laugh. They then looked about, in the hope of finding some document or fragment of a letter, which might serve as a clue to the other parties connected with the fell design, but without success. Nothing was found except a pile of arms; but though they examined them, no name or cypher could be traced on any of the weapons.

"We will now examine the prisoner more narrowly," said Knevet.

This was accordingly done. On removing Guy Fawkes's doublet, a horse-hair shirt appeared, and underneath it, next his heart, suspended by a silken cord from his neck, was a small silver cross. When this was taken from him, Guy Fawkes could not repress a deep sigh.

"There is some secret attached to that cross," whispered Topcliffe, plucking Knevet's sleeve.

Upon this, the other held it to the light, while Topcliffe kept his eye fixed upon the prisoner, and observed that, in spite of all his efforts to preserve an unmoved demeanor, he was slightly agitated.

"Do you perceive anything?" he asked.

"Yes," replied Knevet, "there is a name. But the character is so small, I cannot decypher it."

"Let me look at it," said Topcliffe. "This is most important," he added, after gazing at it for a moment; "the words inscribed on it are, 'Viviana Radcliffe, Ordsall Hall.' You may remember that this young lady was examined a short time ago, on suspicion of being connected with some Popish plot against the state, and committed to the Tower, whence she escaped in a very extraordinary manner. This cross, found upon the prisoner, proves her connection with the present plot. Every effort must be used to discover her retreat."

Another deep sigh involuntarily broke from the breast of Guy Fawkes.

"You hear how deeply interested he is in the matter," observed Topcliffe, in a low tone. "This trinket will be of infinite service to us in future examinations, and may do more for us with this stubborn subject even than the rack itself."

"You are right," returned Knevet. "I will now convey him to Whitehall, and acquaint the Earl of Salisbury with his capture."

"Do so," replied Topcliffe. "I have a further duty to perform. Before morning I hope to net the whole of this wolfish pack."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Knevet. "Have you any knowledge of the others?"

Topcliffe smiled significantly.

"Time will show," he said. "But if you do not require me further I will leave you."

With this, he quitted the cellar, and joined the Earl of Mounteagle and Tresham, who were waiting for him outside at a little distance from the cellar. After a brief conference, it was arranged, in compliance with the Earl of Salisbury's wishes, that if they failed in entrapping the conspirators, nothing should be said about the matter. He then departed with Tresham. Their subsequent proceedings have already been related.

By Sir Thomas Knevet's directions, Guy Fawkes was now raised by two of the soldiers, and led out of the cellar. As he passed through the door, he uttered a deep groan.

"You groan for what you have done, villain," said one of the soldiers.

"On the contrary," rejoined Fawkes, sternly. "I groan for what I have not done."

He was then hurried along by his conductors, and conveyed through the great western gate, into the palace of Whitehall, where he was placed in a small room, the windows of which were strongly grated.

Before quitting him, Sir Thomas Knevet put several questions to him, but he maintained a stern and obstinate silence. Committing him to the custody of an officer of the guard, whom he enjoined to keep strict guard over him, as he valued his life, Knevet then went in search of the Earl of Salisbury.

The Secretary, who had not retired to rest, and was anxiously awaiting his arrival, was delighted with the success of the scheme. They were presently joined by Lord Mounteagle; and after a brief conference it was resolved to summon the Privy Council immediately, to rouse the King, and acquaint him with what had occurred, and interrogate the prisoner in his presence.

"Nothing will be obtained from him, I fear," said Knevet. "He is one of the most resolute and determined fellows I ever encountered."

And he then related the desperate attempt made by Fawkes in the vault to blow them all up.

"Whether he will speak or not, the King must see him," said Salisbury. As soon as Knevet was gone, the Earl observed to Mounteagle, "You had now better leave the palace. You must not appear further in this matter, except as we have arranged. Before morning, I trust we shall have the whole of the conspirators in our power, with damning proof of their guilt."

"By this time, my lord, they are in Tresham's hands," replied Mounteagle.

"If he fails, not a word must be said," observed Salisbury. "It must not be supposed we have moved in the matter. All great statesmen have contrived treasons, that they might afterwards discover them; and though I have not contrived this plot, I have known of its existence from the first, and could at any time have crushed it, had I been so minded. But that would not have answered my purpose. And I shall now use it as a pretext to crush the whole Catholic party, except those on whom, like yourself, I can confidently rely."

"Your lordship must admit that I have well seconded your efforts," observed Mounteagle.

"I do so," replied Salisbury, "and you will not find me ungrateful. Farewell! I hope soon to hear of our further success."

Mounteagle then took his departure, and Salisbury immediately caused all such members of the Privy Council as lodged in the palace to be aroused, desiring they might be informed that a terrible plot had been discovered, and a conspirator arrested. In a short time, the Duke of Lennox, the Earl of Marr, Lord Hume, the Earl of Southampton, Lord Henry Howard, Lord Mountjoy, Sir George Hume, and others, were assembled; and all eagerly inquired into the occasion of the sudden alarm.

Meanwhile, the Earl of Salisbury had himself repaired to the King's bedchamber, and acquainted him with what had happened. James immediately roused himself, and desired the chamberlain, who accompanied the Earl, to quit the presence.

"Will it be safe to interrogate the prisoner here?" he asked.

"I will take care your Majesty shall receive no injury," replied Salisbury, "and it is absolutely necessary you should examine him before he is committed to the Tower."

"Let him be brought before me, then, directly," said the King. "I am impatient to behold a wretch who has conceived so atrocious—so infernal a design against me and against my children. Hark'e, Salisbury, one caution I wish to observe. Let a captain of the guard with his drawn sword in his hand, place himself between me and the prisoner, and let two halberdiers stand beside him, and if the villain moves a step, bid them strike him dead. You understand?"

"Perfectly," replied Salisbury, bowing.

"In that case, you may take off his bonds—that is, if you think it prudent to do so—not otherwise," continued James. "I would not have the knave suppose he can awe me."

"Your Majesty's commands shall be fulfilled to the letter," returned the Earl.

"Lose no time, Salisbury," cried James, springing out of bed, and beginning to dress himself without the assistance of his chamberlain.

The Earl hastily retired, and ordered the attendants to repair to their royal master. He next proceeded to the chamber where Guy Fawkes was detained, and ordered him to be unbound, and brought before the King. When the prisoner heard this mandate, a slight smile crossed his countenance, but he instantly resumed his former stern composure. The smile, however, did not escape the notice of Salisbury, and he commanded the halberdiers to keep near to the prisoner, and if he made the slightest movement in the King's presence, instantly to despatch him.

Giving him some further directions, the Earl then led the way across a court, and entering another wing of the palace, ascended a flight of steps, and traversed a magnificent corridor. Guy Fawkes followed, attended by the guard. They had now reached the ante-chamber leading to the royal sleeping apartment, and Salisbury ascertained from the officers in attendance that all was in readiness. Motioning the guard to remain where they were, he entered the inner room alone, and found James seated on a chair of state near the bed, surrounded by his council—the Earl of Marr standing on his right hand and the Duke of Lennox on his left, all anxiously awaiting his arrival. Behind the king were stationed half-a-dozen halberdiers.

"The prisoner is without," said Salisbury. "Is it your Majesty's pleasure that he be admitted?"

"Ay, let him come in forthwith," replied James. "Stand by me, my lords. And do you, varlets, keep a wary eye upon him. There is no saying what he may attempt."

Salisbury then waved his hand. The door was thrown open, and an officer entered the room, followed by Guy Fawkes, who marched between two halberdiers. When within a couple of yards of the King the officer halted, and withdrew a little on the right, so as to allow full view of the prisoner, while he extended his sword between him and the King. Nothing could be more undaunted than the looks and demeanor of Fawkes. He strode firmly into the room, and, without making any reverence, folded his arms upon his breast, and looked sternly at James.

"A bold villain!" cried the King, as he regarded him with curiosity, not unmixed with alarm. "Who, and what are you, traitor?"

"A conspirator," replied Fawkes.

"That I know," rejoined James, sharply. "But how are you called?"

"John Johnson," answered Fawkes. "I am servant to Mr. Thomas Percy."

"That is false," cried Salisbury. "Take heed that you speak the truth, traitor, or the rack shall force it from you."

"The rack will force nothing from me," replied Fawkes, sternly; "neither will I answer any question asked by your lordship."

"Leave him to me, Salisbury—leave him to me," interposed James. "And it was your hellish design to blow us all up with gunpowder?" he demanded.

"It was," replied Fawkes.

"And how could you resolve to destroy so many persons, none of whom have injured you?" pursued James.

"Dangerous diseases require desperate remedies," replied Fawkes. "Milder means have been tried, but without effect. It was God's pleasure that this scheme, which was for the benefit of his holy religion, should not prosper, and therefore I do not repine at the result."

"And are you so blinded as to suppose that Heaven can approve the actions of him who raises his hand against the King—against the Lord's anointed?" cried James.

"He is no King who is excommunicated by the apostolic see," replied Fawkes.

"This to our face!" cried James, angrily. "Have you no remorse—no compunction for what you have done?"

"My sole regret is that I have failed," replied Fawkes.

"You will not speak thus confidently on the rack," said James.

"Try me," replied Fawkes.

"What purpose did you hope to accomplish by this atrocious design?" demanded the Earl of Marr.

"My main purpose was to blow back the beggarly Scots to their native mountains," returned Fawkes.

"This audacity surpasses belief," said James. "Mutius Senevola, when in the presence of Porcenna, was not more resolute. Hark 'e, villain, if I give you your life, will you disclose the names of your associates?"

"No," replied Fawkes.

"They shall be wrung from you," cried Salisbury.

Fawkes smiled contemptuously. "You know me not," he said.

"It is idle to interrogate him further," said James. "Let him be removed to the Tower."

"Be it so," returned Salisbury; "and when next your Majesty questions him, I trust it will be in the presence of his confederates."

"Despite the villain's horrible intent, I cannot help admiring his courage," observed James, in a low tone; "and were he as loyal as he is brave, he should always be near our person."

With this he waved his hand, and Guy Fawkes was led forth. He was detained, by the Earl of Salisbury's orders, till the morning—it being anticipated that before that time the other conspirators would be arrested. But as this was not the case, he was placed in a wherry, and conveyed, as before related, to the Tower.

THE FIRST DAILY LONDON NEWSPAPER.—The Londoners did not enjoy the luxury of a newspaper every day until the year 1709, in the reign of Queen Anne. One was then published, the title of which was the Daily Courant, which was issued every other day of the week but Sunday. At the time there were 17 others published thrice a week, and one twice. ## THE STORMY NIGHT.

Oh! 'tis a dark and stormy night—a night that bids us turn With grateful mirth unto the hearth where crackling faggots burn;

When e'er the whistling wind without, above the tempest's din,

The merry lay, with chorus gay, sounds jeyously within— And oh! 'twere meet in hour like this, when tempests round us sweep,

To pray "God speed those in their need, who sail upon the deep!"

For us, the bright and cheerful light yon ruddy blaze gives out, And unconfined from "vacant mind" the mirth-inspired shout;

While round us in each honest face and brightly beaming eye We read how vain the world's cold chain when those we love are nigh;

But dark—unlit by friendship's torch—the weary watch they keep,

Who look upon a clouded sky, and on a stormy deep.

E'en now, how many a gallant bark may struggle 'mid the roar Of giant waves, which urge to graves 'mid hidden rocks before:

And in the blast which now doth shake each casement's fragile pane,

How many a cry is borne on high beseeching help in vain. Alas! full many a cheek will blanch, full many an eye will weep,

Caused by the blight which such a night hath sent across the deep.

* * * * * Good night!—yet stay, before we part our closing chaunt shall be.

To breathe once more from those on shore kind thoughts to friends at sea,

Who many a stormy sea must brave, and many an angry blast, Ere home be near, and friends so dear be told of dangers past.

Good night! but ere the whistling wind hath lulled ye into sleep,

Oh! pray "God speed those in their need, who sail upon the deep."

SONNETS.

TO MARY HOWITT.

BY H. G. ADAMS.

Oh! thou, who singest of the clear blue streams,
Of verdant meadows, and of gushing springs,—
Lighting the woodlands with their silvery gleams;
Of butterflies, with rainbow-tinted wings;
Of trees, round which the fragrant woodbine clings.
Crowned with a coronal of golden beams;
Of birds, and flowers, and other country things,"
That toil-worn citizens behold in dreams:—
Who wakest all our kindly sympathies
With ballads quaint, and sweetly musical,
Of cottage-hearth, old manor-house, and hall,
And ships that wander on the stormy seas;—
Whose gentle thoughts, and pure moralities,
Upon the heart, like dew on folded flower-buds, fall.

Fain would I thank thee for the many hours
Of pure and calm delight, that I have spent,
Transported by thy strains to woodland bowers,
Where sorrow cometh not, nor discontent;
Listing the warblings of the song-birds, blent—
In one delicious harmony, while flowers
Sprang thickly round—the blue sky o'er me bent—
And trees upon me shed their fragrant showers:
Fain would I thank thee for the visions bright
Thy lays have conjured up, of happy vales,
And quiet nooks, and old men telling tales
To cottage children, laughing "in the light
Of their own loveliness," mid groves bedight
With blossoms, shedding perfume on the balmy gales.

INTERESTING ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERY.—It would appear from the following interesting paragraph from a German paper on the distance of the fixed stars, that unless the German philosopher has missed a figure or two in his calculations, a most important problem has been solved:

"M. Bessel, a German astronomer, has made one of the greatest discoveries of modern times, by having ascertained the parallax of the double star 61 Cygni. He found, from repeated observations, made from August, 1837 to March 1840, that the parallax of a Cygni did not exceed thirty-one hundredths of a second, which places the distance of that star from us at nearly 670,000 that of the sun, or which is nearly sixty-four millions of millions of miles, or, more nearly, 63,650,000,000,000 miles. This immense distance can better be conceived when we state, that if a cannon ball were to traverse this vast space at the rate of twenty miles a minute, it would occupy more than six millions of years in coming from that star to our earth; and if a body could be projected from our earth to 61 Cygni, at thirty miles an hour, which is about the same rate as carriages on railroads travel, it would occupy at least ninety-six millions of years. Light, which travels more than eleven millions of miles in a minute, would occupy about twelve years in coming from that star to our earth."

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—ITALY.—At the Teatro Reale Turin, Mad'le. Ermanno Frizzolini has created an immense furor in Bellini's Beatrice di Tenda. She is young and beautiful; her style is pure, her intonation perfect, her manner graceful, and her expression most womanishly touching.

A new opera by Nicolai has been most unequivocally rejected at the Teatro Agostino, Genoa. An opera by Donizetti called La Faustina has been played with but very little success. Mademoiselle Cerito is the main attraction at the Scala; she has lately received a carte blanche from the Académie Royale, Paris; but she is fully engaged until the 3d of 1842, alternating between England, Germany and Italy, at the end of which time she is expected to thaw the Neva, and fire the heart of the Emperor at St. Petersburg. Meyerhies Robert le Diable is playing at Florence, where it has made an immense sensation.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1841.

TO CLERGYMEN.—A copy of SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE, neatly bound, will be presented to any and every clergyman in the United States, who will send us the names of two subscribers to the New World—viz: $6 in advance. Surely, every minister can easily obtain, from among his parishioners, two names and thus supply himself with an elegant and valuable religious work.

THE QUARTO NEW WORLD.—The first number of this edition of the New World was issued on the sixth of June, 1840. Many subscriptions will expire on that date the present year. They should be immediately renewed; as it is an INVARIABLE rule with us never to send a single paper after the expiration of the period for which payment is made in advance.

OUR NEW VOLUME.—The third volume of the Quarto edition of the New World will commence the first week in July. It is now the time for new subscribers to send in their names. Let it be remembered that $5 a year in advance will procure two copies for a year or one copy for two years; and that six dollars sent in advance will procure the same number of copies together with a beautiful copy of SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE.

THE BOSTON NOTION AND THE NEW WORLD.—$5 sent in advance to George Roberts, Boston, or to J. Winchester, New-York, will procure a copy of each of these journals sent to any part of the country.

We shall hold ourselves particularly obliged to those who will forward us intelligence from any part of the United States. All near or distant correspondents who will give us news of importance regularly shall be furnished with the NEW WORLD or, if they prefer it, our daily paper—the EVENING SIGNAL—and further compensation if required.

EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMBOAT HENRY ECKFORD.—In reading the evidence given before the Coroner's Jury, called together by the death of Amos Belcher, caused by the explosion on board the above boat, we were led to notice particularly that of a witness who is a professor of the "theory" of the steam-engine and ranks high as a scientific gentleman, and is frequently summoned to examine into and give satisfactory reasons, to the public, for explosions of steam boilers, &c. Such evidence has been, heretofore, satisfactory and quieted the minds of a lenient community; but the evidence before us appears so far from the truth, and so at variance with all known practice that we are bound, as guardians of the lives of our citizens, to review his testimony, and leave it with the public to judge, if there is not something radically wrong in the theory or practice of steam power.

We are pained to make these remarks, but we have the good of the public in view, and our sympathies are with those who are, and must be, from necessity, the sufferers, so long as they are made to believe that 100lbs. of steam is no more dangerous than 6lbs., trusting implicitly in the theory, the application of which has been destructive to the lives of many valuable citizens, without producing the least evidence of its safety.

We will now take up the evidence abstractly, making our comments as we proceed. The witness says, "the low pressure engine, so called, condenses the steam. In the high pressure, the steam is not condensed. Those that are called low pressure are frequently driven by high steam." We are here made acquainted with the difference between high and low pressure—the one condenses and the other does not; but he wisely says, when speaking of low pressure, "so called." This can be viewed in no other light than deception in its worst form, because he knows full well that steam at ten pounds per square inch above the pressure of the atmosphere is no longer low pressure, and steam at 150 lbs. has been condensed; therefore, unless low steam is used in a condensing engine, it is no longer low pressure. We are sorry to say there are but few steamers left in our waters, which are really worked at a low pressure. A celebrated writer says, "Our boats are on the low pressure plan, but they carry from 16 to 25 inches of steam, and this is nothing more nor less than high steam. The shape of our boilers is not calculated to resist such a pressure, and some tremendous accident will sooner or later occur, to spread ruin and death among the crowds who venture themselves within their reach."

"If the boilers were equal in point of strength, I do not think there is any difference in the quantum of steam each might carry with perfect safety." This is theory indeed, most destructive in its consequences; and did we not possess practical talent with good common sense, to manage our steamboats, but few families would be left to say, "we mourn no relative destroyed by steam." Had the coroner summoned the engineers from our fine steamers to give evidence to the jury, they would one and all have repudiated the dangerous and destructive "theory" that 100 lbs. of steam is as safe as 40 lbs., and 40 lbs. as safe as 5 lbs. Practice has taught them that 15 lbs., or one atmosphere, will not explode, and never has exploded a boiler. It is true the legs of a boiler may be worn out and give way with that pressure, but this will do no harm, and never cause explosion. And they will truly add that a greater pressure of steam has caused the explosion and destruction of life, and a much less pressure, too, than "theory" says is perfectly safe. Again, "I have been employed in the testing of engines and do not think there was any carelessness." If there is a test which determines the security of engines, we earnestly desire the public should know it. We were not aware that "engines" were tested, except by use; and what the testing of "engines" has to do with the explosion of boilers, or what safety it would give to them, we cannot imagine.

Again, "I think  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch is the largest size made." We can inform him that Boiler-plate iron is now made in America  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch thick, and to any pattern ordered, and it is found to be superior to the English. "A boiler, if properly repaired, would last twelve years." We are willing to believe, and indeed know, that iron boilers, made of first quality iron, will, in fresh water, last 12 years. But every owner and engineer of a boat running out of New-York knows, and will testify, that such boilers will, (when used constantly,) require repairs in three or four years, and in six years are considered unsafe without thorough repairs; and although they may be used for years after, will require annual repairs, and must be run but with a light head of steam. It is true, boilers without flues will last much longer than those with, which is the reason these have been in use ten years; but this explanation is not given, therefore the natural inference would be that all iron boilers, high or low pressure, would, "if properly repaired," last 12 years. A dangerous and delusive "theory" this, and contrary to all practice! If persevered in by those having them in use, we shall be called on to record another and another destruction of life.

Again, "the flues are the weakest part of a boiler." Instances have occurred where flues have collapsed, but we have never heard of an instance where flues have exploded, and if we are rightly informed, they are (with the exception of the arch of the boilers) the strongest part—the legs or steam chimneys being invariably the first to give way. "I have heard the boilers and engines described by the witness, and should have deemed them safe for a boat of that size." What has the size of the boat to do with the safety of these "boilers and engines?" We must confess we desire information on this point, having heretofore supposed that "boilers and engines" were constructed suitable for a boat, and that their safety depended on good workmanship and management.

Again; "I should not like to use steam as high as 150 lbs. pressure. I think it is beyond a safe limit, but I do not think that a dangerous explosion would be likely to take place at 75 lbs." Why not safe at 150 lbs. if the boilers are sufficiently strong to bear that pressure? Should the boilers be much worn by use ("properly repaired") and an explosion take place with 75 lbs. of steam on, it would not be "dangerous?" Oh no! But if it exploded with 50 lbs. of steam, (as in the case of the Eckford, vide evidence of the engineer,) dreadful are its consequences: nearly every soul on board scalded or maimed, and the boat and machinery nearly destroyed. By the same rule, lessen the pressure and thereby increase the danger. We certainly know not by what rule or course of reasoning or practice he comes to such conclusions; but we do know that in every case where such "theory" is put into practice, and persevered in, its results have been dreadful. "I should think a boiler calculated for from 25 to 40 lbs. would be the safest that could be constructed, and the maximum of prudence I should deem to be about 100 lbs." We now have the sum and substance of the whole "theory" of steam—as 25 to 40 lbs. is the "safest" quantity of steam to run with; 75 lbs. would not produce a "dangerous explosion," and 100 lbs. is "the maximum of prudence." Fatal indeed are the lessons taught by this rule, and fearful its consequences—in proof of which we will enumerate a few cases which are familiar to many of us:

In twenty two explosions in our waters, one hundred and killed and thirty-two wounded, all caused by a greater pressure of steam than the boilers could sustain! But let us examine some of the evidence in the case of the New England, before a committee of scientific gentlemen.

Adam Hall examined—"am chief engineer of the West Point Foundry Association. Had not proved the boilers.

Think that the boilers should have borne 50 lbs. to the square inch."

Henry Waterman, Jr., Captain—"felt a little alarmed for the laboring of the engine in the heavy sea, with 12 or 15 inches. Usually works 14 or 18 inches when in full speed."

From further evidence it appears there were 26 inches of steam, and rising; and that at the time of the explosion, there could not have been 32 inches, as the mercury remained in two of the steam gauges, which would have been blown out, had it exceeded that quantity.

The "unanimous" opinion of the board of examiners is in these words—"That the explosion of the steamboat New England was caused by the pressure of steam, produced in the ordinary way, but accumulated to a degree of tension which the boilers were unable to sustain."

A very sage conclusion certainly! But here is an explosion which stripped the boilers completely, threw one overboard and the other end for end; rending new copper, three-eighths of an inch in thickness, like cloth; tore off the boat's guards; killed 15 persons and wounded 10 more. And we are told that "25 to 40 lbs. is the safest pressure, and 75 lbs. would not produce a dangerous explosion!" Furthermore, had Mr. Hall, the constructor of the boilers, told the engineer they could not prudently carry over 30 lbs. of steam, he never would have endangered the safety of the passengers.

From all the testimony obtained in relation to the twenty-three explosions named, it appears that most of them occurred with less than thirty inches of steam. Indeed, it is conceded by all our scientific gentlemen who have examined into the causes of such explosions, that there was a greater internal pressure than the boilers could sustain, and consequently they exploded. Hence the great danger of scientific gentlemen introducing a "theory" which, if adopted by proprietors, is almost inevitable destruction. The celebrated Engineer, Smeaton, says, "Care not about any theory at all. A man of experience does not require it. In my intercourse with mankind I have always found those who would thrust theory, into practical matters, at bottom to be men of no judgment, and pure quacks. In my own practice, almost every case would have required an independent theory of its own; theory and quackery go hand in hand." We leave the public to draw their own conclusions, believing that were we governed more by practice and less by theory we should be possessed of greater security.

STEAMER PRESIDENT.—The examination of Capt. Bowman, on Tuesday, before the British Consul did not elicit anything very definite or important. It appears that he (the Captain) saw on the 28th March, in Lon. 30.55 Lat. 41.40 the hull of a large ship about ten miles to windward of his own vessel; and that as the sea was running high, and the object discovered was dead to windward, he did not attempt to approach it. It appears, also, that Capt. Merry, one of the port-wardens, and Capt. Parkinson, master of a British vessel, both expressed the opinion that an attempt on the part of Capt. Bowman to reach the wreck would have been useless.

The failure of Capt. Bowman to make such attempt, however, as well as the justification of his conduct by the individuals referred to, strike us as altogether remarkable; especially the latter, which is very much in the same key as the certificates given after the explosion of a steamboat, that nobody was to blame.

In our judgment, a master of a vessel who discovers a wreck within ten miles of his own ship and does not expend at least 24 hours in an attempt to reach it, is recreant to his duty in every respect, and deserves the severest reprehension.

Why, we ask, would the attempt to reach the wreck have been useless? Is an object ten miles to windward, in the open sea, unapproachable? The approach, doubtless, requires some time and some trouble; the captain making the discovery must tack and beat and work to reach the object—but what are these considerations compared to the chance of rescuing our fellow-beings from a lingering death? If Capt. Bowman had had reason to suppose that his wife, his child, his parent or his brother was in that wreck, we fancy he would not have regarded the attempt to reach her as altogether "useless." We protest, most solemnly, against the inhumanity of this Captain Bowman, and the cold blooded certificate of captains Merry and Parkinson, that his conduct was justifiable under the circumstances.

¶ We find the following in the Commercial of Wednesday. How it is "the most conclusive that the Editors of that paper have seen," or how it is in any degree conclusive, we do not discover:

THE PRESIDENT.—The most conclusive evidence or intimation that we have yet seen, as to the fate of the steamship President, is contained in the following extract from the log-book of the packet-ship Utica, which we find in the Newark Daily Advertiser:

"Ship Utica, from Havre toward N. York, }
"March 15 or 16, (date obscure.) }

"At 10 30 A. M., fresh breezes from N. W., passed the wreck of a vessel's mast, spars and yards, (or mast and yards, for the word spars appears to have been partly erased,) with sails attached thereto, the mast-heads and yards being painted black. Supposed them to have belonged to an English vessel dismasted in the gale of the 12th, being in the same latitude and longitude in which the Utica lost many sails.

"Lat. 46 30 N., long. 41 35 W."

The gentleman who furnished the extract says—"The latitude and longitude give the position of the Utica on the 12th. Capt. Pell remarked at the time he passed the wreck that it did not appear to belong to an ordinary merchantman, having considerable chain work about the spars. The wreck was passed so near that they were obliged to luff to prevent the copper of the Utica being scratched. I may add that Capt. Pell, before leaving port, entertained serious apprehensions that the wreck was a portion of the steamship President.

In continuation of the same subject, we copy the following from the Baltimore Patriot; simply remarking that, in our judgment, neither the extract from the log-book nor the Southampton letter should be regarded as throwing any light on the question of the President's fate.

STEAM SHIP PRESIDENT.—We have information which leads us to hope that the steam ship President is safe, having gone into Madeira. A letter has been received by Mr. Howell, of Cumberland, Md., whose father was on board the President, from a relation of his who resides at Southampton, England, stating the fact of the arrival of the steamship at Maderia, and detailing how the news reached him.

Mrs. Power, the wife of Mr. Tyrone Power, the actor, who was a passenger, had agents stationed at points where information of the steamship would likely be received, and from one of those agents she received by express, a letter on the 19th ult., in which it was stated that a vessel had just arrived there from Madeira, which reported that as she was leaving the latter port the President was going in, and spoke her.

This letter was received by Mrs. Power on the 19th ult., and being read by the relation of Mr. Howell, who was present at the moment it was received, he immediately sat down and wrote the letter, referred to above. He despatched it by the post, and it reached the steamship Britannia in time to be brought on by that vessel, which left England on the 20th ult."

There is reason to hope that the next English steamer may bring further accounts; but we probably shall know nothing definite before such arrival.

STATE BANKRUPT LAW.

¶ The following memorial was sent to us for publication, by one who has nobly distinguished himself in the cause of philanthropy. It seems that an effort is to be made to procure the passage in our State Legislature of a Bankrupt Law, which shall afford that protection, that mercy, to citizens of New-York, which our wise Congress have denied to the citizens of the United States. We hope that the law will embrace a provision, exempting debtors who shall avail themselves of it, from arrest in other States by creditors of their own State.

We would here suggest that action on this subject should be immediate; there cannot be the least question that a vast majority of the citizens of New-York demand the passage of a law like that for which the petition prays.

TO THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK:

Your memorialists respectfully represent to your Honorable bodies

That the laws of the State of New-York do not afford that encouragement to honest industry that the moral and political welfare of the community requires. Misfortune is still as severely punished as crime. The loss of property by fire or any other casualty or misfortune, where the unfortunate man is in debt, carries with it an entire disability to use character or credit for future acquisitions; and thus the city and country are filled with the victims of the uncertainty of fortune, and bad laws.

An appeal has been made to Congress for the enactment of a bankrupt law that would relieve an honest unfortunate man from the disabilities of debts, which unforeseen events have rendered him unable to pay. Your honorable bodies joined in this appeal, and the Senate of the United States responded to the call; but from causes that could not be removed, it did not become a law, and the prospect of the favorable action of Congress is so remote as to induce the citizens of New-York to apply directly to their own representatives in the Legislature at Albany for such acts as may restore to the unfortunate their rights and privileges as free citizens of an enlightened republic.

The memorialists ask you to allow honest unfortunate insolvents the right to use their character for integrity, capacity and industry for the accumulation of property after they shall have faithfully surrendered, by assignment, all their property for the benefit of their creditors.

To render this object effectual, your memorialists pray that you will cause all the subsequently acquired property of the insolvent to be exempt from execution or any process of law by which it can be seized for the payment of any debt contracted prior to the assignment by such insolvent.

This will be humane, just and expedient. It will protect the honest, unfortunate man in the rewards of industry, as effectually as a bankrupt law, and will be subject from time to time to the action of the State Legislature.

That this remedy for existing and intolerable oppressive grievances will be Constitutional, we have the authority of innumerable decisions of the courts of nearly every state in the Union, for we believe there is no state that has not from some cause exempted certain portions of property from execution. Some have exempted a small amount of household furniture and apparel; others have allowed the debtor to reserve his real estate and slaves—and all have acted upon the conviction that public good requires such an interference by the Legislature for the protection of the citizens.

FOUR NEW STATES.—During the next Congress, the Territories of Iowa, Wisconsin, and the two Floridas, will probably ask for admission to the family of the American Union.

MR. POINSETT'S REPORT.—The late Secretary of War, like the Secretary of the Treasury, considered it his duty, in retiring from office, to publish in the Globe a statement of the condition in which he left the Department over which he had presided for the last four years.

This report purports to have been written for the information of Mr. Van Buren; but as that gentleman's term of office expired the day after it was written, it is not very plain what advantage he was to derive from it. However, as it is not our business to meddle with its object, we shall be content to give a summary of the facts it contains.

More than forty thousand Indians have been peacefully removed beyond the frontiers of the Western States, and the only exception to our universal peace is the contest with the Seminoles of Florida. Mr. Poinsett expresses the opinion that this war may be considered as virtually ended, but recent events in Florida prove such an opinion to be unfounded.

The arrearages due militia employed in the Florida war amount to $661,815; but all the claims on this sum will not, it is thought, be found valid. Mr. P. does not know whether the amounts appropriated for the purpose are sufficient to cover Indian arrearages or not. There is nothing due on pensions, and the unliquidated claims on the Department are thought not to be so great as they were four years since.

The army is in a high state of discipline, and is composed of 10,069 men. The expense for each person in the army in 1837 was $400 13, and in 1840, $375 96; showing a reduction of $24 19, or more than 6 per cent.

All the various departments and bureaus connected with the War Office are represented to be in excellent condition, and to be as well-regulated and efficient as possible. The gross amount of expenditures during the year 1840, were ten millions, being a reduction of more than eight millions from those of the four preceding years.

(Q.) We are surprised to see the Globe so very angry at the proceedings in the matter of McLeod. Judging from the leading article in that paper of Wednesday, one would suppose that the question of McLeod's guilt was not debatable; but that he ought to be summarily suspended by the neck, without regard to rights or consequences.

Now, for our own part, we are clearly of the opinion, and have more than once expressed it, that McLeod is innocent of the crime which he stands charged; and even if he were not, he ought not to be deprived of his life, all things considered. But, in any event, the indignation of the Globe seems out of place; for surely those who have been instrumental in bringing McLeod to New York for trial, as well as those who have approved the proceedings, have no ulterior and discreditable motives.

It appears to us extremely absurd to accuse the New York editors of all sorts of meanness and dishonesty for declaring themselves in favor of a course which promises equal justice, and does not in the remotest degree compromise national honor.

Indeed, a stranger, who should read the Globe's comments would be apt to infer—inasmuch as it is clearly charged—that the members of the Cabinet at Washington, in connexion with Gov. Seward and the New-York press, were systematically and deliberately conspiring to provide the means of escape for a convict of the most abandoned character. In our judgment, such a representation of the case, on the part of the Globe, is both unbecoming and disreputable. Their statement is absurd on its face; for it is, properly speaking, impossible that such a combination could exist for such a purpose.

But, after all, the article in the Globe is a fair specimen of the partizan warfare of the day. A political opponent is treated as an unmitigated villain without one redeeming quality; and the denunciation is carried so far beyond the truth, that nothing is produced but reaction.

FOUR LEGS.—All judiciously-built chairs—saving and excepting rocking-chairs—have four legs, and it may be assumed that they, also, have four feet, on which feet the superstructure was designed to stand. And it follows as a matter of fact, if not as a matter of course, that well-bred men will never impose upon the hind-feet the duty that belongs to the four. Nevertheless, Americans are very prone to lean back in their chairs, raise the fore-feet from the floor and put their own feet in their stead. Now this proceeding shows conclusively that these individuals belong to the genus loafer, and they must bear the discredit of it—but the evil does not stop here: for fashionable mahogany chairs are so constructed now-a-days, that they are very apt to break when so misused. We have seen, many a time, a complacent loafer balance himself on the hind-legs of his chair and suddenly break down, without the notion ever coming into his thick skull that he, and not the chair-maker, was in fault. The poor fool concluded that the chair was "cracked before," and tries and breaks down half a dozen more in the same manner. In behalf of house-keepers, we feel bound to say to these individuals that this habit of leaning back in a chair is an Americanism and a vulgarity, which all (otherwise) well-bred men should eschew.

From our own Correspondents.

WASHINGTON, May 8th, 1841.

The wise, just, and deliberate course of the Administration, in regard to removals and appointments, has exposed it to two fires—from opposite sides! There are on the one side, the Globe and its echoes, and these for whom they speak, with the cry of "Proscription! Proscription!"—whenever any officer is removed, however obnoxious he may have made himself by partisan interference, and though he may have been absolutely incompetent for the place. To make out a case, the official organ of the overwhelmed Dynasty publishes a list of the heads of Bureaus, and clerks in the Executive Departments here in 1829, marking those who were removed under General Jackson, and designating the Jackson men, and the opponents of "THE HERO," as he was familiarly styled by the Jackson papers. I was here during that REIGN OF TERROR, as the first year of General Jackson's term was properly called by the sufferers, and know that the list is exceedingly imperfect—and in many respects entirely false. It does not include the names of all who were removed; and for the purpose of giving the impression that the Whigs had a majority of the offices, it sets down as Whigs a large number of persons who were notorious brawlers for Jackson, and would not have been retained, had such not been their character. But even this list shows that in the first few months after the 4th of March, 1829, between forty and fifty Auditors, Comptrollers, Clerks, and other subordinates were dismissed!—about four times as many as have been removed by the present Cabinet in this city.

Certainly, under any circumstances, the clamor of "proscription" would come with an ill grace from the Globe people and their party, even if they could make out a case against President Tyler and his friends: for the Globe clique commenced a proscription which had never before been known under our free institutions. Their cries now are ridiculous: for there has been nothing like proscription here, and if it has occurred elsewhere, it has no sanction from the President or his Cabinet. Virginia, in the play, speaks of "a voice so fine that nothing lives betwixt it and silence." The reform, so far as the agents of government are concerned, is so fine, that little lives betwixt it and the old system of abuse. Many yet remain in office whom the necessity of reform will require to be dismissed; and who will, doubtless, be furnished with "walking papers" in due season.

PRESIDENT TYLER gave his first official dinner on Thursday last. There were present the members of the Cabinet, (except Mr. Webster and Mr. Crittenden, who are absent from the city) the Mayor of Washington, the Commander in Chief, the Adjutant General, the Senior Commodore in the Navy, MORRIS—COMMODORE WARRINGTON, and GENERAL JESSUP, two or three members of Congress, and a few gentlemen of the city—including every Whig editor. There were no ladies except those of the family.

WASHINGTON, May 11, 1841.

It is a valuable remark of a celebrated English professor* in a discourse on the American Revolution, that "men fail in the management of a dispute, whether as statesmen or individuals, chiefly because they do not enter into the views and feelings of those to whom they are opposed." What illustrations we would have of this fault, in the management of our relations with Great Britain, if those charged with the business would but adopt the councils of the Globe; or if they were animated by the spirit of the late officials who yet furnish its articles on our foreign policy. For more than a week has Mr. Van Buren's official journal been sending forth elaborate commonplaces in order to produce an impression that the General Government has submitted—is submitting—and will continue to submit to the British demands—that indeed the State Department has exhibited wonderful alacrity in this dishonorable course—and that, when our diplomatic negotiations are divulged, they will be found to be nothing short of a series of successive prostrations before the power of England!! These charges and insinuations, I need scarcely say, are wholly arbitrary. Not a single fact is presented to sustain them; and they have no support but in the vulgar declamation for which the Globe is notable. That journal calls it "pusillanimous" not to indulge in the coarseness and fury of its own manner and proceedings. What would be justly esteemed as overbearing and insolent would just come up to its notions of diplomatic dignity and international courtesy. It would probably like Mr. Webster to tell Mr. Fox that the English nation is "one with which no terms ought to be kept"—that it is a "hellish nation"—that "it protects and rewards murderers." To adopt any tone milder than this—to be merely firm and deliberate in purpose—wise and energetic—is "abasement of the United States before the British Lion." It must be somewhat mortifying to the Globe to find that its thunder on all these points excites little or no sensation in the country. There are probably not half a dozen sane men in the Union, who would reason, or who feel on these subjects with the violence intended to be produced by the language "of mighty sound" daily uttered by the organ of the Opposition.

Much solicitude is felt in Washington and the neighboring cities, for the fate of the Rev. Mr. Cookman, a learned and eloquent Clergyman of the Methodist church, who was a passenger in the President. For two or three sessions he has been Chaplain to the Senate, and was highly respected and beloved by a large circle of friends, as well as by the Members of Congress. He has left behind him a wife, and a large family of young children, whose situation will be truly deplorable, should he be lost. Mr. Cookman's object in visiting England, was to see an aged parent. On the Sabbath before he left us, he preached a most impressive sermon in the Representative's Hall, and took an affecting farewell of those for whom he had so long been accustomed to minister at the Capitol. The House was crowded in every part, and never did I see an assembly more deeply touched than by his chaste and pathetic eloquence. The prayers of thousands followed him on his voyage; and his numerous devoted friends and admirers here cling to the slightest circumstance that affords them any hope for his safety.

The President summoned a Cabinet Council to-day at * Professor Smythe, of the University of Cambridge.

twelve o'clock;—and they remained in session more than two hours.

Unless the pressure of visitors and applicants to the President is diminished, I should think he would be compelled to fly to some quiet nook for a few days, to prepare his Message to Congress. The Message, and the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury will be the great documents of next month. The Reports from the other Departments probably will not be long or elaborate, until the regular annual session, unless information on certain points is called for by Congress.

From Georgia.

AUGUSTA, May 7, 1841.

DEAR SIR: I have little or no news to write you; but lest you should think me utterly out of "the land of the living," I am fain to send you a few words to assure you I still jostle in an earthly tabernacle.

Business is prostrate, and, though on its back, is not looking up. Augusta is an uncommonly pretty city; and with its beautiful women, and its numerous trees and gardens, decorating, perfuming and shading every street, it would be a very charming place but that it needs business, with its Promethean fire, to put a little life into it. There are no amusements here save church-going, and the town is unmitigatedly dull.

Gen. Glascock, a lawyer of great eminence here, was thrown from his horse a few days ago, in the country, and so much injured that his life is despaired of. He was dragged some distance, with his foot entangled in the stirrup, and his head in collision with a rough road.

Before this reaches you, you will have heard of the cowardly murder of Gen. Read by the villain Willis Allston. Some incidents connected with and leading to this tragedy, may not be uninteresting to you.

A few years ago Mr. Read quitted his law studies, at Tallahassee, to avenge the aggressions of the Seminoles; and raising a company of volunteers, put himself at their head. With this corps he speedily fell upon the Indians, and in a number of skirmishes acquitted himself so gallantly, that this, aided by his tall, manly form and noble intellect, soon made him very popular with the whites. His promotion was as rapid as his exertions were brave and incessant, so that some time ago, he had risen to the rank of Brigadier General. He was the friend of Gov. Call, as the latter was professedly his; and though opposite in politics—the Governor being a Jackson and Union man—he had done much to serve him; but when put up for Congress, Call threw all his weight and influence against him, so that he was defeated by a small majority. This occasioned unusual acerbity of feeling between these men and their immediate friends; and in the excitement Gen. Read was insulted by one of his opponents, whereupon a challenge ensued and Gen. R. shot his opponent, wounding him severely, though not fatally.

Another duel grew out of Gov. Call's unfounded charges of cowardice against Gen. Clinch, then commanding in Florida. Notwithstanding those charges were triumphantly refuted by the certificates of the best informed and most impartial witnesses of Gen. Clinch's conduct, an individual acting under the influence of the Governor, reiterated the old libel through the press. This was replied to in an able article signed "Observer," published in the Chronicle, of this city, and the mendacity and contemptible character of the Governor's tool so justly served up, that that person, supposing Read to be the author, (though the General was then in Tallahassee,) fell upon him with much verbal abuse, and accused him of writing it. He denied any agency in the matter, and the other called him a liar; whereupon the Gen. challenged him, and the other agreed to meet him, but afterwards backed out. Then one of the Allstons, (a family of abandoned character,) swearing that if his friend would not fight, he would, challenged Read, boasting he would shoot him before (the signal) "he could turn round." The first shot of his opponent pierced the braggadocio to the heart. The ball was extracted by a sister of Allston, and it is said she swore, and induced Willis Allston and others, to swear, that they would not rest until they had killed Gen. Read with the same lead. Pursuant to his oath, Willis Allston sometime ago entered a public house where Gen. Read was dining, and approaching him unsuspectingly, discharged a pistol which took effect in his abdomen; he then fired another, which missed, he then attacked him with a bowie knife, wounding him in the same region, until his intended victim succeeded in getting at his pocket pistol, at which the cowardly ruffian fled, the General's shot piercing his hand just as he reached the door. The affair was allowed to blow over, and it was generally supposed that the malignity of the assassins was appeased, but by the last accounts from Tallahassee, we learn that nothing short of murder could content them. On the 23d ult., Willis Allston shot General Read through the body with a rifle, in the streets of Tallahassee, so that he died in fourteen hours in great agony. Allston is in jail awaiting examination. He is a monster of the darkest dye, and has committed many crimes—one of which is, going up to a poor drunken pious-wood's countrymen, who had given him no offence, and cutting his throat from behind! I trust there are moral feeling and courage enough in Tallahassee to give this fiend to the gallows.

Yours, &c.

W.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN SEAMAN'S FRIEND SOCIETY.—The thirteenth Anniversary of the Seaman's Friend Society was held at the Tabernacle last evening, the President Anson G. Phelps, Esq., being in the Chair.

The house was unusually well filled, and much interest was manifested in the objects of the Society, as developed by the different speakers. An abstract of the Report of the Corresponding Secretary was read, giving a summary of the operations of the parent society and its auxiliaries, and of the receipts and disbursements during the past year. The amount collected by the parent society was stated at $12,292, and by the auxiliaries at about $16,400. The disbursements have been made in the following manner: the Chapel at Havre has been built at an expense of $10,000; $5,380 have been expended for the purposes of the Society at Boston; $600 in Maine, and $500 by the New-York Female Bethel Society; making a total of $28,692.

collected and expended by the Society and its direct auxiliaries. By these not auxiliary, there have been raised and disbursed at New York $3,500, Philadelphia 1,500, Baltimore $1,000, Charleston $1,000, Savannah $200, New Bedford $1,000, Boston $500, and Salem $850; adding to this the sum appropriated by the American Bethel Society for the operations on the Western waters, stated at $5,000, we have the total amount raised and expended in the United States during the year, $14,242.

After reading the report, the Assembly was addressed by the Rev. Mr. Spaulding, Corresponding Secretary, upon the general objects of the society, and urging the necessity of more vigorous efforts than had hitherto been made. The Rev. Mr. Scott, Missionary at Stockholm followed, in some interesting remarks on the necessities of instruction of sailors who visited the ports of Sweden.

R. H. Dana, Jr., of Boston, author of "Two Years before the Mast," next delivered a polished and eloquent appeal on behalf of the sailor; presenting his hardships and privations vividly to the audience, and forcibly urging his claims to, and need of, the attention of the philanthropist of every denomination.

Additional remarks were made by Rev. Messrs. Baird Stillman and Bingham, after which a collection in furtherance of the designs of the society was taken up.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The sixteenth anniversary of this society was celebrated on Wednesday morning. The Report of the Treasurer presents the following summary:

The proceeds of the sale of publications to auxiliary societies were $24,880; societies not auxiliary and individuals, $32,620; donations, $11,378; from life directors, $7,371; from life members, $6,030; annual subscriptions, $16,981. Total, $98,962. The whole amount received has been expended as follows: Paid for paper, $17,860; printing, translating, &c., $15,759; folding, stitching and binding, $21,269; appropriations for foreign distributions, $25,000; services of various kinds, $5,169; secretaries, &c., $6,945; miscellaneous, about $5,000.

There are 1,162 auxiliary societies. Twenty-six new works have been issued during the year, making the whole number of publications 994. The whole number of publications printed during the year is 4,436,710, making 95,958,500 pages and 254,710 volumes. Total circulated during the year, 4,124,372 publications, or 80,581,565 pages, including 153,340 volumes. Total circulation since the formation of the society is 59,333,771 publications, including 1,598,150 volumes, making in all, 1,122,252,841 pages.

The gratuitous distribution during the year is 477 separate grants, including 1,261,696 for foreign mission stations, &c. amounts to 8,972,870 pages; the amount drawn by members and directors, 2,935,395—making a total value of $7,938 84. The receipts during the year amount to $98,962 59, of which $57,210 68 were for publications sold, $23,395 25 for foreign distribution.

AMERICAN HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The fifteenth annual report of the Treasurer of this society presented the following statement of its financial operations:

Balance in the Treasury on the 1st of May, 1840, $2,278. 51; received from Auxiliary Societies and Agents, $76,533.33; from Life Directors, $735; other donations, $8,140 01; total of receipts, $87,691 85, being $7,068 more than last year. The payments to Missionaries during the year amount to $2,959 83; payments for the Home Missionary and Pastors' Journal, $2,669 54; Missionary labors and Agents, $74,672 60; Salaries of Secretary and Assistant Treasurer, $4,568; total of disbursements, $84,964 06—leaving in the Treasury a balance of $2,827 79.

The number of Missionaries employed last year was 690, supplying 862 churches. The whole number added to their churches during the year is 4,613.

NEW YORK STATE COLONIZATION SOCIETY.—The ninth annual reports read at the anniversary of this society, presented a very favorable account of its condition and prospects. The Treasurer's report stated the total receipts of the past year at $10,266. The following expenditures have been made: For goods, &c. sent to Liberia $6,156 51; balance due the Treasurer, $951 31; office expenses, &c. $433 36; printing, &c. $752 73; repairs of ship Saluda, $560 00; salary of Cor. Secretary, $2,000 00; travelling expenses of same, $196 60; amount due by the Society at the end of the year, $2,049 19.

The report of the Managers gave an encouraging account of the colony at Liberia, cheering the Society on to renewed exertions in its philanthropic cause.

THE AMERICAN AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY held its celebration on Tuesday evening. Arthur Tappan presiding. This is the political branch of the Abolitionists. The operations of the Society during the past year, do not seem to have been very extensive, and all attempts to raise funds and to increase the circulation of the "Anti-Slavery Reporter," have been without much success. Addresses were made by Rev. J. Leavitt, J. G. Birney and others.

THE FOREIGN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY held its celebration on Tuesday. The receipts of this Society during the past year, amounted to above $14,000, while the disbursements amounted to but $9,000. Interesting addresses were made by Chancellor Frelinghuysen, Rev. Messrs. Kirk, Cheever, and others, from which it appears the prospects of this Society are very encouraging.

THE FEMALE MORAL REFORM SOCIETY met in the Spring street church. The report states $2000 to have been received during the year, all of which have been expended.

Thirty-six Auxiliary Societies have been formed during the year, and 4000 petitions have been sent to the Legislature. The Society never was in a more prosperous condition.

YOUNG MEN'S NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.—The report of the Secretary of the Young Men's Total Abstinence Society stated that since October, 1840, fourteen agents have been employed, who had delivered 400 lectures, obtained 11,000 total abstinence pledges, and established 47 societies. Receipts during the past year $460.

Literary Notices.

INTRODUCTION TO THE LITERATURE OF EUROPE in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries. By HENRY HALLAM, F.R.S. A. 2 vols., 8vo. Harper & Brothers.

Mr. Hallam is no ordinary writer. He grasps his subject, difficult or vast as it may be, with a hold that shows his complete mastery over it. There is nothing feeble, nothing obscure, nothing rashly assumed or inconsiderately asserted in his productions to indicate, as in those of less learned or less gifted writers, either a want of due examination, or incapacity to arrive at clear and definite conclusions; but every thing is forcible, plain, and consequential, powerfully reasoned, and strongly and distinctly stated, giving evidence of attainments at once profound and extensive, and of intellectual qualities of the rarest excellence. No writer of the present day, in the higher walks of literature, has been more justly admired or more extensively read, nor has any one exercised a larger or purer influence on public sentiment, or done more to extend the bounds of true philosophy and of sound learning. We cannot forbear, in connection with these remarks, to quote the closing paragraph of this his last and greatest work, as showing the toil it cost him and his modesty in estimating the value of his labors.

THE NESTORIANS, OR THE LOST TRIBES.—Containing Evidence of their Identity, an Account of their Manners, Customs and Ceremonies, together with Sketches of Travel in Ancient Assyria, Armenia, Media and Mesopotamia, and Illustrations of Scripture Prophecy.—By ASAHEL GRANT, M.D. Harper & Brothers.

The narrative part of this volume, giving an account of the author's travels, is very interesting, but far less so than his discussion of the question as to the identity of the Nestorians with the Lost Tribes of Israel. We believe that Dr. Grant is the first writer who has ever started this supposition; but we must say that he has brought forward an array of facts to substantiate his position, which appear to be entirely conclusive in its favor. That the facts he states have been hitherto unknown, is accounted for by the circumstance that that branch of the Nestorian family visited by him, had not before come under the observation of any traveller. They are completely isolated by their position among the mountain ranges they occupy. We have read Dr. Grant's book with a great deal of interest, and cannot doubt it will prove equally interesting to others.

MEMOIR OF THE VERY REV. THEOPHILUS MATTHEW, with an Account of the Rise and Progress of Temperance in Ireland: and the Evil Effects of Drunkenness Physiologically Explained.

This work has just been published by A. V. BLAKE, Fulton street. It is reputed to be a highly interesting volume; it gives an excellent memoir of the great Irish Apostle of Temperance, and displays the wonderful effects which have everywhere followed his itinerant exhortations. This book will not only gratify the curious, but it will afford to the advocates of a great cause new arguments for its support.

REVIEWS OF A PART OF PRESCOTT'S HISTORY OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA, AND OF CAMPBELL'S LECTURES ON GREEK POETRY.

Under this title C. S. Francis, 252 Broadway, offers for sale two able Reviews; the first, of that portion of Prescott's History of Ferdinand and Isabella, where a parallel is drawn between Elizabeth of England and Isabella of Spain; and the second, of Campbell's lectures on Greek Poetry—also containing a brief abstract of the Reception of Ulysses at the Phœacian Court, after having suffered shipwreck on their coast: From Homer's Odyssey, Book 6-13.

ANTHONY'S CLASSICAL DICTIONARY.—This profound and learned work—a work which displays more minute and extensive research, and more thorough scholarship, than any other ever published in the country—has, within the short time which has elapsed since its publication, reached a sale of nearly one thousand copies. That it will become standard throughout the literary world, and be universally adopted in American schools and colleges, if not in those of Great Britain, we entertain no manner of doubt. It is every way vastly superior to any edition of Lemprière. It has the high merit of being an original, not a translated work; it conveys facts in pure and idiomatic English instead of that bastard style, which marks even the best translations. Its publication adds to the great reputation of its intelligent publishers, HARPER AND BROTHERS.

EDWARD MOXON of London, the republisher of Mr. Dana's Two Years before the Mast, writes that the work has been received with great favor in London. A very cheap edition has been published and extensively sold. The Lords of the Admiralty ordered of Mr. Moxon five hundred copies of his handsome edition. Every American should read this book. It was published by the Harper's.

CAMPBELL'S LIFE OF PETRARCH.—We inquired, last week, whether any publishers were likely to issue this anxiously expected work. We on Thursday last received a letter from CAREY and HART of Philadelphia, informing us that it is in their press and nearly ready for publication. They received the early sheets from Mr. Colburn, the London publisher.

Latest Intelligence.

MITCHELL.—Officer Bowyer, who has had such a long chase after the ex-M. C., writes the following account of the arrest of that distinguished individual:

"I have at length succeeded in capturing his Honor, after a pretty long chase, (about twenty-six hundred miles,) and I think this time I have waked up the right passenger. He had been concealed at Point-au-Tremble, about ten miles from here. On attempting to arrest him, he leaped from the garret window and ran to the river St. Lawrence. Finding himself pursued, he plunged in. One of the officers called to him to stop, or he would fire. He then threw into the current a package containing, as he says, $2,700, and told the officer to fire, as he was ready to die.

"A canoe was then shoved off to him by a companion before he could be prevented, but he got a nice flogging for his trouble. Mitchell got into the canoe and crossed to an island in the river, but was soon arrested there.

I have taken every possible measure to recover the money, but can't say how it will turn out. I am now waiting the Governor's order for his removal.

I think it will turn out that this Mitchell got Ward's doubloons, as he exactly answers the description which the boy gave.

I wish you would let Mr. L. know that there was a man here who is supposed to have been concerned in the forgery. I know where he is now, but he will soon sail for England. He came from New Orleans just about the time of the forgery, and is full of gold. He is rather a small-sized man, bright eyes, hair grey, but dyed black. He has a lady and boy with him. I am informed at the house where I put up, that he changed some Cincinnati money. He surely has been concerned in some roguery, or he would not come here to go to England at this time of the year.

Captain Comeau, of the Police, also suspected him, and called on him; but he suddenly started off after the Captain left. He is an Englishman. I received a letter this day from a gentleman who is watching his movements for me."

The foregoing suggestion, that Mitchell is the man who swindled John Ward & Co. out of the doubloons is new, but perhaps not ill-founded.

Quere. What has become of Mitchell's "two contingent friends?"

MORE FORGERIES.—The Nashville Whig of the 30th ult. says—There were rumors in town yesterday of forgeries to the amount of six or seven thousand dollars in the Notes Discounted of the principal Bank of Tennessee. The spurious notes were manufactured in the adjoining counties of Wilson and Rutherford and sent in for discount last fall, with the forged recommendation, in pencil, of the county directors, who it was known by the parties engaged in the villainy would not be in attendance at the Board to detect the fraud. Other particulars we do not feel at liberty to go into, until the facts can be thoroughly sifted by the officers of the Bank.

PENNSYLVANIA.—The Relief Bill, which was passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature and vetoed by Gov. Porter, has been re-passed by the Legislature, two-thirds of each house voting in its favor, and is consequently now a law of the land.

"It provides, in the first place, for a loan of $3,100,000, redeemable in five years, and bearing an interest of 5 per cent. All the banks of the State, except four, which are not subject to a tax upon their dividends, are to subscribe to this loan in amounts proportioned to their respective capital; and these banks may pay for the loan thus taken, in $1, $2 and $5 notes; but not more than one fourth of the latter. The aggregate issue of small notes, or $1 and $2 notes, will be $2,325,000; and the banks issuing these notes are obliged to receive them for debts and on deposit; but the deposits are payable in the same description of currency, and the notes are redeemable, not in specie, but in State stock at par; and only then, when presented in sums of $100, or upwards."

ALABAMA.—The Legislature of Alabama has fixed upon the 15th inst. as the day for holding a special election for members of Congress. It has also extended the suspension of the State Bank and branches twelve months.

KENTUCKY.—The Congressional election in Kentucky has resulted in the choice of eleven Whigs and two Van Buren men. The delegation stands the same as in the last Congress.

INDIANA ELECTION.—Sufficient returns have been received from the Indiana Congressional election to render it probable that the Whigs have succeeded in carrying the entire delegation. In the last Congress the delegation stood, Whigs 3; Van Buren men 4.

VERMONT.—The Green Mountain boys elect every seventh year a Council of (thirteen) Censors to meet and inquire whether their Constitution has been violated, and also what amendments are desirable. They elected, this Spring, the entire Whig ticket. Whig vote about 5,500; Opposition 2,800; Abolition, 1,000.

A GREAT FRESHET.—We learn that immense damage has been sustained in Northern Mississippi by the heavy rains which have fallen there. All the low lands on the Yallobusha were entirely submerged, and at Columbus the river was about two miles wide. There had been no estimate of the extent of the losses sustained, but they were supposed to be very great on the plantations on that river and on all the other large water courses.

THE BOSTON ATHENÆUM now contains 31,768 volumes. The real estate, fine arts, building, &c., belonging to the Institution, are valued at $38,441; the paintings, busts, &c., $18,833; books at $52,103; and stocks and notes receivable at $28,083.

PENALTY OF AN ELOPEMENT.—A year since a letter was published from Montreal, announcing the elopement of Mrs. Harris, wife of Captain Harris, 24th regiment, with E. D. David, Esq., of Montreal, barrister, and Major in the Montreal Cavalry. On the 6th inst. the action commenced by Captain Harris against Mr. David was tried in Montreal, and resulted in a verdict for thirty thousand dollars damages.

According to the Nantucket Inquirer, there was imported into the United States, during the month of April, 1841, 19,952 barrels, or 628,488 gallons of sperm oil, and 37,056 barrels, or 1,167,264 gallons whale oil, by 21 ships, 3 barks, and 1 brig.

FOR LIBERIA.—The barque Union sailed from New Orleans on the 10th inst., for Liberia, taking out forty-two emigrants from Kentucky, Tennessee and New Orleans.

Dr. Dyott, who was recently pardoned by Gov. Porter, has been again arrested, on an indictment found against him in 1839.

The Niles (Mich.) Republican states that there are 35,000 barrels of Flour and Pork ready to be shipped eastward at the mouth of the St. Joseph's River—25,000 held by one firm. A steamboat leaves Niles daily.

FROM PERU.—A letter dated Callao, Feb. 18, and published in the Journal of Commerce, gives the following account of the domestic affairs of the Peruvians:

The anticipated political convulsion in Bolivia and Peru has taken place. Col. Vivanco has been proclaimed Supreme Chief in the departments of Cusco, Arequipa, Puno and Moquegua; and notwithstanding Gen. San Roman, who was placed in command of the former by Vivanco, has declared against him with 1000 men, yet he appears to be rapidly gaining ground, as the whole community is decidedly against the government of Gamarra, who has degraded the country to such an extent as to place it in the class of a Chilean colony, sustained by Chilean influence and Chilean control.

On the 21st ult., a general rising took place in Bolivia, headed by Genls. Lara and Iriogoyen, who have proclaimed Gen. Santa Cruz Supreme Protector. This officer was expected at Guayaquil about the 15th or 20th ult., where he was to hold himself in readiness to embark for Peru with a small force on the first favorable opportunity; and as such opportunity is now offered, we are momentarily expecting him in Peru. On his arrival, the downfall of this degraded government is inevitable. In fact, nothing prevents its immediate overthrow but the want of some officer of rank and influence under whom all parties would unite.

LATER FROM FLORIDA.—FLORIDA, May 1.—As I expected the rumor relative to the disappearance of Cosatusenuggee and 80 warriors from Tampa proves to be without foundation. The General has about 200 of the enemy ready for emigration. I have not learned when he purposes to embark them. You are aware that Coaceochee (Wild Cat) consented to emigrate, and had permission to be absent until the 5th of May, for the purpose of collecting his people. He has sent in eight of his warriors to the General to be retained as hostages, saying that circumstances have occurred to prevent his returning by the specified day, but that he will return, and in company with his people. We have (notwithstanding the favorable train events are now in,) every prospect of an active summer campaign. It is rumored, that in consequence of the Indian difficulties in the west, between the Choctaws and Kicapoos, that the 2d Regiment of Dragoons will be ordered west of the Mississippi.—[Savannah Georgian.]

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT.

David Agnew, to be Postmaster at Wheeling, Virginia.
Thomas J. Charlton, Collector of the Customs at Edenton, N. C., vice Robert M. Noxen.
Henry Curtis, Surveyor of the Revenue at Madisonville, La., vice W. Batterson, deceased.
Thomas Finley, to be Postmaster at Baltimore, Md.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Philo C. Fuller, of Michigan, to be Second Assistant Postmaster General.
John S. Skinner, of Maryland, to be Third Assistant Postmaster General.

POISONOUS CHEESE.—The New Orleans Bulletin says: "The public are already aware of the fact, that a short time since Mr. P. Bertus, of the 1st Municipality, on the representation of Dr. Puissean, had a great quantity of cheese seized on the Levee, which was supposed to be of a poisonous description. This examination took place from the circumstance that Mr. M. Blache and family, had been taken ill on eating some cheese of the same kind, which Dr. P. had declared to be tainted with the poison of hemlock. The cheeses however were returned to the owners, and now again Dr. Puissean has written to the Recorder, stating that thirteen persons are lying ill from the same cause. There is a rumor, too, of the death of one man."

In the last number of the Western Medical Journal, Dr. Graff of Illinois states that in some districts where the milk sickness prevails, people are found base enough to use the infected milk in making cheese, which is sent off to New Orleans and other places to be sold. It is but too likely that the cheese mentioned above is from a neighborhood where this mysterious disease prevails. What punishment would be appropriate for the wretches who would knowingly manufacture such an article?

MADAM RESTELL.—The Recorder admitted this woman to bail on Tuesday evening last—and the morning papers seem to put forth implied censure of his conduct. In our opinion, he did exactly what was right and just; we do not see how he could have done otherwise. Lohman, her reputed husband and Brainard both justified in the amount required by law—viz: 6,000 dollars each. The Recorder, however, refused to receive them. Whereupon, the amount of the recognizance—viz: 3,000 dollars, was deposited in cash in the hands of Madam Restell's counsel, A. L. Jordan, Esq., who deposited with the court his certificate to pay over the amount on the forfeiture of the bond given by Lohman and Brainard and the non-appearance at trial of the accused.

We do not see how any bail, more satisfactory than this could possibly be offered, and the Recorder would have been justly amenable to a charge of oppression had he refused it.

We are aware that it has not been the practice of judges to receive a deposit of money instead of a recognizance; but this objection seems manifestly unjust—it would be tyrannical in the case of a stranger—and Mr. Recorder Tallmadge deserves the warmest public approval for his independence and equitable decision in this matter.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRANDYWINE.—The U. S. Frigate Brandywine, Capt. Bolton, arrived at this port on Monday, thirty days from the coast of Gibraltar. It is said that this frigate returned to the United States in consequence of the threatening aspect of war with Great Britain, and in accordance with the advice of the American Minister at London.

AN Abolition Lecturer in Massachusetts the other day, was assailed with rotten eggs by some miscreant. He stood his ground manfully, and after all the ammunition was exhausted, he went on with his exercises. The next night he lectured again, but the opposition was not renewed.

THE following, which we have cut from a country newspaper, is a beautiful and touching specimen of poetical ability. It affects the heart and takes captive the understanding. It is, as a man may say, magnificent. Gross exaggeration could not be laid to the door of him, who should call it superb. It convinces while it delights. We recommend it to people who write elegies, as a model of the pathetic sublime. There is a moral to it—a useful lesson, which should be conned over and learned by heart. We know nothing, in the whole range of classic literature, superior to it, except perhaps those ever memorable stanzas from the luminous pen of the illustrious Lieut. G. W. Paten, U. S. Army, commencing with,

"The sun had gone down, with his battle stained eye."

ADVANTAGE OF TAKING A NEWSPAPER.

I knew two friends, as much alike
As e'er you saw two stumps;
And no phrenologist could find
A difference in their bumps.

One took the papers, and his life
Was happier than a king's;
His children all can read and write,
And talk of men and things.

The other took no papers, and
While strolling through the wood,
A tree fell down upon his crown,
And hurt him, as it should!!

Had he been reading of the news
At home, like neighbor Jim,
I'll bet a cent this accident
Would not befallen him.

GOOD MANAGEMENT.—The Newark Advertiser says that fifteen years ago a farm in western New York, of 400 acres, exhausted by bad husbandry, was bought by a Scotch farmer for $4000. This farm has been so improved by good husbandry that the owner was last year offered for it $40,000. He refused the offer on the ground that it had actually netted him the interest of over 60,000 dollars.

The New World.

A New Quarto Volume.

COMMENCING THE FIRST WEEK IN JULY.

The QUARTO form of the NEW WORLD contains sixteen three-column pages, elegantly printed, in a convenient form for binding, embellished with engravings and music. The Second Volume of the Quarto was commenced on the 1st of January, 1841; and new Volumes will begin on each 1st of January and 1st of July hereafter, making two volumes per year of 416 pages each, to which a title-page and index will be given, and which, when bound, will form a most valuable repository of the Periodical Literature of the day.

This is a Journal of Popular Literature, Criticism, Science and the Arts. It is supplied with articles by the first living writers of the United States and Great Britain. The first number was issued in June 1840, and its circulation has steadily increased to this day, till it counts more readers than any other newspaper of its kind in the world. This is owing to the fact of its having given to the public, for a sum merely nominal, and always in advance of any other print, the most popular works of the most approved authors.

A novel and striking feature of the New World is, that it has given, besides the great literary productions of the day, the discourses of eminent divines. In future these discourses will be presented even more frequently than heretofore; but not too often to interfere with other interesting articles.

In addition to all these new and popular works, these eloquent discourses, this comprehensive Journal has given the best poems and periodical papers which have appeared in the English and American Magazines. What has been done is an earnest of what will be done. The New World is divided into various departments, viz:—Original Articles; First American Editions; Periodical Literature; The Scrap Book; The Literary World; The Musical World; The Dramatic World; The Political World; The World of Science and Art; Patchwork; Latest Intelligence.

We cannot forbear to add in conclusion, that the New World studiously avoids all party politics; and is conducted on principles of the strictest morality. No profane or improper jest, no vulgar allusion, no irreligious sentiment, is allowed to soil its pages. Reverence of God and respect to man govern it always. The rule of the Editor is never to publish a line which he would hesitate to read aloud in the hearing of virtuous and intelligent females. Thus the New World is made an unexceptionable Family Newspaper, and is earnestly recommended to the regard of every friend of a pure literature, as well as of correct morals and the public good.

SEARS' PICTORIAL BIBLE.—To answer the thousands of inquiries, respecting this work, and to save ourselves the time and expense of answering numerous letters, constantly coming to hand, it is enough for us to say, that it is compiled from the "LONDON PICTORIAL BIBLE"—which sells here for something more than TWENTY DOLLARS per copy! This simple fact, alone, ought to satisfy ALL of the importance and value of such a volume; and no family that can possibly afford it, and in which veneration for the Sacred Writings is sedulously inculcated, should be without it. It is calculated to interest the child, and to instruct the philosopher. The "REFLECTIONS ON ANCIENT RUINS," is a pure fountain of eloquence, combining an extent of reading, with a critical acumen. The style of the writer is clear where elucidation is required, graphic in description, and animated when the holy recollections inspired by his theme prompt and warrant a tempered enthusiasm.

Slight reflection will serve to show how valuable a knowledge of the natural features and customs of the HOLY LAND must be to the student of the Bible, as well as the general reader. True, many works have been published to supply this desideratum; but none, we believe, has ever yet appeared in this country, equal to what may be expected in this series—certainly, no book ever issued here, has passed through SEVEN EDITIONS OF TWO THOUSAND EACH, in as many months! Many of the engravings represents actual history, with "fanciful sketches;" and as a whole they are good specimens of the Art of Wood Engraving, nearly as perfect as has yet been attained in this country.

ADDRESS

TO THE ALABASTER SARCOPHAGUS, DEPOSITED IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

BY HOZACE SMITH, Esq.

THOU Alabaster relic! while I hold
My hand upon thy sculptured margin thrown,
Let me recall the scenes thou couldst unfold,
Might'st thou relate the changes thou hast known;
For thou wert primitive in thy formation,
Launched from the Almighty's hand at the creation.

Yes—thou wert present when the stars and skies
And worlds unnumbered rolled into their places;
When God, from Chaos, bade the spheres arise,
And fixed the blazing sun upon its basis,
And with his finger on the bounds of space
Marked out each planet's everlasting race.

How many thousand ages from thy birth
Thou slept'st in darkness it were vain to ask,
Till Egypt's sons upheaved thee from the earth,
And year by year pursued their patient task,
Till thou wert carved and decorated thus,
Worthy to be a king's sarcophagus!

What time Elijah to the skies ascended,
Or David reigned in holy Palestine,
Some ancient Theban monarch was extended
Beneath the lid of this emblazoned shrine,
And to that subterranean palace borne
Which toiling ages in the rock had worn.

Thebes, from her hundred portals filled the plain,
To see the car on which thou wert upheld.

What funeral pomp extended in thy train,
What banners waved, what mighty music swelled,
As armies, priests, and crowds bewailed in chorus,
Their King—their God—their Serapis—their Orus!

Thus to thy second quarry did they trust
Thee, and the lord of all the nations round,
Grim king of silence! Monarch of the dust!
Embalmed, anointed, jewelled, sceptered, crowned,
Here did he lie in state, cold, stiff and stark,
A leathern Pharaoh grinning in the dark.

Thus ages rolled; but their dissolving breath
Could only blacken that imprisoned thing,
Which wore a ghastly royalty in death,
As if it struggled still to be a king;
And each dissolving century, like the last,
Just dropped its dust upon thy lid, and passed.

The Persian conqueror o'er Egypt poured
His devastating host—a motley crew;
The steel-clad horseman—the barbarian horde,
Music and men of every sound and hue,
Priests, archers, eunuchs, concubines, and brutes—
Gongs, trumpets, cymbals, dulcimers, and lutes.

Then did the fierce Cambyzes tear away
The ponderous rock that sealed the sacred tomb;
Then did the slowly penetrating ray
Redeem thee from long centuries of gloom,
And lowered torches flashed against thy side,
As Asia's king thy blazoned trophies eyed.

Plucked from his grave with sacrilegious taint,
The features of the royal corpse they scanned;
Dashing the diadem from his temple gaunt,
They tore the sceptre from his graspless hand;
And on those fields, where once his will was law,
Left him for winds to waste and beasts to gnaw.

Some pious Thebans, when the storm was past,
Upclosed the sepulchre with cunning skill,
And nature, aiding their devotion, cast
Over its entrance a concealing rill;
Then thy third darkness came, and thou didst sleep
Twenty-three centuries in silence deep.

But he from whom nor pyramids nor sphynx
Can hide its secrecies, Belzoni came;
From the tomb's mouth unloosed the granite links,
Gave thee again to light, and life, and fame,
And brought thee from the sands and deserts forth,
To charm the pallid children of the North!

Thou art in London, which, when thou wert new,
Was what Thebes is, a wilderness and waste,
Where savage beasts more savage men pursue;
A scene by nature cursed—by man disgraced.
Now—'tis the world's metropolis!—The high
Queen of arms, learning, arts and luxury!

Here, where I hold my hand, 'tis strange to think
What other hands, perchance, preceded mine;

Others have also stood beside thy brink,
And vainly coned the moralizing line!
Kings, sages, chiefs, that touched this stone like me,
Where are ye now?—Where all must shortly be.

All is mutation;—he within this stone
Was once the greatest monarch of the hour.
His bones are dust—his very name unknown!—
Go, learn from him the vanity of power;
Seek not the frame's corruption to control,
But build a lasting mansion for thy soul.

THE GOBLET.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF TIECK.

BY THOMAS CARLYLE,

Author of Sartor Resartus, &amp;c., &amp;c.

The forenoon bells were sounding from the high cathedral. Over the wide square in front of it were men and women walking to and fro, carriages rolling along, and priests proceeding to their various churches. Ferdinand was standing on the broad stair, with his eyes over the multitude, looking at them as they came up to attend the service. The sunshine glittered on the white stones; all were seeking shelter from the heat. He alone had stood for a long time leaning on a pillar, amid the burning beams, without regarding them; for he was lost in the remembrances which mounted up within his mind. He was calling back his bygone life, and inspiring his soul with the feeling which had penetrated all his being, and swallowed up every other wish in itself. At the same hour, in the past year, had he been standing here, looking at the women and the maidens coming to mass; with indifferent heart, and smiling face, he had viewed the variegated procession; many a kind look had roguishly met his, and many a virgin cheek had blushed; his busy eye had observed the pretty feet, as they mounted the steps, and how the wavering robe fell more or less aside, to let the dainty little ancles come to sight.

Then a youthful form had crossed the square; clad in black; slender, and of noble mien, her eyes modestly cast down before her, carelessly she hovered up the steps with lovely grace; the silken robe lay round that fairest of forms, and rocked itself as in music about the moving limbs; she was mounting the highest step, when by chance she raised her head, and struck his eye with a ray of the purest azure. He was pierced as if by lightning. Her foot caught the robe; and quickly as he darted toward her, he could not prevent her having, for a moment, in the most charming posture, lain kneeling at his feet. He raised her; she did not look at him, she was all one blush; nor did she answer his inquiry whether she was hurt. He followed her into the church; his soul saw nothing but the image of that form kneeling before him, and that loveliest of bosoms bent toward him. Next day he visited the threshold of the church again; for him that spot was consecrated ground. He had been intending to pursue his travels, his friends were expecting him impatiently at home; but from henceforth his native country was here, his heart and its wishes were inverted. He saw her often, she did not shun him; yet it was but for a few separate and stolen moments; for her wealthy family observed her strictly, and still more a powerful and jealous bridegroom. They mutually confessed their love, but knew not what to do; for he was a stranger, and could offer his beloved no such splendid fortune as she was entitled to expect. He now felt his poverty; yet when he reflected on his former way of life, it seemed to him that he was passing rich; for his existence was rendered holy, his heart floated forever in the fairest emotion; Nature was now become his friend, and her beauty lay revealed to him; he felt himself no longer alien from worship and religion; and he now crossed this threshold, and the mysterious dimness of the temple, with far other feelings than in former days of levity. He withdrew from his acquaintances, and lived only to love. When he walked through her street, and saw her at the window, he was happy for the day. He had often spoken to her in the dusk of the evening; her garden was adjacent to a friend's, who, however, did not know his secret. Thus a year had passed away.

All these scenes of his new existence again moved through his remembrance. He raised his eyes; that noble form was even then gliding over the square; she shone out of the confused multitude like a sun. A lovely music sounded in his longing heart; and as she approached, he retired into the church. He offered her the holy water; her white fingers trembled as they touched his, she bowed with grateful kindness. He followed her, and knelt down near her. His whole heart was melting in sadness and love; it seemed to him as if, from the wounds of longing, his being were bleeding away in fervent prayers; every word of the priest went through him, every tone of the music poured new devotion into his bosom; his lips quivered, as the fair maiden pressed the crucifix of her rosary to her ruby mouth. How dim had been his apprehension of this Faith and this Love before! The priest elevated the Host, and the bell sounded; she bowed more humbly, and crossed her breast; and, like a flash, it struck through all his powers and feelings, and the image on the altar seemed alive, and the colored dimness of the windows as a light of paradise; tears flowed fast from his eyes, and allayed the swelling fervor of his heart.

The service was concluded. He again offered her the consecrated font; they spoke some words, and she withdrew. He staid behind, in order to excite no notice; he looked after her till the hem of her garment vanished round the corner; and he felt like the wanderer, weary and astray, from whom, in the thick forest, the last gleam of the setting sun departs. He awoke from his dream, as an old withered hand slapped him on the shoulder, and some one called him by name.

He started back, and recognized his friend, the teaty old Albert, who lived apart from men, and whose house was open to Ferdinand alone.

"Do you remember our engagement?" said the hoarse, husky voice.

"O, yes," said Ferdinand. "And will you perform your promise to-day?"

"This very hour," replied the other, "if you like to follow me."

They walked through the city to a remote street, and there entered a large edifice. "To-day," said the old man, "you must push through with me into my most solitary chamber, that we may not be disturbed." They passed through many rooms, then along some stairs; they wound their way through passages; and Ferdinand, who had thought himself familiar with the house, was now astonished at the multitude of apartments, and the singular arrangements of the spacious building; but still more that the old man, a bachelor, and without family, should inhabit it by himself, with a few servants, and never let out any part of the superfluous room to strangers. Albert at length unbolted a door, and said: "Now, here is the place." They entered a large, high chamber, hung round with red damask, which was trimmed with golden listings; the chairs were of the same stuff; and, through heavy red silk curtains covering the windows, came a purple light. "Wait a little," said the old man, and went into another room. Ferdinand took up some books; he found them to contain strange, unintelligible characters, circles, and lines, with many curious plates; and from the little he could read, they seemed to be works on alchemy; he was aware already that the old man had the reputation of a gold-maker. A lute was lying on the table, singularly overlaid with mother-of-pearl, and colored wood; and representing birds and flowers in very splendid forms. The star in the middle was a large piece mother-of-pearl, worked in the most skilful manner into many interesting circular figures, almost like the centre of a window in a Gothic church. "You are looking at my instrument," said Albert, coming back; "it is two hundred years old: I brought it with me as a memorial of my journey into Spain. But let us leave all that, and do you take a seat."

They sat down beside the table, which was likewise covered with a red cloth; and the old man placed upon it something which was carefully wrapped up. "From pity to your youth," he began, "I promised lately to predict to you whether you could ever become happy or not; and this promise I will in the present hour perform, though you hold the matter as only a jest. You need not be alarmed, for what I purpose will take place without danger; no dread invocations shall be made by me, nor shall any hurried apparition terrify your senses. The business I am on may fail in two ways; either if you do not love so truly as you have been willing to persuade me; for then my labor is in vain, and nothing will disclose itself; or, if you shall disturb the oracle and destroy it by a useless question, or a hasty movement, should you leave your seat and dissipate the figure; you must therefore promise me to keep yourself quite still."

Ferdinand gave his word, and the old man unfolded from its cloths the packet he had placed on the table. It was a golden goblet, of very skilful and beautiful workmanship. Round its broad foot ran a garland of flowers, intertwined with myrtles, and various other leaves and fruits, worked out in high chasing with dim and with brilliant gold. A corresponding ring, but still richer, with figures of children, and wild little animals playing with them, or flying from them, wound itself about the middle of the cup. The bowl was beautifully turned; it bent itself back at the top as if to meet the lips; and within, the gold sparkled with a red glow. Old Albert placed the cup between him and the youth, whom he then beckoned to come nearer. "Do you not feel something," said he, "when your eye loses itself in this splendor?"

"Yes," answered Ferdinand, "this brightness glances into my inmost heart; I might almost say I felt it like a kiss in my longing bosom."

"It is right, then!" said the old man. "Now let not your eyes wander any more, but fix them steadfastly on the glittering of this gold, and think as intently as you can of the woman whom you love."

Both sat quietly for a while, looking earnestly upon the gleaming cup. Ere long, however, Albert, with mute gestures, began, at first slowly, then faster, and at last in rapid movements, to whirl his outstretched finger in a constant circle round the glitter of the bowl. Then he paused, and recommenced his circles in the opposite direction. After this had lasted for a little, Ferdinand began to think he heard the sound of music; it came as from without, in some distant street, but soon the tones approached, they quivered more distinctly through the air; and at last no doubt remained with him that they were flowing from the hollow of the cup. The music became stronger, and of such piercing power, that the young man's heart was throbbing to the notes, and tears were flowing from his eyes. Busily old Albert's hand now moved in various lines across the mouth of the goblet; and it seemed as if sparks were issuing from his fingers, and darting in forked courses to the gold, and tinkling as they met it. The glittering points increased; and followed, as if strung on threads, the movements of his finger to and fro; they shone with various hues, and crowded more and more together till they joined in unbroken lines. And now it seemed as if the old man, in the red dusk, were stretching a wondrous net over the gleaming gold; for he drew the beams this way and that at pleasure, and wove up with them the opening of the bowl; they obeyed him, and remained there like a cover, wavering to and fro, and playing into one another. Having so fixed them, he again described the circle round the rim; the music then moved off, grew fainter and fainter, and at last died away. While the tones departed, the sparkling net quivered to and fro as in pain. In its increasing agitation it broke in pieces; and the beaming threads rained down in drops into the cup; but as the drops fell, there arose from them a ruddy cloud, which moved within itself in manifold eddies, and mounted over the brim like foam. A bright point darted with exceeding swiftness through the cloudy circle, and began to form the image in the midst of it. On a sudden there looked out from the vapor as it were an eye; over this came a playing and curling as of golden locks; and soon there went a soft blush up and down the shadow, and Ferdinand beheld the shining face of his beloved, the blue eyes, the tender cheeks, the fair red mouth. The head waved to and fro, rose clearer and more visible upon the slim white neck, and nodded toward the enraptured youth. Old Albert still kept casting circles round the cup; and out of it emerged the glancing shoulders; and as the fair form mounted more and more from its golden couch, and bent in lovely kindness this way and that, the soft, curved, parted breasts appeared, and on their summits two loveliest rose-buds glancing with sweet, secret red. Ferdinand fancied he felt the breath, as the beloved form bent waving towards him, and almost touched him with its glowing lips; in his rapture he forgot his promise and himself; he started up and clasped that ruddy mouth to him with a kiss, and meant to seize those lovely arms, and lift the enrapturing form from its golden prison. Instantly a violent trembling quivered through the lovely shape; the head and body broke away as in a thousand lines; and a rose was laying at the bottom of the goblet, in whose redness that sweet smile still seemed to play. The longing young man caught it and pressed it to his lips; and in his burning ardor it withered and melted into air.

"Thou hast kept thy promise badly," said the old man, with an angry tone; "thou hast none but thyself to blame." He again wrapped up the goblet, drew aside the curtains, and opened a window; the clear daylight broke in; and Ferdinand, in sadness, and with many fruitless excuses, left old Albert still in anger.

In an agitated mood, he hastened through the streets of the city. Without the gate, he sat down beneath the trees. She had told him in the morning that she was to go that night with some relations to the country. Intoxicated with love, he rose, he sat, he wandered in the wood; that fair, kind form was still before him, as it flowed and mounted from the glowing gold; he looked that she would now step forth to meet him in the splendor of her beauty, and again that loveliest image broke away in pieces before his eyes; and he was indignant at himself, that, by his restless passion and the tumult of his senses, he should have destroyed the shape, and perhaps his hopes, forever.

As the walk in the afternoon became crowded, he withdrew deeper into the thickets; but he still kept the distant highway in his eye; and every coach that issued from the gate was carefully examined by him.

The night approached. The setting sun was throwing forth its red splendor, when from the gate rushed out the richly gilded coach, gleaming with a fiery brightness in the glow of evening. He hastened toward it. Her eye had already seized him. Kindly and smilingly she leaned her glittering bosom from the window; he caught her soft salutation and signal; he was standing by the coach, her full look fell on his, and as she drew back to move away, the rose which had adorned her bosom flew out and lay at his feet. He lifted it up, and kissed it; and he felt as if it presaged to him that he should not see his loved one any more, that now his happiness had faded away from him for ever.

Hurried steps were passing up stairs and down; the whole house was in commotion; all was bustle and tumult, preparing for the great festivities of the morrow. The mother was the gladdest and most active; the bride heeded nothing, but retired into her chamber to meditate upon her changing destiny. The family were still looking for their elder son, the captain, with his wife; and for two elder daughters, with their husbands; Leopold, the younger, was maliciously busy in increasing the disorder, and deepening the tumult; perplexing all, while he pretended to be furthering it. Agatha, his still unmarried sister, was in vain endeavoring to make him reasonable, and to persuade him simply to do nothing, and to let the rest have peace; but her mother said: "Never mind him and his folly; for to-day a little more or less of it amounts to nothing; only this I beg of one and all of you, that, as I have so much to think about already, you would trouble me with no fresh tidings, unless it be of something that especially concerns us. I care not whether any one have let some china fall, whether one spoon or two spoons are wanting, whether any of the stranger servants have been breaking windows; with all such freaks as these I beg you would not vex me by recounting them. Were these days of tumult over, we will reckon matters; not till then."

"Bravely spoken, mother!" cried her son; "these sentiments are worthy of a governor. And if it chance that any of the maids should break her neck; the cook get tipsy, or set the chimney on fire; the butler, for joy, let all the malmsey run upon the floor, or down his throat, you shall not hear a word of such small tricks. If, indeed, an earthquake were to upset the house! That, my dear mother, could not be kept secret."

"When will he leave his folly!" said the mother. "What must thy sisters think, when they find thee every jot as riotous as when they left thee two years ago?"

"They must do justice to my force of character," said Leopold; "and grant that I am not so changeable as they or their husbands, who have altered so much within these few years, and so little to their advantage."

The bridegroom now entered, and inquired for the bride. Her maid was sent to call her. "Has Leopold made my request to you, my dear mother?" said he.

"I did, forsooth," said Leopold. "There is such confusion here among us, not one of them can think a reasonable thought."

The bride entered, and the young pair joyfully saluted one another. "The request I meant," continued the bridegroom, "is this; that you would not take it ill, if I should bring another guest into your house, which, in truth, is full enough already."

"You are aware yourself," replied the mother, "that, extensive as it is, I could scarcely find another chamber."

"Notwithstanding, I have partly managed it already," cried Leopold; "I have had the large apartment furnished up."

"Why, that is quite a miserable place," replied the mother; "for many years it has been nothing but a lumber-room."

"But it is splendidly repaired," said Leopold; "and our friend, for whom it is intended, does not mind such matters; he desires nothing but our love. Besides, he has no wife, and likes to be alone; it is the very place for him. We have had enough of trouble in persuading him to come, and show himself again among his fellow creatures."

"Not your dismal conjuror and gold-maker, certainly?" cried Agatha.

"No other," said the bridegroom, "if you will still call him so."

"Then do not let him, mother," said the sister. "What should a man like that do here? I have seen him on the street with Leopold, and I was positively frightened at his face. The old sinner, too, almost never goes to church; he loves neither God nor man; and it cannot come to good to bring such infidels under the roof, on a solemnity like this. Who knows what may be the consequence?"

"To hear her talk!" said Leopold, in anger. "Thou condemnest without knowing him; and because the cut of his nose does not please thee, and he is no longer young and handsome, thou concludest him a wizard, and a servant of the Devil."

"Grant a place in your house, dear mother," said the bridegroom, "to our old friend, and let him take part in our general joy. He seems, my dear Agatha, to have endured much suffering, which has rendered him distrustful and misanthropic; he avoids all society, his only exceptions are Leopold and myself. I owe him much; it was he that first gave my mind a good direction; nay, I may say, it is he alone that has rendered me perhaps worthy of my Julia's love."

"He lends me all his books," continued Leopold; "and, what is more, his old manuscripts; and what is more still, his money, on my bare word. He is a man of the most Christian turn, my little sister. And who knows, when thou hast seen him better, whether thou wilt not throw off thy coyness, and take a fancy to him, ugly as he now appears to thee?"

"Well, bring him to us," said the mother; "I have had to hear so much of him from Leopold already, that I have a curiosity to be acquainted with him. Only you must answer for it, that I cannot lodge him better."

Meantime, strangers were announced. They were members of the family, the married daughters, and the officer; they had brought their children with them. The good old lady was delighted to behold her grandsons; all was welcoming, and joyful talk; and Leopold and the bridegroom, having also given and received their greetings, went away to seek their ancient, melancholic friend.

The latter lived most part of the year in the country, about a league from town; but he also kept a little dwelling for himself in a garden near the gate. Here, by chance, the young men had become acquainted with him. They now found him in a coffee-house, where they had previously agreed to meet. As the evening had come on, they brought him, after some little conversation, directly to the house.

The stranger met a kindly welcome from the mother; the daughters stood a little more aloof from him. Agatha especially was shy, and carefully avoided his looks. But the first general compliments were scarcely over, when the old man's eye appeared to settle on the bride, who had entered the apartment later; he seemed as if transported, and it was observed that he was struggling to conceal a tear. The bridegroom rejoiced in his joy, and happening sometime after to be standing with him by a side at the window, he took his hand, and asked him: "Now, what think you of my lovely Julia? Is she not an angel?"

"O, my friend!" replied the old man, with emotion, "such grace and beauty I have never seen; or rather, I should say (for that expression was not just), she is so fair, so ravishing, so heavenly, that I feel as if I had long known her, as if she were to me, utter stranger though she is, the most familiar form of my imagination, some shape which had always been an inmate of my heart."

"I understand you," said the young man; "yes, the truly beautiful, the great, and sublime, when it overpowers us with astonishment and admiration, still does not surprise us as a thing foreign, never heard of, never seen; but, on the other hand, our own inmost nature in such moments becomes clear to us, our deepest remembrances are awakened, our dearest feelings made alive."

The stranger, during supper, mixed but little in the conversation; his looks were fixed on the bride, so earnestly and constantly, that she at last became embarrassed and alarmed. The captain told of a campaign which he had served in; the rich merchant of his speculations and the bad times; the country gentleman of the improvements which he meant to make in his estate.

Supper being done, the bridegroom took his leave, returning for the last time to his lonely chamber; for in future it was settled that the married pair were to live in the mother's house; their chambers were already furnished.

The company dispersed, and Leopold conducted the stranger to his room. "You will excuse us," said he, as they went along, "for having been obliged to lodge you rather far away, and not so comfortably as our mother wished; but you see, yourself, how numerous our family is, and more relations are to come to-morrow. For one thing, you will not run away from us; there is no finding of your course through this enormous house."

They went through several passages, and Leopold at last took leave, and bade his guest good-night. The servant placed two wax-lights on the table; then asked the stranger whether he should help him to undress, and as the latter waived his help in that particular, he also went away, and the stranger found himself alone.

"How does it chance, then," said he, walking up and down, "that this image springs so vividly from my heart to-day? I forgot the long past, and thought I saw herself. I was again young, and her voice sounded as of old; I thought I was awakening from a heavy dream; but no, I am now awake, and those fair moments were but a sweet delusion."

He was too restless to sleep; he looked at some pictures on the walls, and then round on the chamber. "To-day," cried he, "all is so familiar to me, I could almost fancy I had known this house and this apartment of old." He tried to settle his remembrances, and lifted some large books which were standing in a corner. As he turned their leaves, he shook his head. A lute-case was leaning on the wall; he opened it, and found a strange old instrument, time-worn, and without the strings. "No, I am not mistaken!" cried he, in astonishment; "this lute is too remarkable; it is the Spanish lute of my long-departed friend, old Albert! Here are his magic books; this is the chamber where he raised for me that blissful vision; the red of the tapestry is faded, its golden hem is becoming dim; but strangely vivid in my heart is all pertaining to those hours. It was for this the fear went over me as I was coming hither, through these long, complicated passages where Leopold conducted me. O Heaven! On this very table did the Shape rise budding forth, and grow up as if watered and freshed by the redness of the gold. The same image smiled upon me here, which has almost driven me crazy in the hall to-night; in that hall where I have walked so often in trustful speech with Albert!"

He undressed, but slept very little. Early in the morning he was up, and looking at the room again; he opened the window, and the same gardens and buildings were lying before him as of old, only many other houses had been built since then. "Forty years have vanished," sighed he, "since that afternoon; and every day of those bright times has a longer life than all the intervening space."

He was called to the company. The morning passed in varied talk; at last the bride entered in her marriage-dress. As the old man noticed her, he fell into a state of agitation, such that every one observed it. They proceeded to the church, and the marriage-ceremony was performed. The party was again at home, when Leopold inquired: "Now, mother, how do you like our friend, the good, morose old gentleman?"

"I had figured him, by your description," said she, "much more frightful; he is mild and sympathetic, and might gain from one an honest trust in him."

"Trust?" cried Agatha; "in these burning, frightful eyes, these thousand-fold wrinkles, that pale, sunk mouth, that strange laugh of his, which looks and laughs so mockingly? No; God keep me from such friends! If evil spirits ever take the shape of men, they must assume some shape like this."

"Perhaps a younger and more handsome one," replied the mother; "but I cannot recognize the good old man in thy description. One easily observes that he is of a violent temperament, and has inured himself to lock up his feelings in his own bosom; perhaps, too, as Leopold was saying, he may have encountered many miseries; so he is grown mistrustful, and has lost that simple openness which is especially the portion of the happy."

The rest of the party entered, and broke of their conversation. Dinner was served up; and the stranger sat between Agatha and the rich merchant. When the toasts were beginning, Leopold cried out: "Now, stop a little, worthy friends; we must have the golden goblet down for this, then let it travel round."

He was rising, but his mother beckoned him to keep his seat. "Thou wilt not find it," said she, "for the plate is all stowed elsewhere." She walked out rapidly to seek it herself.

"How brisk and busy is our good old lady still!" observed the merchant. "See how nimbly she can move, with all her breadth and weight, and reckoning sixty by this time of day. Her face is always bright and joyful, and to-day she is particularly happy, for she sees herself made young again in Julia."

The stranger gave assent, and the lady entered with the goblet. It was filled with wine, and began to circulate, each toasting what was dearest and most precious to him. Julia gave the welfare of her husband, he the love of his fair Julia; and thus did every one as it became his turn. The mother lingered, as the goblet came to her.

"Come, quick with it," said the captain, somewhat hastily and rudely; we know, you reckon all men faithless, and not one among them worthy of a woman's love. What, then, is dearest to you?"

His mother looked at him, while the mildness of her brow was on a sudden overspread with angry seriousness. "Since my son," said she, "knows me so well, and can judge my mind so rigorously, let me be permitted not to speak what I was thinking of, and let him endeavor, by a life of constant love, to falsify what he gives out as my opinion." She pushed the goblet on, without drinking, and the company was for a while embarrassed and disturbed.

"It is reported," said the merchant, in a whisper, turning to the stranger, "that she did not love her husband; but another, who proved faithless to her. She was then, it seems, the finest woman in the city."

When the cup reached Ferdinand, he gazed upon it with astonishment; for it was the very goblet out of which old Albert had called forth to him the lovely shadow. He looked in upon the gold, and the waving of the wine; his hand shook; it would not have surprised him, if from the magic bowl that glowing Form had again mounted up, and brought with it his vanished youth. "No!" said he, after some time, half aloud, "it is wine that is gleaming here!"

"Ay, what else?" cried the merchant, laughing: "Drink and be merry."

A thrill of terror passed over the old man; he pronounced the name "Francesca" in a vehement tone, and set the goblet to his lips. The mother cast upon him an inquiring and astonished look.

"Whence is this bright goblet?" said Ferdinand, who also felt ashamed of his embarrassment.

"Many years ago, long ere I was born," said Leopold, "my father bought it, with this house and all its furniture, from an old, solitary bachelor; a silent man, whom the neighbors thought a dealer in the Black Art."

The stranger did not say that he had known this old man; for his whole being was too much perplexed, too like an enigmatic dream, to let the rest look into it, even from afar.

The cloth being withdrawn, he was left alone with the mother, as the young ones had retired to make ready for the ball. "Sit down by me," said the mother; "we will rest, for our dancing years are past; and if it is not rude, allow me to inquire whether you have seen our goblet elsewhere, or what it was that moved you so intensely?"

"O, my lady," said the old man, "pardon my foolish violence and emotion; but ever since I crossed your threshold, I feel as if I were no longer myself; every moment I forget that my head is gray, that the hearts which loved me are dead. Your beautiful daughter, who is now celebrating the gladdest day of her existence, is so like a maiden whom I knew and adored in my youth, that I could reckon it a miracle. Like, did I say? No, she is not like; it is she herself! In this house, too, I have often been; and once I became acquainted with this cup in a manner I shall not forget." Here he told her his adventure. "On the evening of that day," concluded he, "in the park, I saw my loved one for the last time, as she was passing in her coach. A rose fell from her bosom; this I gathered, she herself was lost to me, for she proved faithless, and soon after married."

"God in Heaven!" cried the lady, violently moved, and starting up, "thou art not Ferdinand?"

"It is my name," replied he.

"I am Francesca," said the lady.

They sprang forward to embrace, then started suddenly back. Each viewed the other with investigating looks; both strove again to evolve from the ruins of Time those lineaments which of old they had known and loved in one another; and as, in dark, tempestuous nights, amid the flight of black clouds, there are moments when solitary stars ambiguously twinkle forth, to disappear next instant, so to these two was there shown now and then from the eyes, from the brow and lips, the transitory gleam of some well-known feature; and it seemed as if their Youth stood in the distance, weeping smiles. He bowed down, and kissed her hand, while two big drops rolled from his eyes. They then embraced each other cordially.

"Is thy wife dead?" inquired she.

"I was never married," sobbed the other.

"Heavens!" cried she, wringing her hands, "then it is I who have been faithless! But no, not faithless. On returning from the country, where I stayed two months, I heard from every one, thy friends as well as mine, that thou wert long ago gone home, and married in thy own country. They showed me the most convincing letters, they pressed me vehemently, they profited by my despondency, my indignation; and so it was that I gave my hand to another, a deserving husband: but my heart and my thought were always thine."

"I never left this town," said Ferdinand; "but after a while, I heard that thou wert married. They wished to part us, and they have succeeded. Thou art a happy mother; I live in the past, and all thy children I will love as if they were my own. But how strange that we should never once have met!"

"I seldom went abroad," said she; "and as my husband took another name, soon after we were married, from a property which he inherited, thou couldst have no suspicion that we were so near together."

"I avoided men," said Ferdinand, "and lived for solitude. Leopold is almost the only one that has attracted me, and led me out amongst my fellows. O my beloved friend! it is a frightful spectre-story, to think how we lost, and have again found each other."

As the young people entered, the two were dissolved in tears, and in the deepest emotion. Neither of them told what had occurred, the secret seemed too holy. But ever after, the old man was the friend of the house; and Death alone parted these two beings, who had found each other so strangely, to reunite them in a short time, beyond the power of separation.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Within three days of each of these hopeful speculations being announced, there were as many completely organized joint-stock companies established to carry them into effect. Superb offices were engaged in the city; Patrons, Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Trustees, Chairmen, Directors, Secretaries; Auditors, Bankers, Standing Counsel, Engineers, Surveyors, and Solicitors appointed; and the names of all these functionaries forthwith blazed in dazzling array at the head of a "Prospectus," which set forth the advantages of the undertaking with such seductive eloquence as no man could resist; and within a week's time there was not a share to be had in the market. Into affairs of this description, Mr. Gammon, who soon saw the profit to be made out of them, if skillfully worked, plunged with the energy and excitement of a gamester. He drew in Mr. Quirk after him; and, as they could together command the ears of several enterprising capitalists in the city, they soon had their hands full of business, and launched two or three very brilliant speculations. Mr. Gammon himself drew up their "Prospectuses," and in a style which must have tempted the very devil himself (had he seen them) into venturing half his capital in the undertaking!—One was a scheme for providing the metropolis with a constant supply of salt water, by means of a canal cut from the vicinity of the Nore, and carried nearly all round London, so as to afford the citizens throughout the year the luxury of sea-bathing. Another was of a still more extraordinary and interesting description—for carrying into effect a discovery, by means of which, ships of all kinds and sizes could be furnished with the means, by one and the same process—and that remarkably simple, cheap, and convenient—of obtaining pure fresh water from the sea, and converting the salt or brine thrown off in the operation, instantaneously into gunpowder! The reality of this amazing discovery was decisively ascertained by three of the greatest chemists in England; a patent was taken out, and a company formed for immediately working the patent. This undertaking was the first that Gammon brought under the notice of the Earl of Dreddlington, whom he so completely dazzled by his description, both of the signal service to be conferred upon the country, and the princely revenue to be derived from it to those early entering into the speculation, that his lordship intimated rather an anxious wish to be connected with it.

"Good gracious, sir! to what a pitch is science advancing! When will human ingenuity end? Sir, I doubt not that one of these days we shall find a mode of communicating with the moon and stars!"

"Certainly—I feel the full force of your lordship's very striking observation," replied Gammon, who had listened to him with an air of delighted deference.

"Sir, this is a truly astonishing discovery! Yet I give you my honor, sir, I have often thought that something of the kind was very desirable, as far as the obtaining fresh water from salt water was concerned, and have wondered whether it could ever be practicable; but I protest the latter part of the discovery—the conversion of the brine into gunpowder—is—sir, I say it is—astounding: it is more: it is very interesting, in a picturesque and patriotic point of view. Only think, sir, of your vessels gathering gunpowder and fresh water from the sea they are sailing over! Sir, the discoverer deserves a subsidy! This must in due time be brought before Parliament." His lordship got quite excited; and Gammon, watching his opportunity, intimated the pride and pleasure it would give him to make his lordship the patron of the gigantic undertaking.

"Sir—sir—you do me—infinite honor," quoth the Earl, quite flustered by the suddenness of the proposal.

"As there will be, of course, your lordship sees, several great capitalists concerned, I must, for form's sake, consult them before any step is taken; but I flatter myself, my lord, that there can be but one opinion, when I name to them the possibility of our being honored with your lordship's name and influence."

The Earl received this with a stately bow and a gratified smile; and on the ensuing day received a formal communication from Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, soliciting his lordship to become the patron of the undertaking; which he most graciously acceded to, and was easily prevailed on to secure several other highly distinguished names among his friends, who were profoundly ignorant of business in all its departments, but delighted to figure before the public as the patrons of so great and laudable an enterprise. Out went forthwith, all over the country, the advertisements and prospectuses of the new company, and which could boast such commanding names as cast most of its sister companies into the shade: e.g. "The Right Honorable the EARL OF DREDDLINGTON, G. C. B., F. R. S., F. A. S., &c., &c." "The Most Noble the DUKE OF TANTALLAN, K. T., &c., &c." "The Most Honorable the MARQUESS OF MARMALADE, &c., &c., &c." The capital to be one million, in ten thousand shares of one hundred pounds each. Lord Dreddlington was presented with a hundred shares, as a mark of respect and gratitude from the leading shareholders; moreover, his lordship took two hundred shares besides, and prevailed on various of his friends to do the same. In less than three weeks' time the shares had risen to £40 premium, (i.e. my lady readers will understand, each share for which his lordship was supposed to have given, or to be liable to be called upon for £100, he could at any moment dispose of for £140.) and then Mr. Gammon so represented matters to his lordship, as to induce him to part with his shares, which he found no difficulty in doing—and thereby realized a clear profit of £12,000. This seemed to the Earl rather the effect of magic than of an every day mercantile adventure. His respect for Gammon rose with every thing he heard of that gentleman, or saw him do; and his lordship allowed himself to be implicitly guided by him in all things. Under his advice, accordingly, the Earl became interested in several other similar speculations; all which exercises so occupied his thoughts, as almost to obliterate his sense of ministerial injustice. Several of his friends cautioned him, now and then, against committing himself to such novel and extensive speculations, in which he might incur, he was reminded, dangerous liabilities; but his magnificent reception of such interference soon caused their discontinuance. The Earl felt safe in the hands of Mr. Gammon; forming an equally and a very high estimate of his ability and integrity.

His lordship's attention having been thus directed to such subjects, to the mercantile interests of this great country, so he began to take a great interest in the discussion of such subjects in the House, greatly to the surprise and edification of many of his brother peers. Absorbing, however, as were these and similar occupations, they were almost altogether suspended, as soon as a day, and that not a distant one, had been fixed upon for the marriage of his daughter with Mr. Titmouse. From that moment, the old man could scarcely bear her out of his presence; following and watching all her movements with a peculiar, though still a stately, solicitude and tenderness. Frequent, earnest, and dignified were his interviews with Titmouse: his representations as to the invaluable treasure that was about to be intrusted to him in the Lady Cecilia, the last direct representative of the most ancient noble family in the kingdom. Innumerable were his lordship's directions to him concerning his future conduct, both in public and private life; intimating, in a manner at once impressive and affectionate, that the eyes of the country would be thenceforward fixed upon him, as son-in-law of the Earl of Dreddlington. His lordship, moreover, pocketing the affront he had received at the hands of the Ministry, made a very strenuous and nearly a successful effort to procure for this destined son-in-law a vacant lordship of the Treasury. The Premier was really considering the subject, when Mr. O'Gibbet extinguished all the aspiring hopes of Lord Dreddlington, by applying for the vacant office for a friend of his, Mr. Och Hubbaboo, an early friend of Mr. O'Gibbet; and who, having failed in business and been unable to re-establish himself, had come into the House of Commons to repair his shattered fortunes. I need hardly say that, within a day or two, Mr. Hubbaboo was made a Lord of the Treasury; and thereby very nearly alienated from Ministers two staunch supporters, to wit, the Earl of Dreddlington and Mr. Titmouse.

Early in the forenoon of Tuesday the 1st of April, 18—, there were indications in the neighborhood of Lord Dreddlington's house in Grosvenor Square, that an aristocratic wedding was about to be celebrated. Lady Cecilia's bridesmaids, and one or two other ladies, the Duke and Duchess of Tantallan, and a few others who were to accompany the party to church, made their appearance about eleven o'clock; and shortly afterward dashed up Mr. Titmouse's Cab, in which sat that gentleman, enveloped in a magnificent green cloak, which concealed the splendor of his personal appearance. He had been engaged at his toilet since five o'clock that morning, and the results were not unworthy of the pains which had been taken to secure them. He wore a light-blue body coat, with velvet collar; tight black pantaloons tying round the ankles; gossamer white silk stockings, and dress-shoes with small gold buckles. His shirt was of snowy whiteness, and there glittered in the centre of it a very superb diamond brooch. He had two waistcoats, the under one a sky-blue satin, (only the roll visible,) the outer one a white satin waistcoat, richly embroidered. He wore a burnished gold guard-chain, disposed very gracefully over the outside of his outer waistcoat. His hair was parted down the middle, and curled forward toward each temple, giving his countenance a very bold and striking expression. He wore white kid gloves, a glossy new hat, and held in his hand his agate-headed ebony cane. Though he tried to look at his ease, his face was rather pale, and his manner a little flurried. As for the bride—she had slept scarcely a quarter of an hour the whole night; and a glimpse at her countenance, in the glass, convinced her of the necessity of yielding to Annette's suggestions, and rousing a little. Her eyes told of the sleepless and agitated night she had passed; and while dressing, she was twice forced to drink a little sal volatile and water. She was cold, and trembled. When at length she had completed her toilet, what a figure did her cheval glass present to her! The dress, rich white satin, a long and beautiful blonde lace veil—and a delicate wreath of orange-blossoms, was that of a bride, certainly; but was the countenance that of a bride? Miss Macspleuchan burst into tears at the sight. When, attended by her bride-maid and Miss Macspleuchan, she made her appearance in the drawing-room, the Earl of Dreddlington approached her, and saluted her in silent tenderness. Then Titmouse came up, with a would-be familiar air—"Hope you're quite well, dearest, this happy day," said he, and kissed her gloved hand. She made him no reply; and presently the carriages were announced to be in readiness. The Earl led her down, followed by her two bride-maids, and entered the first carriage, which then drove off to St. George's Church; Titmouse and the rest of the party immediately following. The ceremony was to be performed by the Bishop of Barnard-Castle, an old friend, and indeed a distant relation of Lord Dreddlington's. Methinks I now see his portly and commanding figure, standing before the altar, with the little distinguished party before him; and hear his clear sonorous voice reading the marriage service. Titmouse was pale and flushed by turns, and looked frightened—behaving, however, with more sedateness than I should have expected. Lady Cecilia leaned, when she could, against the rails; and repeated her few allotted words in a voice scarcely audible. When Titmouse affixed the ring upon her finger she trembled and shed tears—averting her countenance from him, and at length concealing it entirely in her pocket handkerchief. She looked, indeed, the image of misery. The Earl of Dreddlington maintained a countenance of rigid solemnity. At length the all-important ceremony came to a close; the necessary entries and signatures were made in the vestry, to which they followed the bishop; and then Mr. Titmouse, taking his wife's arm within his own, led her from the vestry to the private door, where stood waiting for them the Earl's chariot. He handed her into it, and popped in after her—a little crowd standing round to catch a glimpse of the bride and bridegroom: and they drove rapidly homeward. He sat in one corner, and she in the other; each so occupied with their own thoughts that they uttered scarce two words all the way.

A splendid déjeuner à la fourchette was prepared, and a very brilliant party attended to pay their respects to the bride and bridegroom, and the Earl of Dreddlington; and about two o'clock the lady Cecilia withdrew to prepare for her journey, which was to Poppleton Hall, her father's residence in Hertfordshire, where they were to spend their honeymoon. She had never shown so much emotion in her life, as when she parted with Miss Macspleuchan and her bride-maids—being several times on the verge of hysterics. Mr. Titmouse's travelling chariot—a handsome chocolate-colored one, with four horses—stood at the door, her ladyship's maid and his valet seated in the rumble. Some hundred people stood round to see the set off on their journey of happiness. The Earl led down Lady Cecilia, followed by Titmouse, who had exchanged his hat for a gaudy traveling cap, with a gold band round it. Lady Cecilia, with drooping head and feeble step, suffered the Earl, whom she kissed fervently, to place her in the chariot, when she burst into a flood of tears. Then Mr. Titmouse shook hands cordially with his distinguished father-in-law; stepped into the chariot; the steps were doubled up; the door closed; the side blinds were drawn down by Mr. Titmouse; "All's right!" cried one of the servants, and away rolled the carriage-and-four, which, quickening its speed, was soon out of sight. Lady Cecilia remained in a sort of stupor for some time, and sat silent and motionless in the corner of the chariot; but Titmouse had now become lively enough, having had the benefit of some dozen glasses of champagne.

"Happy, happy, happy pair,"

"Ah, my lovely gal—dearest gal of my heart!" he exclaimed fondly, at the same time kissing her cold cheeks, and putting his arm round her waist—"Now you're all my own! 'Pon my soul, is n't it jolly! We're man and wife! By Jove, I never loved you so much as now, ducky! eh?" Again he pressed her cold cheek.

"Don't, do n't, I beg," said she faintly, "I'm not well;" and she feebly tried to disengage herself from his rude and boisterous embrace; while her drooping head and ashy cheek fully corroborated the truth of her statement. In this state she continued for the whole of the first stage. When they stopped to change horses, says Titmouse, who had very nearly dropped asleep, "Cicely, as you're so uncommon ill, had n't you better have your maid in, and I'll sit on the box?"

"Oh, I should feel so obliged if you would, Mr. Titmouse!" she replied, faintly. It was done as she wished. Titmouse enveloped himself in his cloak; and, having lit a cigar, mounted the box, and smoked all the way till they reached the Hall.

Gammon was one of those who had seen them set off on their auspicious journey. He contemplated them with deep interest and anxiety.

"Well," he exclaimed, walking away with a deep sigh, when the carriage had got out of sight, "So far, so good: Heavens! the plot thickens, and the game is bold!"

Were you, oh unhappy Lady Cecilia! in entering into this ill-omened union, to be more pitied or despised? 'T was most deliberately done; in fact, we have already had laid before us ample means of determining the question—but 't is a delicate and a painful matter, and had perhaps be better left alone.

They spent about a fortnight at Poppleton Hall, and then went on to Yatton; and if the reader be at all curious to know how MR. AND LADY CECILIA TITMOUSE commenced their matrimonial career, I am able, in some measure, to gratify him by the sight of a letter addressed by the Lady Cecilia, some time afterward, to one of her confidential friends.

"YATTON, April 28, 18—

"You may well ask, my dear Blanche, what has become of me—and why I have not performed my promise. I have not written, only because I had not courage to do so. Indeed, my dear friend, I am the most miserable woman in the world—and am I not to be pitted? For I have become such purely to please papa—but as I am fortunately left alone this evening, (no novelty by the way,) Mr. Titmouse being gone to some of his haunts at Grilston, or thereabouts, I am resolved to write you a long letter. Whenever he is away I feel as if I were rid of a mischievous and odious animal—an ape, or an ourang-outang, or something of that kind. Why did he not always appear to me the same as he does now that I am so dreadfully committed to him? Surely he is the most vulgar, horrid wretch the world ever saw; and I feel it will be quite impossible for me live with him without going mad, for you never heard of such tricks and habits as his; indeed he tries, I do believe, to make himself as disgusting to me as he can. He is the most ignorant fellow in the world, and is always drinking and smoking, both in-doors and out of doors—in every room of the house, and night and day. To say nothing of his personal impertinences to myself, and his gross gougeries in the presence of every one he goes to see, or who comes to see us—fancy the creature carrying a nasty pocket-comb everywhere, and combing out his abominable hair in the carriage when we go out to dinner. I have even seen him doing it in the drawing-room, before the chimney and pier-glasses! What will you think of the vile creature when you hear what happened only four days after our most unfortunate wedding! He comes up to my dressing-room, and bursts open the door while I was dressing, and 'Ah, Cicely, Cicely,' (that is the odious way he pronounces my name,) says he, holding up to me—gracious Heavens! the little morocco collar of my poor dear little Fidelio all stained with blood, so that I was very nearly fainting outright—'what do you think? We've unmuzzled and let loose Frend,' (that 's a monstrous mastiff of papa's, chained up in the court-yard, and dreadfully savage,) 'and we set him, quite in fun, at your little Blenheim Fid.; and curse me if he did n't snap his head off in a moment and crush him to pieces, and this is all that's left of him!' The beast never once thought of Titmouse! I fainted, and recollect nothing more till Annette was sitting by my bedside. Talking of her, by the way, the other day she gave me warning, to my infinite annoyance, (for she's quite a treasure;) and when I asked her why, she blushed a good deal, and said it was very unpleasant to be used so by Mr. Titmouse. 'What do you mean?' said I. 'Oh, my lady,' said she 'he's always winking at me, or chucking me under the chin; and once he tried to kiss me—and more than that, my lady, I'm not the only one he does the same to.' The odious, abominable devil! (one can't help writing strongly,) my rivals are my own servants! We have several times gone out to dinner since we have been here, to some of papa's friends, (for the creature knows no one of himself)—and he has more than once got quite tipsy, and lain snoring or hiccupping; and once—laugh! And as for the company he keeps, it is all of a piece. Fancy me entertaining a Unitarian parson, an auctioneer, and a little fat apothecary, with their dowdy wives! He says it is to keep up his political influence, (which is all stuff;) the real truth is, he is so despised, no decent presentable person will come near Yatton. I often see the servants almost bursting with laughter while waiting at dinner! His breath and all his clothes are full of the filthy odor of tobacco; and Annette is often obliged to deluge my shawls and pelisses, &c., with eau-de-cologne, before and after my going anywhere with him, lest they also should smell of tobacco-smoke. He is quite hated by all the tenants; he is the most insolent and unkind landlord, and is going to 'screw them all up a little higher' (he says) in their rents. He will soon not have a respectable tenant on the estate. And he is such a little liar, that not the least reliance can be placed on any thing he says. The other day he began telling me how beautiful Miss Aubrey was, and that it was no fault of hers that she was not now Mrs. Titmouse, and that he has a good many letters from her! which I cannot believe; but I wish he had married—however it is now too late. Then he goes on in such a rude, odious way before Dr. Tatham, (a very nice little old clergyman—the vicar of Yatton,) that I have no doubt he will give up visiting us. Mr. Titmouse has no more sense of religion than a cat or a dog; and I understand has left a great many of his election bills unpaid; and positively the diamond spray he gave me turns out to be only paste!! What do you think he is about to-night? Why, you must know there is a little school-room, between the park gate and the vicarage, which Dr. Tatham says Mr. Aubrey built for his sister (by the way, you cannot imagine how beloved they are here by everybody) to educate little girls in; and Titmouse, to promote his own political interests, he says, has given it to a Mr. Murkyflint, (or some such name,) a Unitarian parson, who always abuses the Church horribly. Well, they are giving Mr. Titmouse a public dinner at Grilston to-day, partly to celebrate this affair of the chapel. He is going to run up a long shooting gallery—and, in short, will ruin this sweet old place, (for such it is at present.) I have reason to believe that he has introduced a sad set into the village; in short, he will run everything about him before long. I dare say, dearest B., you will be heartily sick of reading all this, and yet it is only a hundredth part of my sufferings. Good Heavens! where were my wits when I ever thought of uniting myself to such a fellow? Fancy him him heir to the barony! I hope I shall outlive him: in fact, I am not (between ourselves) quite in despair on that head, for I should think—the word first written by her ladyship was plainly 'hope'—his constitution cannot stand such continual drinking. However, fate brought us together, and we must all resign ourselves to fate. My papa knows nothing of all this horrid work as yet—at least from me; but I soon shall tell him that Mr. Titmouse and I cannot possibly go on together much longer: I shall die if we do. Of course, I sha'n't degrade myself by getting my letter franked by Mr. Titmouse, so I direct under cover to the Marquis. By the way, another piece of gross impertinence of Mr. Titmouse—when I came down one morning to breakfast, I found that the little brute had positively opened all my letters!! And he says it is all one between us now, and he has a right to do it! So I have now got a letter-bag of my own, which is always delivered in my dressing-room. He is everlastingly talking about the women he might have married! But I must conclude—alas! he is come home! I hear his voice: he is evidently tipsy, and abusing some one in the hall. What to become of your wretched

CECILIA!

"THE LADY BLANCHE DE BURGH."

A dull and phlegmatic disposition, like that of Lady Cecilia, must have been roused and stung, indeed, before she could have attained to such strength and bitterness of expression as are displayed in the above communication. Though it shadows forth, with painful distinctness, several of the more disadvantageous features of Mr. Titmouse's character and conduct, there were far darker ones, with which its miserable writer had not then become acquainted. I shall but hastily allude to one of them, viz. that he was at that moment keeping a mistress in town, and commencing the seduction of a farmer's daughter in the neighborhood of Yatton! Execrable little miscreant!—why should I defile my paper by further specifying his gross misdeeds, or dwelling upon their sickening effects on the mind and feelings of the weak woman who could suffer herself to be betrayed into such a union? Whatever may be the accidental and ultimate advantages, in respect of fortune or social station, expected to be realized by a woman in forming a union with one who would be otherwise regarded with indifference, or dislike, or disgust, she may rely upon it that she is committing an act of deliberate wickedness, which will be attended, probably, for the rest of her life, with consequences of unutterable and inevitable misery, which even the obtaining of her proposed objects will not compensate, but only enhance. It is equally a principle of our law, and of common sense, that people must be understood to have contemplated the natural and necessary consequences of their own acts, even if hastily—but by so much the more, if deliberately done. When, therefore, they come to experience those consequences, let them not complain. A marriage of this description is, so to speak, utter dislocation and destruction to the delicate and beautiful fabric of a woman's character. It perverts, it deflects the noblest tendencies of her lovely nature; it utterly degrades and corrupts her; she sinks irremediably into an inferior being; instead of her native simplicity and purity, are to be seen thenceforth only heartlessness and hypocrisy. Her affections and passions, denied their legitimate objects and outlets, according to their original weakness or strength of development, either disappear and wither—and she is no longer woman—or impel her headlong into coarse sensuality, perhaps, at length, open criminality; and then she is expelled indignantly and for ever from the community of her sex. It is not the mere ring, and the orange blossom, that constitute the difference between virtue—and vice.

Had Lady Cecilia been a woman of acute perceptions or lively sensibilities, she must have fled from her sufferings—she must have gone mad, or committed suicide. As it was, dull as was her temperament, when the more odious points of Titmouse's character and habits were forced upon her notice by the close and constant contiguity of daily intercourse, the reflection that such must be the case for the remainder of her life, became even hourly more intolerable, and roused into existence feelings of active hatred and disgust; she became hourly more alive to the real horrors of her position. The slender stay she had sought for in the reflection that she had incurred all by a dutiful submission to her father's wishes, quickly gave way: she knew that it was false! As for Titmouse, he had never cared one straw about anything beyond becoming the husband of the future Baroness of Drelincourt, not merely on account of the dignity and splendor conferred upon him by such alliance with the last remaining member of the elder branch of his ancient family, but also because of the grave and repeated assurances of Mr. Gammon that it was in some mysterious way essential to the tenure of his own position. Had she, instead of being cold and inanimate, haughty even to repulsion in her manner, and of person lean and uninviting—been of fascinating manners, affectionate disposition, of brilliant accomplishments, and of ripe loveliness of person, it would, I am persuaded, have made little or no difference to Mr. Titmouse, since such a woman would, as it were, stand always surrounded by the invisible but impassable barrier of refinement—for ever forbidding communion and sympathy. As for Lady Cecilia, Titmouse could scarcely avoid perceiving how she despised him, and avoided his company on every possible occasion. No person, from merely seeing them, could have dreamed of their being husband and wife. He made no secret at all (at least in his own peculiar visiting circles) of his wishes that the Earl's increasing age and infirmities might quicken, and Lady Cecilia's apparently delicate health decline apace—and thus accelerate the accession of Mr. Titmouse to the barony of Drelincourt and the fortune attached to it.

"Ha, ha!" would exclaim his choice boon companions, "won't it be comical, Tit, to see you take your seat in the Upper House?"

"Pon my soul, jolly, ah, ha!—Demme, I'll show the old stagers a funny trick or two!"

"Capital!—ah, ha, ha!—Do the donkey? eh?—You'd make the Chancellors wig jump off!"

"Ha, ha, ha!—I'll tickle 'em, or my name is n't Tittlebat Titmouse!"—By all which was meant, that he proposed introducing into the House of Lords that peculiar mode of debating which had earned him such quick distinction in the House of Commons!

After they had spent about a month at Yatton, his urgent parliamentary duties required Mr. Titmouse to tear himself from that lovely seclusion—that "bower of bliss"—and resume his arduous post in the House. Though Lady Cecilia would have vastly preferred being left behind at Yatton, decency seemed to require that the bride and bridegroom should make their reappearance in the world jointly, and she was therefore compelled to accompany him to town; and they were very soon duly established in his new residence in Park Lane. It was spacious and elegant—indeed it was furnished with great splendor, inasmuch as carte blanche had been given to a fashionable upholsterer. In a moment they were both in the great whirling world of fashion. Lord Dreddington gave a series of dinner parties on their account, as did several of their distinguished kinsfolk and friends; and in due time their hospitalities were returned by Mr. Titmouse. His first dinner party went off with great éclat, no fewer than four peers of the realm, with their ladies, being among his guests. Mr. Titmouse led down to dinner the gigantic Duchess of Tantallan, blazing in diamonds, being preceded by his Grace the Duke and the Lady Cecilia—all of which was duly announced, the ensuing morning, in the obsequious columns of the Aurora. For some time Mr. Titmouse occupied his novel and dazzling position with becoming decorum and self-denial; but, as he became familiar with it, his old tastes revived—and Lady Cecilia and her friends were gratified, while in the drawing-room after dinner, by catching occasional sounds of Mr. Titmouse's celebrated imitations of animals, which, once or twice, when considerably elevated, he insisted upon giving on his re-entering the drawing-room! Indeed, he spared no pains to acquire the power of pleasing society by the display of rare accomplishments; for which purpose he took lessons every other day in the art diabolique—i. e., in conjuring, in which he soon became an expert proficient, and could play marvellous tricks upon cards and with dice, eat pocket-handkerchiefs, cause wine-glasses visibly to sink through solid tables, and perform sundry other astounding feats. Nor was he long in collecting round him guests, who not only tolerated, but professed infinite delight in, such entertainment—"fit audience, nor few"—consisting principally of those adventurous gentlemen who have entered Parliament in a devout reliance on Providence to find them dinners. 'T was only in such society as this that Titmouse could feel the least sense of enjoyment, and from which Lady Cecilia altogether absented herself, often without deigning the slightest reason, excuse, or apology. In fact, the intemperate habits and irregular hours of Titmouse soon rendered it necessary that he and the Lady Cecilia should occupy separate sleeping apartments; for either his club, the House, or his other engagements, kept him out till a very late—or rather early—hour every morning.

It was about half-past eleven o'clock one day toward the latter end of June, that Mr. Titmouse having finished breakfast, (which was surely very early, since he had not got to bed till four o'clock that morning,) a meal to which he invariably sat down alone, often not catching a glimpse of Lady Cecilia, except on a chance encounter in the hall, or on the stairs, or when they were forced to go out to dinner together—had entered his library to enjoy undisturbed the luxury of his hookah. The library was a large and handsome room, all the sides of which were occupied by very curious antique carved oak bookcases, which had belonged to the former tasteful occupant of the house, and from whom they had been purchased by Titmouse, who then bethought himself of procuring a library to fill them.

For this purpose, it luckily occurred to him, on seeing an advertisement of a library for sale by auction one day, that it would be a good speculation to be beforehand with the expected audience, and purchase it in a lump, by private contract. He did so, and at a remarkably low price; giving directions that they should forthwith be carried to a bookbinder, named by the obsequious auctioneer, with orders to bind them all in elegant but as varied bindings as possible. Certainly the works were of a somewhat miscellaneous character—old directories; poems by young ladies and gentlemen; ready reckoners; Doddridge's Expositor; Hints on Etiquette; two hundred Minerva press novels; triplicate editions of some forty books on cookery; the art of war; charades; books of travels; bibles; dictionaries; prayer-books; plays; adventures of noted highwaymen; the classics; moral essays; and Burne's Ecclesiastical Law. If these respectable works had had the least sense of the distinction that had been so unexpectedly bestowed upon them, they ought not to have murmured at never afterward receiving the slightest personal attention from their spirited and gifted proprietor. The room was lit by a large bay window, which, being partially open, admitted the pleasant breeze which was stirring without, while the strong light was mitigated by the half drawn blinds and the ample chintz window-drapes. On the mantelpiece stood one or two small alabaster statues and vases, and a very splendid and elaborately ornamented French time-piece. The only unpleasantness perceptible, was the sort of disagreeable odor prevalent in rooms which, as in the present instance, are devoted to smoking. To this room had been also transferred many of the articles which I have described as having been visible in his rooms at the Albany. Over the mantelpiece was placed the picture of the boxers—that of Titmouse being similarly situated in the dining-room. Mr. Titmouse was in a full crimson dressing-gown, with yellow slippers; his shirt-collar was open and thrown down over his shoulders—leaving exposed to view a quantity of sand-colored hair under his throat. In fact, he looked the image of a gentleman (of one sort) at his ease. He lay on the sofa with his hookah in his left hand; near him was the table, on which stood the Morning Groul, and some eight or ten letters, only one or two of which had as yet been opened. He had just leaned back his head, and with an air of tranquil enjoyment very slowly expelled a mouthful of smoke, when a servant submissively entered, and announced the arrival of a visitor—Mr. Gammon.

"How do you do, Gammon?—early, eh?" commenced Titmouse, without stirring, and with infinite composure and nonchalance. Mr. Gammon made the usual reply, and presently sat down in the chair placed for him by the servant, nearly opposite to Mr. Titmouse; who, had he been accustomed to observation, or capable of it, might have detected something very unusual in the flushed face, the the anxious and restless eye, and the forced manner of his visitor.

"Likely to be devilish hot day—'pon my soul!"—exclaimed Titmouse after again emptying his mouth; adding, in a tolerably conceited manner:

"By the way, here's a letter from Snap—just opened it! Dem him, asks me for a place under government! Ah—a—what's he fit for?"

"For what he is, and nothing else," replied Gammon, quietly glancing his eye sarcastically over poor Snap's letter, which Titmouse handed to him, though marked "strictly confidential,"—Gammon being undoubtedly the very last man upon earth whom Snap would have wished to know of his application.

"Were you at the House last night? They sat very late. Lord Bulfinch made, I think, a very powerful speech."

"Yes devilish good—rather long thought!" replied Titmouse, languidly.

He had by this time turned himself towards Mr. Gammon; his right arm and leg hanging carelessly over the side of the sofa.

"Lady Cecilia is well, I hope?"

"Can't say—not seen her this week," drawled Titmouse. "I'll ring and ask, if you wish," he added, with an affected smile.

"Ah, my dear Titmouse," quoth Gammon, blandly, and with a smile of delicious flattery; "I hope you do n't give her ladyship just cause for jealousy? Eh? You must not avail yourself of your—your acknowledged power over the sex. Ahem!"

Mr. Titmouse, half closing his eyes, silently expelled a mouthful of smoke, while an ineffable smile stole over his features.

"You must not neglect her ladyship, Titmouse," quoth Gammon, gently shaking his head, and with an anxiously deferential air.

"'Pon my life, I do n't neglect her! Public life, you know," replied Titmouse, slowly, with his eyes closed, and speaking with the air of one suffering from ennui. Here a pause of some moments ensued.

"Can we have about half an hour to ourselves, uninterrupted?" at length inquired Mr. Gammon.

"A—why? my singing-master is coming here a little after twelve," quoth Titmouse, turning himself round so as to be able to look at the clock on the mantelpiece.

"Oh, probably less than that period will suffice, if we shall not be interrupted. May I ring the bell, and will you give orders to that effect?" With this Gammon rung the bell; and on the servant's appearing—

"I say, sir—do you hear, demme?" said Titmouse; "not at home—till this gentleman's gone." The man bowed and withdrew; and on his closing the door, Gammon softly stepped after him and bolted it; by which time Titmouse, somewhat startled, withdrew his hookah from his mouth, and gazed rather anxiously at Gammon, about whose appearance he then, for the first time, fancied he saw something unreasonable.

"Ah, how!—how monstrous funny!" he exclaimed, and began to smoke rather more energetically than before, with his eye fixed on the grave countenance of Mr. Gammon.

"My dear Titmouse," commenced his visitor, drawing his chair near to Titmouse, and speaking in an earnest and kindly manner, "does it never astonish you, when you reflect on the stroke of fortune which has elevated you to your present point of splendor and distinction?"

"Most amazing!—uncommon!" replied Titmouse, apprehensively.

"It is!—marvellous! unprecedented! you are the envy of hundreds upon hundreds of thousands! such an affair as yours does not happen above once or twice in a couple of centuries—if so often! You cannot imagine the feelings of delight with which I regard all this—this brilliant result of my long labors, and untiring devotion to your service." He paused.

"Oh! 'pon my life, yes; it's all very true," replied Titmouse, with a little trepidation, replenishing the bowl of his hookah with tobacco.

"May I continue to hope, my dear Titmouse, that I have established my claim to be considered, in some measure, as the sole architect of your extraordinary fortune—your earliest—your most constant friend?"

"You see, as I've often said, Mr. Gammon, I'm most uncommon obliged to you for all favors—so help me—! and no mistake!"—with a countenance of increasing seriousness; and he rose from his recumbent posture, and sat with his face turned full towards Mr. Gammon, who resumed—

"As I am not in the habit, my dear Titmouse, of beating about the bush, let me express a hope that you consider the services rendered you not unworthy of requital."

"Oh yes—to be sure—certainly," quoth Titmouse slightly changing color; "anything, by Jove, that's in my power; but, it is most particular unfortunate that—ahem!—so deuced hard up just now—but—ah, 'pon my soul, I'll speak to Lord Bulfinch, or some of those people, and get you something—though I shan't do anything of the kind for Snap—dem him! You've no idea how devilish thick Lord Bulfinch and I are—he shakes hands with me when we meet in the lobby—he does, 'pon my life!"

"I am very much obliged, my dear Titmouse, for your kind offer; but I have a little political influence myself, when I think fit to exert it," replied Gammon, gravely.

"Well, then," interrupted Titmouse eagerly; "as for money—if that's what—by jingo! but if you do n't know how precious hard up one is just now—"

"My dear sir, the subject on which we are now engaged is one of inexpressible interest and importance, in my opinion, to each of us; and let us discuss it calmly. I am prepared to make a communication to you immediately, which you will never forget to the day of your death. Are you prepared to receive it?"

"Oh yes!—Never so wide awake in my life! oh Lord! fire away!"—replied Titmouse; and taking the tip of his hookah from his lips, and holding it in his left fingers, he leaned forward, staring open-mouthed at Gammon.

"Well, my dear Titmouse, then I will proceed. I will not enjoin you to secrecy—and that not merely because I have full confidence in your honor—but because you cannot disclose it to any mortal man, but at the peril of immediate and utter ruin."

"'Pon my soul, most amazing! Demme, Mr. Gammon, you frighten me out of my senses!" said Titmouse, turning paler and paler, as his recollection became more and more distinct of certain mysterious hints of Mr. Gammon's many months before, at Yatton, as to his power over Titmouse.

"Consider for a moment. You are now a member of Parliament; the unquestioned owner of a fine estate; the husband of a lady of very high rank—the last direct representative of one of the proudest and most ancient of the noble families of Great Britain; you yourself are next but one in succession to almost the oldest Barony in the kingdom; in fact, in all human probability you are the next Lord Drellincourt; and all this through me." He paused.

"Well—excuse me, Mr. Gammon—but—I hear—though—ahem! you're (meaning no offence) I can't for the life and soul of me tell what the devil it is you're driving at!"—said Titmouse, twisting his finger into his hair, and gazing at Gammon with intense anxiety. For some moments Mr. Gammon remained looking very solemnly and in silence at Titmouse; and then proceeded.

"Yet you are really no more entitled to be what you seem—what you are thought—or to possess what you at present possess—than—the little wretch who last swept your chimneys here!"

The hookah dropped out of Titmouse's hand upon the floor, and he made no effort to pick it up, but sat staring at Gammon, white as his shirt, and in blank dismay.

"I perceive that you are agitated, Mr. Titmouse," said Gammon kindly.

"By Jove—I should think so!" replied Titmouse faintly; but he tried to assume an incredulous smile—in vain, however; and to such a pitch had his agitation reached, that he rose, opened a cabinet near him, and taking out from it a brandy-flask and a wine glass, poured it out full, and drank it off. "You a'tat joking, Mr. Gammon, eh?" Again he attempted a sickly smile.

"God forbid, Mr. Titmouse!"

"Well—but—why a'tat I entitled to it all! Hasn't the law given it to me?"

"No one on earth knows the who and the why of this matter but myself; and if you choose, no one ever shall; nay, I will take care that if this morning you come to my terms, to deprive even myself of all means of proving what I can now prove, at any moment I choose!"

"Lord!" ejaculated Titmouse, wiping his forehead—his agitation visibly increasing. "What's to be the figure?" he faltered presently, and looked as if he dreaded to hear the answer.

"If you mean what are my terms—I will at once tell you—they are terms on which I shall peremptorily insist; they have been long fixed in my own mind; I am quite inflexible: so help me heaven, I will not vary them a hair's breadth! I require, first, To sit in Parliament for Yatton, at the next election; and afterwards alternately with yourself; and secondly, that you immediately grant me an annuity for my life of two thousand pounds a year on your—"

Titmouse sprang from the sofa, dashing his fist on the table, and uttering a frightful imprecation. He stood for a moment, and then threw himself desperately at full length on the sofa, muttering the same execration that had at first issued from his lips. Gammon moved not a muscle, but fixed a steadfast eye on Titmouse; the two might have been compared to the affrighted rabbit, and the deadly boaster.

"It's all a swindle!—a d—d swindle!" at length he exclaimed, starting up into a sitting posture, and almost grinning defiance at Gammon. "You're a swindler!" he claimed vehemently.

"Possibly—but you are a—BASTARD!"—replied Gammon, calmly. Titmouse looked the picture of horror, and trembled in every limb.

"It's a lie!—It's all a lie!"—he gasped.

"Sir, you are a bastard!"—repeated Gammon, extending his fore-finger in a solemn manner toward Titmouse.

"Wretched miscreant—do you presume to tell me I lie? You base born cur!"—a lightning glance shot from his eye; but he restrained himself. Titmouse sat at length as if petrified, while Gammon in a low and solemn tone proceeded—"You the owner of Yatton? You the next Lord Drellincourt? No more than the helper in your stables! One breath of mine blights you for ever—as an impostor—a mere audacious swindler—to be spit upon! to be kicked out of society—perhaps to be transported for life. Gracious Heavens! what will the Earl of Dreddlington say when he hears that his sole daughter and heiress is married to a—It will kill him, or he will kill you."

"Two can play at that," whispered Titmouse, faintly—indeed almost inarticulately. There was nearly a moment's pause.

"No—but is all true!—honor!" inquired Titmouse, in a very subdued voice.

"As God is my witness!" replied Gammon.

"Well," exclaimed Titmouse, after a prodigious sigh, "then, at any rate, you're in for it with me; you said just now you'd done it all.—Ah, ha! I recollect, Mr. Gammon! I should no more have thought of it myself—Lord! than—what d'ye say to that, Mr. Gammon?"

"Alas, sir! it will not avail you," replied Gammon, with a fearful smile; for I never made the dreadful discovery of your illegitimacy till it was too late—till at least two months after I had put you (whom I believed the true heir) into possession of Yatton."

"Ah—I don't know—but—why didn't you tell Lord Dreddlington? Why did you let me marry Lady Cicely? By Jove, but it's you he'll kill," quoth Titmouse, eagerly.

"Yes!—Alas! I ought to have done so," replied Mr. Gammon, with a profound sigh—adding, abstractedly, "It may not be too late to make his lordship some amends. I may save his title from degradation. Lord Drellincourt!"

"Oh, lud!" ejaculated Titmouse, involuntarily, and almost unconsciously staring stupidly at Gammon, who continued with a renewed sigh—"Yes, I ought to have told his lordship—but I own—I was led away by feelings of pity—of affection for you—and is this the return?" He spoke this with a look and in a tone of sorrowful reproach. "Well, you shouldn't have come down on one so suddenly—all at once—how can a man—eh? Such horrid news!"

"It has cost me, sir, greater pain to tell you, than it has cost you to hear it!"

"By the living Jove!" exclaimed Titmouse, starting up with a sort of recklessness, and pouring out and tossing off a large glassful of brandy—"it can't be true—it's all a dream! I—I a'n't—I can't be a bas—perhaps you're all this while the true heir, Mr. Gammon?" he added briskly, and snapped his fingers at his companion.

"No, sir, I am not," replied Gammon calmly; "but, let me tell you, I know where he is to be found, Mr. Titmouse! Do you commission me to go in search of him?" he inquired, suddenly fixing his bright and penetrating eye upon Titmouse, who instantly stammered out—"Oh, lud! By Jove! no, no!"

Gammon could scarcely suppress a bitter smile, so ludicrous were the look and tone of Titmouse.

"You shouldn't have let me spend such a lot of money if it wasn't mine, all the while!"

"The estate was, in a manner, Mr. Titmouse, in my gift; and in pitching upon you, sir, out of several, I had imagined that I had chosen a gentleman—a man grateful and honorable!"

"'Pon my solemn soul, so I am!" interrupted Titmouse.

"I had but to scrawl a line or two with my pen, the very first day that I saw you at the shop of Mr. Tag-rag—and there, sir—or in some similar hole—you would have been at this moment!" replied Gammon, with a sudden sternness that quite overawed Titmouse, but totally losing sight of the very different account of the matter which had given Titmouse five minutes before; but the very best and most experienced liars have very short memories. Here it was, however, Liar v. Fool; and the latter did not perceive the slip made by his adversary—who, however, suddenly became aware of his little inconsistency, and colored.

"You'll excuse me, sir," quoth Titmouse, presently; but with an air which was becoming momentarily more timid and doubtful—"but will you, if all this isn't a bottle of smoke, tell me how you can prove it all? Because, you know, it isn't only saying the thing that will do—you know, Mr. Gammon?"

"Certainly—certainly! You are quite right Mr. Titmouse! Nothing more reasonable! Your curiosity shall be gratified. Aware that you natural acuteness, my dear sir, will in all probability prompt you to make the very observation you have now made, I have provided myself with the three principal documents, and you shall see them; though I doubt whether you will at first sight understand them, or appreciate their importance; but, if you desire it, I will fully explain them to you."

With this he took out his pocket-book, and with much care took out three pieces of paper, folded up, which, after a brief preliminary explanation, he unfolded and read—Titmouse looking over his shoulder.

"Do I know the handwriting?" said Titmouse.

"Probably not," replied Gammon.

"It's a devilish queer old-fashioned sort of writing."

"It is, and when you consider—"

"Are all three in the same handwriting?" inquired Titmouse, taking them into his tremulous hand; while Gammon observed that his countenance indicated the despair which had taken possession of him.

"That cursed curtain is so much in the light," said Titmouse, looking up; and going towards it, as if to draw it aside, he started suddenly away from Gammon, and with frenzied gestures tore the little papers to pieces with inconceivable rapidity, and flung them out of the window, where a brisk breeze instantly took them up, and scattered them abroad—the glistening fragments—never to be again reunited.

Having performed this astounding feat, he instantly turned round, and leaning his back against the window, gazed at Gammon with a desperate air of mingled apprehension and triumph, but spoke not a word. Nor did Gammon; but—oh the smile with which he regarded Titmouse, as he slowly approached towards him! who stepping aside, as Gammon advanced, reached the cabinet, and with desperate rapidity threw open the door, and, as if the devil had been waiting his bidding, in a moment turned round upon Gammon with a pistol.

"So help me God, I'll fire!" gasped Titmouse, cocking and presenting it—"I will—I will—one!—two!—for God's sake! be off!—it's loaded, and no mistake!"

"Booby! you may put your pistol down, sir!" said Gammon, calmly and resolutely, a contemptuous smile passing over his pale features.

"Demme! distance!—Keep your distance!"

"Ridiculous simpleton!—you poor rogue!" said Gammon, laughingly. There was, however, murder in his smile; and Titmouse instinctively perceived it. He kept his deadly weapon pointed full at Gammon's breast.

Gammon stood, for a minute or two, gazing steadfastly, and without moving, at Titmouse; and then, shrugging his shoulders, with a bitter smile, returned to his chair, and resumed his seat. Titmouse, however, refused to follow his example.

"So help me God, sir! I will not hurt a hair of your head," said Gammon, solemnly. Still Titmouse remained at the window, pistol in hand. "Why should I hurt you? What have you to fear, you little idiot?" inquired Gammon impatiently. "Do you think you have injured me? Do you think me so great a fool, my little friend, as really to have trusted you with the precious originals, of which those were only the copies!—Copies which I can replace in a minute or two's time. The originals, believe me, are far away, and safe enough under lock and key."

"I—I—I—don't believe you," gasped Titmouse, dropping the hand that held the pistol, and speaking in a truly dismal tone.

"That does not signify, my worthy little friend," said Gammon, with a bitter smile, "if the fact be so. That you are a fool you must by this time even yourself begin to suspect; and you can't doubt that you are an arrant little rogue after what has just taken place? Eh? 'Twas a bright idea truly—well conceived and boldly executed. I give you all the credit for it; and it is only your misfortune that it was not successful. So let us now return to business. Uncock your pistol—replace it in your cabinet, and resume your seat, or in one minute's time, I leave you, and go direct!"

Titmouse, after a moment or two's pause of irresolution, passively obeyed—very nearly on the point of crying aloud with disappointment and impotent rage; and he and Gammon were again sitting opposite to one another.

Gammon was cold and collected—yet must it not have cost him a prodigious effort? Though he had told Titmouse that they were copies only which he had destroyed, they were, nevertheless, the ORIGINALS, which, with such an incredible indiscretion, he had trusted into the hands of Titmouse; they were the ORIGINALS which Titmouse had just scattered to the winds; and in so doing had suddenly broken to pieces the wand of the enchanter who had long exercised over him so mysterious and despotic an authority. How comes it, that we not unfrequently find men of the profoundest craft, just at the very crisis of their fortunes, thus unexpectedly and incredibly committing themselves?

"Are you now satisfied, Titmouse, that you are completely at my mercy, and at the same time totally undeserving of it?" said Gammon, speaking in a low and earnest tone, and with much of his former kindness of manner. To an observant eye, however, what was at that moment the real expression in that of Gammon? Soothing and gentle as was his voice, he felt as if he could instantly have destroyed the audacious little miscreant before him. "Do not, my dear Titmouse, madly make me your enemy—your enemy for life—but rather your friend—your watchful and powerful friend, whose every interest is identified with your own. Remember all that I have done and sacrificed for you—how I have racked my brain for you day and night—always relying on your ultimate gratitude. Oh, the endless scheming I have had to practice to conceal your fatal secret—and of which you shall ere long know more! During these last two years have I not ruinously neglected my own interests to look after yours?"

Gammon paused, and abruptly added—I have but to lift my finger, and this splendid dressing-gown of yours, Titmouse, is exchanged for a prison-jacket!"

"Oh Lord! oh Lord! oh Lord!" suddenly exclaimed Titmouse with a shudder—"I wish I were dead and forgotten! oh Lord! what shall I do? 'Pon my soul!"—he struck his forehead with some violence—"I'm going mad!"

"Consider, Titmouse, calmly, how reasonable and moderate is my offer!"—proceeded Gammon; who now and then experienced changes of color on the sudden recurrence of a sense of his last misfortune.

"Here's Lady Cicely to have £3,000 a-year."

"Not till after your death, my dear sir!"

"Then she shall have it directly; for curse me if I don't kill myself!"

"Then she would never have a farthing—for I should instantly produce the real heir!"

"Yah!" exclaimed Titmouse, uttering a sound like the sharp, furious bark of a cur, foiled at all points. He threw himself on the sofa, and folded his arms on his breast, compressing them as it were with convulsive vehemence.

"Do not excite yourself, Mr. Titmouse—you are still one of the most fortunate men upon earth, to have fallen into hands like mine, I can assure you! You will still enjoy a splendid income—little short of nine thousand a-year—for I will undertake to raise the Yatton rental, within a year or two, to twelve or thirteen thousand a-year, as I have often told you—I have explained to you over and over again, how absurdly under their value they were let in the time of!"

"And you've perhaps forgotten that I've borrowed nearly fifty thousand pounds—that costs nothing, I suppose!"

"Well, certainly, you must be a little careful for a year or two, that's all!"

"Demme, sir—I must give up my yacht!" exclaimed Titmouse, desperately, snapping his thumb and finger vehemently at Gammon.

"Yes—or Yatton," replied Gammon, sternly. "After all—what more shall I be than a sort of steward of yours?"

"I do n't want one," interrupted Titmouse; and, starting from the sofa, walked to the window, where he stood with his back turned toward Gammon, and crying! Gammon eyed him for several minutes in silence; and then slowly approaching him, tapped him briskly on the shoulder. Titmouse started.

"Come, sir—you have now, I hope, relieved your little feelings, and must attend to me—and be prompt. The time for trifling, and playing the baby, or the girl, is gone. Hark you, sir!—yield me my terms, or this day I will spring a mine under your feet, you little villain! that shall blow you into ten thousand atoms, and scatter them wider than even you scattered just now those bits of worthless paper. Do you hear that?"

As he said this, he took hold of the collar of Titmouse's dressing-gown, which Titmouse felt to be grasped by a hand, tightening momentarily, with the vehement emotion of Gammon. Titmouse made no reply; but gazed at Gammon with a countenance full of distress and terror.

"Pause and you are lost—stripped of this gaudy dress—turned out of this splendid house into the streets, or a prison! If I quit this room—and I will not wait much longer—without your plain and written consent to my terms, I shall go direct to my Lord Dreddlington, and tell him the obscure and base-born impostor that has crept!"

"Oh, Mr. Gammon, have mercy on me!" exclaimed Titmouse, shaking like an aspen-leaf—at length realizing the terrible extent of danger impending over him.

"Have mercy on yourself!" rejoined Gammon, sternly.

"I will—I'll do all you ask—I will, so help me!"

"I'm glad to hear it!" said Gammon, relaxing his hold of Titmouse; and, in a voice of returning kindness, adding—"Oh, Titmouse, Titmouse! how fearful would be the scene—when your noble father-in-law—you must have quitted the country! His lordship would have instantly divorced you from the Lady Cecilia!"

"You can't think how I love Lady Cicely!" exclaimed Titmouse, in a broken voice.

"Ay—but would she love you, if she knew who and what you were?"

"Oh Lord! oh Lord! I love Lady Cicely! I love Lady Cicely!"

"Then get pen, ink and paper, if you would not lose her for ever!"

"Here they are, Mr. Gammon!" exclaimed Titmouse, hastily stepping to his desk which lay on the table, and with tremulous eagerness got out a quire of writing paper and took a pen. "Suppose you write, Mr. Gammon," said he, suddenly—"my hand trembles so! Lord, I feel so sick! I'll sign any thing you like."

"Perhaps it would be better," replied Gammon, sitting down, and dipping his pen into the inkstand; "it may save time." He commenced writing; and, as he went on, said, at intervals—"Yes, Titmouse! Thank God, all is near over! It shall no longer be in Lord Dreddlington's power—no, nor any one's—to beggar you—to transport you—to take your noble wife from you."

"Oh, no, no! You know Lady Cicely's taken me for better for worse, for richer for poorer."

"Ah, Titmouse! But she did not know, when she said that, that she was speaking to a—"

"What! would n't it hold good?" exclaimed Titmouse, perfectly aghast.

"We need not speculate on a case that cannot arise, my dear Titmouse," replied Gammon, eyeing him steadfastly, and then resuming his writing. "This paper becomes, as they say at sea, your sheet-anchor!—Here you shall remain—the owner of Yatton—of this splendid house—husband of Lady Cecilia—a member of Parliament—and, in due time, as my Lord Drellincourt, take your place permanently in the Upper House of Parliament. Now, Mr. Titmouse, sign your name."

Titmouse eagerly took the pen, and, with a very trembling hand, affixed his signature to what Gammon had written.

"You'll sign it too, eh?" he inquired, timidly.

"Certainly, my dear Titmouse." Gammon affixed his signature, after a moment's consideration. "Now we are both bound—we are friends for life! Let us shake hands, my dear, dear Titmouse, to bind the bargain."

They did so, Gammon cordially taking into his hands each hand of Titmouse, who, in his anxiety and excitement never once thought of asking Mr. Gammon to allow him to read over what he had signed.

"Oh, Lord!" he exclaimed, heaving a very deep sigh, "I begin to feel something like again! It's really all right!"

"On my sacred word of honor," replied Gammon, laying his hand on his heart, "provided you perform the engagement into which you have this day entered."

"Never fear! honor bright!" said Titmouse, placing his on his heart with as solemn a look as he could assume.

Mr. Gammon having folded up the paper, put it into his pocket-book.

"I was a trifle too deep for you, Titmouse, eh?" said he, good-humoredly. "How could you be suppose me green enough to bring you the real documents?" he added, with perfect command of voice and feature.

"Where are they?" inquired Titmouse, timidly.

"At a banker's, in a double-iron strong-box, with three different locks."

"Lord! But, in course, you'll put them into the fire when I've performed my agreement, eh?"

Gammon looked at him for a moment, doubtful what answer to make to this unexpected question.

"My dear Titmouse," said he, at length, "I will be candid—I must preserve them—but no human eye shall ever see them except my own."

"My stars!—Excuse me!"—stammered Titmouse, uneasily.

"Never fear my honor, Titmouse! Have you ever had reason to do so?"

"No—never! It's quite true! And why don't you trust me?"

"Have you forgotten?—Did I not trust you—as you supposed—quickly subjoined Gammon, positively on the point of again committing himself—"and when you fancied you had the precious documents?"

"Oh! well!"—said Titmouse, his face flushing all over—"but that's all past and gone."

"You must rely on my honor—and I'll tell you why. What would be easier than for me to pretend to you that the papers which you might see me burn were really the originals—and yet be no such thing?"

"I course—yes; I see!" replied Titmouse—who, however, had really not comprehended the case which Gammon had put to him. "Well—but I say—excuse me, Mr. Gammon," said Titmouse, hesitatingly returning, as Gammon imagined, to the charge—"but—you said something about the real heir."

"Certainly. There is such a person."

"Well—but since you and I, you know, have made it up, and we are friends for life, eh? What's to be done with the fellow?—(betwixt ourselves!)"

"That is at present no concern—nay, it never will be any concern of yours or mine. Surely it is enough for you, that you are enjoying the rank and fortune belonging to some one else? Good gracious! I can't help reminding you—fancy the natural son of a cobbler—figuring away as the Right Honorable Lord Drellincourt—while all the while, the real Lord Drellincourt is—nay, at this moment, pining, poor soul! in poverty and obscurity."

"Well—I dare say he's used to it, so it can't hurt him much! But I've been thinking, Mr. Gammon, could n't get him—pressed? or enlisted into the army? He's a deuced deal better out of the way, you know, for both of us."

"Sir," interrupted Gammon, speaking very seriously, and even with a melancholy and apprehensive air—"leave the future to me. I have made all requisite arrangements; the only person on earth beside myself that can disturb them, is yourself."

Here a gentle tapping was heard at the door.

"Be off!" shouted Titmouse, with angry impatience; but Mr. Gammon, who was anxious himself to be gone, stepped to the door; opening it, a servant entered—a tall, graceful footman, with powdered hair, shoulder-knot, and blue and yellow livery—and who obsequiously intimated to Mr. Titmouse, that Signor Sol-fa had been in attendance for at least half-an-hour.

"A—a—I do n't sing to-day—let him come to-morrow," said Titmouse, and the servant withdrew.

"Farewell, Mr. Titmouse—I have a most important engagement awaiting me at the office—so I must take my leave. Will you execute the necessary documents as soon as they are ready? I will cause them to be prepared immediately."

"Oh! yes!"—and he added in a correction—"take care, Mr. Gammon, no one knows why."

"Leave that to me!"—Good morning, Mr. Titmouse," replied Gammon, buttoning his surcoat, and taking up his gloves and hat; and having shaken Titmouse by the hand, he was the next moment in the street—where he heaved a prodigious sigh—which, however, only momentarily relieved his pent-up bosom from the long-suppressed rage, the mortification, the wounded pride, and the wild apprehension with which it was nearly bursting. Why, what a sudden and serious disaster had befallen him! What but his own inconceivable folly had occasioned it? His own puppet had beaten him; and laid him prostrate: 'twas as though Prospero had permitted Caliban to wheedle him out of his wand! What could Gammon possibly have been thinking about, when he trusted the originals into the hands of Titmouse? As Gammon recognized no over-ruling Providence, he was completely at a loss to account for an act of such surpassing thoughtlessness and weakness as he had committed—at the mere recollection of which, as he walked along, he ground his teeth together with the vehemence of his emotions. After a while, he reflected that regrets were idle—the future, not the past, was to be considered; and how he had to deal with the new state of things which had so suddenly been brought about. All he had thenceforth to trust to, was his mastery over the fears of a fool. But was he really, on consideration, in a worse position than before? Had Titmouse turned restive at any time while Gammon possessed the documents in question, could Gammon have had more effectual control over him than he still had, while he had succeeded in persuading Titmouse that such documents were still in existence?—Could the legality of the transaction which Gammon sought to effect, be upheld one whit the more in the one case than in the other, if Titmouse took it into his head resolutely to resist? Again, could an arrangement of such magnitude, could so serious a diminution of Titmouse's income, remain long concealed from his father-in-law, Lord Dreddlington, who, Gammon knew, was every now and then indicating some anxiety on the subject of Titmouse's finances? Was it possible to suppose the Earl disposed to acquiesce, in any event, in such an arrangement? Suppose again Titmouse, in some moment of caprice, or under the influence of wine, should disclose to the Earl the arrangement which would have taken place; and that either sinking or revealing the true ground on which Mr. Gammon rested a claim of such magnitude? Gracious Heavens! thought Gammon—fancy the Earl really made acquainted with the true state of the case! What effect would so terrible a disclosure produce upon him?

Here a bold stroke occurred to Mr. Gammon: what if he were himself, as it were, to take the bull by the horns—to be before-hand with Titmouse, and apprise the Earl of the frightful calamity that had befallen him and his daughter? Gammon's whole frame vibrated with the bare imagining of the scene which would probably ensue. But what was the practical use to be made of it? The first shock over, if the old man, indeed survived it—would the possession of such a secret give Gammon a complete hold upon the Earl, and render him in effect obedient to his wishes? The objects which Gammon had originally proposed to himself, and unwaveringly fixed his eye upon amidst all the mazy tortuosities of his course, since taking up the cause of Tittlebat Titmouse, was his own permanent establishment in the upper sphere of society; above all, conscious that could he but once emerge into political life, his energies would ensure him speedy distinction. With an independent income of £2,000 a-year, he felt that he should be standing on sure ground. But even above and beyond these, there was one dazzling object of his hopes and wishes which, unattained, would render all others comparatively valueless—a union with Miss Aubrey. His heart fluttered within him at the bare notion of such an event. What effect would be produced upon that beautiful, that pure, high-minded, but haughty creature—for haughty to him had Kate Aubrey ever appeared—by a knowledge that he, Gammon, possessed the means—Bah! accused Titmouse! thought Gammon, his cheek suddenly blanching as he recollected that through him those means no longer existed—stay! unless, indeed—which would however, be all but impossible—perilous in the extreme. Absorbed with these reflections, he started on being accosted by the footman of the Earl of Dreddlington; who observing Gammon had ordered his carriage to draw up, to enable his lordship to speak to him. It was the end of Oxford Street nearest the City.

"Sir, Mr. Gammon, good day, sir!" commenced the Earl, with a slight appearance of disappointment, and even displeasure; "pray has anything unfortunate happened?"

"Unfortunate! I beg your lordship's pardon"—interrupted Gammon, coloring visibly, and gazing with surprise at the Earl.

"You do not generally, Mr. Gammon, forget your appointments. The Marquis, I, and the gentlemen of the Direction, have been waiting for you in vain at the office for a whole hour."

"Good Heaven's! my lord—I am confounded!" said Gammon suddenly recollecting the engagement he had made with the Earl; "I have forgotten everything in a sudden fit of indisposition, with which I have been seized at the house of a client at Bayswater. I can but apologize, my lord!"

"Sir, say no more; your looks are more than sufficient; and I beg that you will do me the honor to accept a seat in my carriage, and tell me whither you will be driven. I'm at your service, Mr. Gammon, for at least an hour: longer than that I cannot say, as I have to be at the House: you remember our two bills have to be forwarded a stage?"

Since his lordship was peremptory as politeness would permit him to be, in got Gammon, and named THE GUNPOWDER AND FRESHWATER COMPANY'S offices, in Lothbury, in the hopes of finding yet some gentlemen whom he had so sadly disappointed; and thither, having turned his horse's heads, drove the coachman.

"Sir, said the Earl, after much inquiry into the nature of Gammon's recent indisposition, "by the way, what can be the meaning of my Lord Tadpole's opposition to the second reading of our bill, No. 21?"

"We offered his lordship no shares, my lord, that is the secret. I saw him a few days ago, my lord, and he sounded me, upon the subject; but—I'm sure your lordship will understand—in a company such as ours, my lord!"

"Sir, I quite comprehend you, and I applaud your vigilant discrimination. Sir, in affairs of this description, in order to secure the confidence of the public, it is the matter of the last importance that none but men of the highest—by the way, Mr. Gammon, how are the GOLDEN EGG shares? Would you advise me to sell?"

"Hold, my lord, a little longer. We are going, in a few days' time, to publish some important information concerning the prospects of the undertaking, of the most brilliant character, and which cannot fail to raise the value of the shares. Has your lordship signed the deed yet?"

"Sir, I signed it last Saturday, in company with my lord Marmalade. I should not like to part with my interest in the company, you see—Mr. Gammon—hastily; but I am in your hands!"

"My lord, I am ever watchful of your lordship's interests."

"By the way, will you dine with me to-morrow? We shall be quite alone, and I am very anxious to obtain an accurate account of the present state of Mr. Titmouse's property; for, to tell you the truth, I have heard of one or two little matters that occasion me some uneasiness!"

"Can anything be more unfortunate, my lord? I am engaged out to dinner for the next three days—if indeed, I shall be well enough to go to any of them," said Gammon, with an agitation which could have escaped the observation of few persons except the Earl of Dreddlington.

"Sir, I exceedingly regret to hear it; let me trust that some day next week I shall be more fortunate. There are several matters on which I am desirous of consulting you. When did you last see Mr. Titmouse?"

"Let me see my lord—I don't think I've seen him since Monday last, when I casually met him in one of the committee-rooms of the House of Commons, where, by the way, he seems a pretty frequent attendant!"

"I'm glad to hear it," replied the Earl, somewhat gravely; and, as Gammon imagined, with a slight expression of surprise, or even distrust. Gammon therefore fancied that the Earl had recent intelligence of some of the wild pranks of his hopeful son-in-law, and wished to make inquiries concerning them of Gammon.

"Will you, sir, have the goodness to write off to-day to General Epaulette's solicitors, and tell them I wish to pay off immediately £12,000 of his mortgage? Oblige me, sir, by attending to this matter to-day; for I met the General the other day at dinner—and I might possibly have been mistaken, sir—but I fancied he looked at me as if he wished me to feel myself his debtor. Do you understand me, sir? It annoyed me; and I wish to get out of his hands as soon as possible."

"Rely upon it, my lord, it shall be attended to this very day," replied Gammon, scarcely able—troubled though he was—to suppress a smile at the increasing symptoms of pure-pride in the Earl, whose long empty coffers were being so rapidly and unexpectedly replenished by the various enterprises into which, under Gammon's auspices, his lordship had entered with equal energy and sagacity. While the Earl was speaking, the carriage drew up at the door of the company's office, and Gammon alighted. The Earl, however, finding that all the gentlemen whom he had left there had quitted, drove off westward, at a smart pace, and reached the House in time for the matters which he had mentioned to Mr. Gammon. That gentleman soon dropped the languid demeanor he had worn in Lord Dreddlington's presence, and addressed himself with energy and decision to a great number of important and difficult matters requiring his attention—principally connected with several of the public companies in which he was interested—and one of which, in particular, required the greatest possible care and tact, in order to prevent its bursting—prematurely. He had also to get through a considerable arrears of professional business, and to write several letters on the private business of Lord Dreddlington, and of Mr. Titmouse—respectively. Nay, he had one or two still more urgent calls upon his attention: the action against himself for £4,000 penalties, for bribery, arising out of the Yatton election, and as to which he had received, that afternoon, a very gloomy opinion from Mr. Lynx, who was advising him on his defence. Much in the same plight, also, were Messrs. Bloodsuck, Mudflint, and Woodlouse, for whom Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap were defending similar actions; and who were worried out of their lives by daily letters from their terror-stricken clients, as to the state, progress, and prospects of the several causes in which they were so deeply interested.

All these actions were being pressed forward by the plaintiffs with a view to trial at the ensuing Yorkshire Assizes; had been made, by the plaintiffs, special juries; and, infinitely to Gammon's vexation and alarm, he had found, on hurrying to retain Mr. Subtle, that he, Mr. Sterling, and Mr. Crystal, had been already retained for the plaintiffs! Lastly, he was dreadfully teased by an action of seduction, which had, a few days before, been brought against Mr. Titmouse; and which Gammon, finding it to be a very bad case, was making great efforts to compromise. To each and every of these matters, he gave the attention that was due—and, about seven o'clock, having finished his labors for the day, repaired, a good deal exhausted, to his chambers at Thavies' Inn. After a slight repast, he proceeded to draw up confidential "instructions" for Mr. Frankpledge, to frame the deeds necessary to carry into effect his contemplated arrangement with Titmouse. That did not take him long; and having sealed up his packet, and addressed it, he threw himself down on the sofa, and gave himself up to meditation, for he was aware that he was now, as it were, touching the very crisis of his fortunes. Again, again, and again he recurred to the incident of the day—the destruction of his documents by Titmouse; and cursed his own stupidity, even aloud. Yet he could not avoid indulging at the same time in secret pride and exultation at the admirable presence of mind which he had displayed—the successful skill with which he had encountered so sudden, singular, and serious an emergency. But what would be the effect of the destruction of those documents, upon certain secret arrangements of his connected with Titmouse's recovery of the Yatton property?—a question which occasioned Gammon great perplexity and apprehension. Then, as to Gammon's rent charge of £2,000 per annum on the Yatton property—he bethought himself, with no little uneasiness, of some expressions concerning Titmouse's property, let fall by the Earl that day: and if his lordship should persevere in his determination to become minutely acquainted with the state of Titmouse's property, how could the new and heavy incumbrance about to be laid upon it possibly escape discovery? and if it did, how was it to be accounted for, or supported? Confound it! It seemed as if fate were bent upon urging on a catastrophe!

"Shall I," thought Gammon, "wait till I am challenged on the subject, and then fire my shot, and bring his lordship down from the tight-rope? Then, however, I cannot but appear to have known the thing from the very beginning; and God knows what liabilities, civil or criminal—of fraud or conspiracy—may not be attached to what I have done! Shall I wait for a convenient, though early opportunity, and rush, with dismay and confusion, into the Earl's presence, as with a discovery only just made? By Heaven! but the thing wears already a very ugly appearance. If it comes out, what an uproar will be in the world! The lightning will fall upon my head first, unless I take care. The discovery will doubtless kill Lord Dreddlington; and as for his daughter, it may overturn the little reason she has!"

Passing from this subject, Gammon surveyed his other relations with the Earl, which were daily becoming more involved and critical. He had seduced his lordship into various mercantile speculations, such as had already placed him in a very questionable point of view, as taking advantage of the raging mania for bubble companies. In fact, Gammon had, by his skilful but not very scrupulous manoeuvring, already put into Lord Dreddlington's pocket some forty thousand pounds, and at the same time involved his lordship in liabilities which he never dreamed of, and even Gammon himself had not contemplated. Then he warmed with his apparent proximity to Parliament, (to that part of Titmouse's bargain Gammon resolved to hold him to the very letter,) which he was sure of entering on the very next election. By that time he would have realized a sum, through his connection with the various companies, which, even independently of the income to be derived thereafter from the Yatton property, would render him so far independent as to warrant him in dissolving partnership with Messrs. Quirk and Snap, and quitting at least the practice of the profession. He was a man of very powerful mind, possessing energies of the highest order, and for the development and display of which he felt, and fretted when he felt, his present position in society afforded him no scope whatever, still at least he had entered upon that series of bold but well-conceived plans and purposes with which he has been represented as occupied since the time when he first became the secret master of the fortunes of Titmouse. His ambition was boundless, and he felt within himself a capacity for the management of political affairs of no ordinary magnitude, could he but force himself into the regions where his energies and qualifications could be discovered and appreciated. Indeed I will undertake to say, that, had Gammon only been a good man, he would, in all probability, have become a great one. But, to proceed with the matters which were then occupying his busy brain. There was yet one upon which all his thoughts settled with a sort of agitating interest—his connection with the Aubreys; and whenever that name occurred to his thoughts, one beautiful image rose before him like that of an angel—I mean Miss Aubrey. She was the first object that ever excited in him the passion of love—that love, I mean, which is in a manner purified and sublimated from all grossness or sensuality by a due appreciation of intellectual and moral excellence. When he dwelt upon the person and character of Miss Aubrey, and for a moment realized the possibility of a union with her, he felt, as it were, elevated above himself. Then her person was very beautiful; and there was a certain bewitching something about her manners, which Gammon could only feel, not describe; in short, his passion for her had risen to a most extraordinary pitch of intensity, and became a sort of infatuation. In spite of all that had happened at Yatton, he had contrived to continue, and was at that moment on terms of considerable intimacy with the Aubreys, and had, moreover, been all the while so watchful over himself as to have given none of them any reason to suspect the state of his feelings toward Miss Aubrey; and, on the other hand, nothing had ever transpired to give him the slightest inkling of the state of matters between Miss Aubrey and Delamere—with the exception of one solitary circumstance which had at the moment excited his suspicions—Mr. Delamere's contesting the borough of Yatton.

Though he had watched for it, however, nothing had afterwards occurred calculated to confirm his suspicion. He had taken infinite pains to keep a good name in Vivian street, with great art representing, from time to time, his disgust for the conduct and character of Titmouse, and the reluctance with which he discharged his duty towards that gentleman. He made a point of alluding to the "gross and malignant insult" which had been offered at the hustings to the venerable vicar of Yatton, and which, he said, was a sudden suggestion of Mr. Titmouse's and carried into effect by "the vile Unitarian parson, Mudflint," in defiance of Mr. Gammon's wishes to the contrary. He represented himself as still haunted by the mild, reproachful, sorrowful, indignant look with which Dr. Tatham had regarded him, as though he had been the author of the insult. The account which appeared in the True Blue of his indignant interference on the occasion of Mr. Delamere's being struck on the hustings, was calculated, as Mr. Gammon conceived, to corroborate his representations, and aid the impression he was so anxious to produce. For the same reason Mr. Gammon, whenever he had been at Yatton, had acted with great caution and secrecy, so as to give no cause of offence to Dr. Tatham; to whom he from time to time complained, in confidence, of those very acts of Mr. Titmouse which had been dictated to him by Mr. Gammon. Thus reasoned Mr. Gammon; but it would indeed have been singular had he succeeded as he desired and expected. He lost sight of the proverbial influence of one's wishes over one's belief. In imagining that he had concealed from the Aubreys all the unfavorable features of his conduct, was he not, in some degree, exhibiting the folly of the bird that thrust its head only into the bush, and imagined that it had thereby concealed its whole body?

The Aubreys knew amply sufficient to warrant a general dislike and distrust of Mr. Gammon; but there existed grave reason, for avoiding any line of conduct which Gammon might choose to consider offensive. Mr. Aubrey justly regarding him as standing, at present, alone between him and some of his most serious liabilities. If Gammon, to accomplish objects to them undiscoverable, wore a mask—why challenge his enmity by attempting to tear off that mask? Mr. Aubrey governed his movements, therefore, with a prudent caution; and though, after the election, and the infamous decision of the election committee, Gammon was received at Vivian street—whither he went with no little anxiety and trepidation—it was with a visibly increased coolness and reserve, but still with studious courtesy; and beyond that distinct but delicate line, none of them ever advanced a hair's breadth, which Gammon observed with frequent and heavy misgivings. But he felt that something must at length be done, or attempted, to carry into effect his foad wishes with respect to Miss Aubrey. Months had elapsed, and their relative position seemed totally unchanged since the first evening that his manoeuvre had procured him a brief introduction to Mrs. Aubrey's drawing-room. In fact, he considered that the time had arrived for making known, in some way or other, the state of his feelings to Miss Aubrey; and after long deliberation, he resolved to do so without loss of time, and, moreover, personally. He had a heavy misgiving that he should be—at all events at first—unsuccessful; and now that, having taken his determination, he passed in rapid review all their intercourse, he perceived less and less ground for being sanguine; for he felt that Miss Aubrey's manner towards him had been throughout more cold and guarded than that of either Mr. or Mrs. Aubrey. Like a prudent general contemplating the contingencies of an important expedition, and calculating his means of encountering them, Gammon considered—persuasion failing—what means of compulsion had he? He came, at length, finally to the conclusion, that his resources were at that moment most available; and moreover, that his circumstances required an immediate move.

The very next day, about ten o'clock, he sallied forth from his chambers, and bent his steps towards Vivian street, intending to keep watch for at least a couple of hours, with a view to ascertain whether Mrs. Aubrey's going out alone, would afford him an opportunity of seeing Miss Aubrey, alone and undisturbed; reasonably reckoning on the absence of Mr. Aubrey at the Temple, whither he knew he always went about half-past nine o'clock. That day, however, Mr. Gammon watched in vain—during the time that he stayed, only the servants and the children quitted the door. The next day he walked deliberately close past the house; was that brilliant and tasteful performance on the piano hers! Again, however, he was unsuccessful. The next day, from a safe distance, he beheld both Mrs. and Miss Aubrey, accompanied by a female servant and the children, quit the house, and walk in the direction of the Park, whither he followed their movements with a beating heart. The next time, he saw Miss Aubrey leave the house accompanied only by little Charles, and he instantly turned his steps despondingly eastward. How little did either of those fair forms dream of the strict watch that was thus kept upon their every movement! Two days afterwards, however, Gammon's perseverance was rewarded; for shortly after eleven o'clock, he beheld Mrs. Aubrey, accompanied by the two children, quit the house, and turn towards the Park. Gammon's heart began to beat hard. Though he never cared much for dress, his appearance on the present occasion afforded indications of some little attention to it; and he appeared simply a well-dressed gentleman, in a dark blue buttoned surtout, with velvet collar, and plain black stock, as, after a moment's somewhat flurried pause, he knocked and rang at Mr. Aubrey's door.

"Is Mr. Aubrey within?" he inquired of the very pretty and respectable-looking maid-servant, who presently answered his summons.

"No, sir; he is never here after!"

"Perhaps Mrs. Aubrey?"

"No, sir; there is only Miss Aubrey at home; my mistress and the children are gone out into the Park, and Miss Aubrey is writing letters, or she would have gone with my mistress."

"Perhaps—I could see—Miss Aubrey for a moment?" inquired Gammon, with as matter-of-fact an air as he could assume.

"Certainly, sir—she is in the drawing-room. Will you walk up stairs?" said the girl, who of course knew him well, as not an infrequent visitor at the house. So she led the way up stairs, he following, and with somewhat fading color.

"Mr. Gammon!" he presently heard, as he stood on the landing, echoed in the rich and soft voice of Miss Aubrey, who seemed to speak in a tone of great surprise, in answer to the servant's announcement.

"Why, Fanny, did you not say that neither your master nor mistress were at home?" Gammon next heard hastily asked, in a lower tone, by Miss Aubrey, and his countenance fell a little; for there was a tone of displeasure, or chagrin, in her voice, especially as she added: "You should have said that I was engaged! Well, show him in, Fanny;" and the next moment Mr. Gammon found himself bowing his way towards Miss Aubrey, with whom, for the first time in his life, he found himself alone.

She was sitting writing at her desk, before which stood, in a small flower-glass, a beautiful moss-rose. There was a little air of negligence in the arrangement of her hair, and her light morning costume displayed her figure to infinite advantage. There was really something inexpressibly lovely in her whole appearance, seen, though she was, at that moment, by Gammon, through a faint mist of displeasure.

"Good morning, Mr. Gammon," she commenced, rising a little from her chair; and sinking again into it, slightly turned it towards him, gazing at him with some curiosity.

"May I venture to hope, madam, that I am not intruding upon you," said he, seating himself in the chair nearest to him, and placing his hat upon the ground.

"My brother always leaves at half-past nine; is he not at the Temple to-day, Mr. Gammon?" she added, a little eagerly—for the first time observing something unusual in the expression of his countenance.

"I—really do not know—in fact, I have not been there to-day; I thought it better, perhaps,"—he paused for a second.

"I sincerely trust, Mr. Gammon," interrupted Miss Aubrey, slightly changing color, and looking with great anxiety at Mr. Gammon—"that nothing unpleasant—unfortunate—has happened: do, pray, Mr. Gammon!" she continued earnestly, turning her chair full towards him—"for Heaven's sake, tell me!"

"I assure you, madam, upon my honor, that nothing whatever has happened, that I know of, since last we met."

"Oh dear—I was getting so alarmed!" said she, with a faint sigh, hastily putting back the curls which were clustering rather more luxuriantly than usual over her fair cheek.

"Certainly, madam; I have, however an errand—one to me, at least, of inexpressible importance," he commenced, and in a lower key than that in which he had previously spoken; and there was a peculiarity in his manner which quite rivetted Miss Aubrey's eye upon his expressive—and now, she saw, plainly agitated countenance. What can possibly be the matter? I thought she, as she made a courteous but somewhat formal inclination toward him, and said something about "begging him to proceed."

"I hope, madam, that comparatively few as have been my opportunities of becoming acquainted with it, I may venture to express my appreciation of your superior character."

"Really, sir," interrupted Miss Aubrey—"you are not candid with me. I am now certain that you have some unpleasant communication to make! Do, I entreat of you, Mr. Gammon, give me credit for a little presence of mind and firmness: let me know the worst, and be prepared to break it to my brother and sister." Gammon seemed unable to bear her bright blue eyes fixed upon his own, which he directed to the floor, while his cheek flushed. Then he looked again at her; and with an eye that explained all, and drove away the bloom from Miss Aubrey's cheek, while it also suspended, for a moment, her breathing.

"Oh, forgive me for an instant—for one moment bear with me, Miss Aubrey!" continued Gammon, in a voice of low and thrilling pathos, "this interview agitates me almost to death; it is that which for a thousand hours of intense, absorbing, agonizing doubts and fears, I have been looking forward to!" Miss Aubrey sat perfectly silent and motionless, gazing intently at him, with blanched cheek: he might have been addressing a Grecian statue. "And now—now that it has at last arrived—when I feel as if I were breathing a new—an intoxicating atmosphere, occasioned by your presence—by the sight of your surpassing loveliness!"

"Gracious mercy sir! what can you mean!" at length interrupted Miss Aubrey, with a slight start—at the same time slipping her chair a little farther from Mr. Gammon. "I declare, sir, I do not in the least understand you," she continued, with much energy; but her increasing paleness showed the effect which his extraordinary conduct had produced upon her. She made a strong and successful effort, however, to recover her self-possession.

"I perceive, madam, that you are agitated."

"I am, sir! astonished!—shocked!—I could not have imagined!"

"Madam! madam! at the risk of being deemed unkind—cruel—if I die for it, I cannot resist telling you that I reverence—I love you to a degree!"

"Oh, Heavens!" murmured Miss Aubrey, still gazing with an air of amazement at him. Several times she thought of rising to ring the bell, and at once get rid of so astounding an interruption and intrusion; but for several reasons she abstained from doing so as long as possible.

"It would be ridiculous, sir," said she, at length, with sudden spirit and dignity, "to affect ignorance of your meaning and intentions; but may I venture to ask what conduct of mine, what single act of mine, or word or look—has ever induced you to imagine, for one moment to believe?"

"Alas, madam, that which you could not conceal or control—your incomparable excellence—your beauty—loveliness—Madam! madam! the mere sight of your transcendent—my soul sunk prostrate before you the first moment that I ever saw you!"

All this was uttered by Gammon in a very low tone, and with passionate fervor of manner. Miss Aubrey trembled visibly, and had grown very cold. A little vinaigrette stood beside her; and its stinging stimulating powers were infinitely serviceable, and at length enabled her to make head against her rebellious feelings.

"I certainly ought to feel flattered, sir," said she, rapidly recovering herself, "by the high terms in which you are pleased to speak of me—of one who has not the slightest claim upon your good opinion. I really cannot conceive what conduct of mine can have led you to imagine that such an—an—application—as this could be successful—or received otherwise than with astonishment—and, if persisted in—displeasure, Mr. Gammon." This she said in her natural manner, and very pointedly.

"Miss Aubrey—permit me"—said Gammon, passionately.

"I cannot, sir; I have heard already too much; and I am sure, that when a lady requests a gentleman to desist from conduct which pains and shocks her—sir, I beg you will at once desist from addressing me in so very improper a strain and manner."

"Indulge my agonized feelings for one moment, Miss Aubrey," said Gammon, with desperate energy; "alas! I had suspected—I had feared—that our respective positions in society would lead you to despise so comparatively humble and obscure a person, in point of station and circumstances!"

"Sir!" exclaimed Kate, magnificently, drawing up her figure to its utmost height—her manner almost petrifying Gammon, whose last words she had most unaccountably imagined, at the moment, to amount to a bitter sarcastic allusion to their fallen fortunes, and diminished personal consequence in society; but she was quickly undeceived, as he proceeded fervently; "Yes, madam—your birth, your family connections, your transcendent mental and personal!"

"I—I—I beg your pardon, sir; I misunderstood you," said Kate, discovering her error, and coloring violently; "but it is even more painful to me to listen to the language you are addressing to me. Since you urge me to it, I beg you to understand, sir, that if by what you have been saying to me, I am to gather that you are making me an offer of your addresses—I decline them at once, most peremptorily, as a thing quite out of the question." The tone and manner in which this was said—the determination and hauteur perceptible in her striking and expressive features—blighted all the nascent hopes of Gammon; who turned perfectly pale, and looked the very image of misery and despair. The workings of his strongly marked features told of the agony of his feelings. Neither of them spoke for a few moments. "Alas! madam," at length he inquired, in a tremulous voice, "am I presumptuous, if I intimate a fear—which I dare hardly own to myself even—that I am too late; that there is some more fortunate?"

Miss Aubrey blushed scarlet. "Sir," said she, with quick indignant energy, "I should certainly consider such inquiries—most—presumptuous—most offensive—most unwarranted by anything that has ever passed between us;" and indeed her eye quite shone with indignation. Gammon gazed at her with piercing intensity, and spoke not.

"You cannot but be aware, sir, that you are greatly taxing my forbearance; nay, sir, I feel that you are taking a very great liberty in making any such inquiries or suggestions," continued Miss Aubrey, proudly, but more calmly; "but, as your manner is unobjectionable and respectful, I have no objection to say, sir, most unhesitatingly, that the reason you hint at is not in the least concerned in the answer I have given. I have declined your proposals, sir, simply because I choose to decline them—because I have not, nor ever could have, the least disposition to entertain them."

Gammon could not, at the moment, determine whether she really had or had not a pre-engagement.

"Madam, you would bear with me did you but know the exquisite suffering your words occasion me! Your hopeless tone and manner appear to my soul to consign it to perdition—to render me perfectly careless about life," said Gammon, with irresistible pathos: and Miss Aubrey, as she looked and listened, pitied him—"I might perhaps, establish some claim to your favor, were I at liberty to recount to you my long unwearied exertions to shield your brother—nay, all of you—from impending trouble and danger—to avert it from you."

"We are indeed deeply sensible of your kindness toward us, Mr. Gammon," replied Miss Aubrey, with her usual sweetness and fascinating frankness of manner, which now he could not bear to behold.

"Suffer me, Miss Aubrey, but one word more," he continued, eagerly, apprehensive that she was about to check him. "Were you but aware of the circumstances under which I come to throw myself at your feet—myself, and all I have—nor is that little, for I am in independent circumstances—I shall soon be in the House of Commons"—Miss Aubrey exhibited still more unequivocal symptoms of impatience—"and for ever have abandoned the hateful walk in life to which for the last few years"—

"I suppose I must listen to you, sir, however uselessly to yourself and disagreeable and painful to me. If, after all I have said, you choose to persevere," said Miss Aubrey, with calm displeasure—

But Gammon persevered. "I say, Miss Aubrey, that could you but catch a glimpse—one momentary glimpse—of the troubles which surround you all—infinity greater than any which you have ever yet experienced, severe and terrible though these have been—which are every day coming nearer and nearer to you"—

"What do you mean, Mr. Gammon?" interrupted Miss Aubrey, alarmedly.

"—And which, eager and anxious as may, and shall be, my efforts, I may be unable any longer to avert from you—you would at least appreciate the pure and disinterested motives with which I set out upon my truly disastrous mission."

"Once more, Mr. Gammon, I assure you that I feel—that we all of us feel—a lively gratitude toward you for the great services you have rendered us; but how can that possibly vary my resolution? Surely, Mr. Gammon, you will not require me to enter again upon a most unpleasant"—Gammon heaved a profound sigh. "With regard to your intimation of the danger which menaces us—alas! we have seen much trouble—and Providence may design us to see much more—I own, Mr. Gammon, that I am disturbed by what you have said to me on that subject."

"I have but one word more to say, madam," said Gammon, in a low impassioned tone, evidently preparing to sink upon one knee, and to assume an imploring attitude. On which Miss Aubrey rose from her chair, and, stepping back a pace or two, said, with great resolution, and in an indignant manner—"If you do not instantly resume your seat, sir, I shall ring the bell; for you are beginning to take advantage of my present defenceless position—you are persecuting me, and I will not suffer it. Sir, resume your seat, or I summon the servant into the room—a humiliation I could have wished to spare you."

Her voice was not half so imperative as was her eye. He felt that his cause was hopeless—he bowed profoundly, and said, in a low tone, "I obey you, madam."

Neither of them spoke for some moments. At length—"I am sure, sir," said Miss Aubrey, looking at her watch, "you will forgive me for reminding you that when you entered I was engaged writing letters"—and she glanced at her desk—"for which purpose alone it is that I am not now accompanying my sister and the children."

"I feel too painfully, madam, that I am intruding; but I shall soon cease to trouble you. Every one has some great bitterness to pass through at some time or other of his life—and I have this instant passed through mine," replied Gammon, gloomily. "I will not say that the bitterness of death is past; but I feel that life has henceforth, as far as I am concerned, nothing worth pursuing." Miss Aubrey remained silent while he spoke. "Before we part, Miss Aubrey, and close, as far as I—nay, as far, it may be, as both of us are concerned—a very memorable interview, I have yet one communication to make, to which you will listen with absorbing interest. It will be made to you in such confidence as, having heard it, you may consider yourself at liberty conscientiously to keep from every person upon earth; and I shall leave it to produce such effect upon you as it may."

"I shall not disguise from you, sir, that your manner and your language alarm me terribly," said Miss Aubrey, peculiarly struck by the sinister expression of his eye—one quite inconsistent with the sad, subdued, gentle tone and manner of his address. "I am not anxious to receive so dark and mysterious a communication as you hint at; and, if you choose to make it, I shall use my own discretion as to keeping it to myself, or mentioning to any one whom I may choose—of that I assure you. You see that I am agitated; I own it," she added, dropping her voice, and pressing her left hand against her side; "but I am prepared to hear anything you may choose to tell me—that I ought to hear. Have mercy, sir," she added, in a melting voice, "on a woman whose nerves you have already sufficiently shaken!"

Gammon gazed at her with a bright and passionate eye that would have drunk her very soul. After a moment's pause—"Madam, it is this," said he, in a very low tone: "I have the means—I declare in the presence of Heaven, and on the word and honor of a man"—[Oh, Gammon! Gammon! Gammon! have you forgotten what occurred between you and your friend Titmouse one short week ago? Strange, infatuated man! what can you mean? What if she should take you at your word?—of restoring to your brother all that he has lost—THE YATTON PROPERTY, Miss Aubrey—immediately—permanently—without fear of future disturbance—by due process of law—openly and most honorably."

"You are trifling with me, sir," gasped Miss Aubrey, faintly, very faintly—her cheek blanched, and her eye riveted upon that of Gammon.

"Before God, madam, I speak the truth," replied Gammon, solemnly.

Miss Aubrey seemed struggling ineffectually to heave a deep sigh, and pressed both hands upon her left side, over her heart.

"You are ill, very ill, Miss Aubrey," said Gammon, with alarm, rising from his chair. She also rose, rather hastily; turned toward the window, and with feeble trembling hands tried to open it, as if to relieve her faintness by the fresh air. But it was too late; poor Kate had been at length overpowered, and Gammon reached her just in time to receive her inanimate figure, which sunk into his arms. Never in his life had he been conscious of the feelings he that moment experienced, as he felt her pressure against his arm and knee, and gazed upon her beautiful but deathlike features. He felt as though he had been brought into momentary contact with an angel. Every fibre within him thrilled. She moved, she breathed not. He dared not kiss her lip, her cheek, her forehead, but raised her soft white hand to his lips, and kissed it with indescribable tenderness and reverence. Then, after a moment's pause of irresolution, he gently drew her to the sofa, and laid her down, supporting her head and applying her vinaigrette, till a deep-drawn sigh evidenced returning consciousness. Before she had opened her eyes, or could have become aware of the assistance he had rendered her, he had withdrawn to a respectful distance, and was gazing at her with deep anxiety. It was several minutes before her complete restoration—which, however, the fresh air entering through the windows, which Gammon hastily threw open, added to the incessant use of her vinaigrette, greatly accelerated.

"I hardly know, sir," she commenced, in a very low and faint tone of voice, and looking languidly at him, "whether I really heard you say, or only dreamed that I heard you say, something most extraordinary about Yatton?"

"I pray you, madam, to wait till you are completely restored; but it was indeed no dream—it was my voice which you heard utter the words you allude to; and when you can bear it, I am ready to repeat them as the words, indeed, of truth and soberness."

"I am ready now, sir—I beg you will say quickly what you have to say," replied Miss Aubrey, with returning firmness of tone and calmness of manner; at the same time passing her snowy handkerchief feebly over her forehead.

He repeated what he had said before. She listened with increasing excitement of manner; her emotions at length overmastered her, and she burst into tears, and wept for some moments unrestrainedly.

Gammon gazed at her in silence; and then, unable to bear the sight of her sufferings, turned aside his head, and gazed toward the opposite corner of the room. How little he thought, that the object on which his eyes accidentally settled, a most splendid harp, had been, only a few days before, presented to Miss Aubrey by Mr. Delamere!

"What misery, Miss Aubrey, has the sight of your distress occasioned me!" said Gammon, at length; "and yet why should my communication have distressed you?"

"I cannot doubt, Mr. Gammon, the truth of what you have so solemnly told me," she replied, in a tremulous voice; but will you not tell my unfortunate, my high-minded, my almost broken-hearted brother? Again she burst into a fit of weeping.

"Must I say it, Miss Aubrey?" presently inquired Gammon in a broken voice; "can I say it without occasioning what I dread more than I can express—your displeasure? The use to be made of my power rests with you alone."

She shook her head bitterly and despairingly, and hid her face in her handkerchief while he proceeded.

"One word—one blessed word from your lips—and before this very day shall have passed away, I strike down the wretched puppet that at present—replace your noble-minded brother at Yatton—restore you all to its delicious shades—Oh, Miss Aubrey, how you will love them! A thousand times dearer than ever! Every trace of the wretched idiot now there shall vanish; and let all this come to pass before I presume to claim!"

"It is impossible, sir," replied Miss Aubrey, with the calmness of despair, "even were you to place my brother on the throne of England. Is it not cruel—shocking—that if you know my brother is really entitled—nay, it is monstrous injustice. What may be the means at your command I know not; I shall not inquire; if it is to be purchased only on the terms you mention"—she involuntarily shuddered—"be it so, I cannot help it; and if my brother and his family must pine because I reject your addresses"—

"Say not that word, Miss Aubrey! Do not shut out all hope—Recall it! For God's sake consider the consequences to your brother—to his family. I tell you that malice and rapacity are at this moment gleaming like wild wolves within a few paces of you—ready to rush upon you. Did you but see them as distinctly as I do, you would indeed shudder and shrink!”

“I do, sir; but we trust in a merciful Providence,” replied Miss Aubrey, “and resign ourselves to the will of Heaven.”

“May not Heaven have brought about this meeting between us as a mode of?”

“Monstrous!” exclaimed Miss Aubrey, in a voice and with a look that for a moment silenced him.

“It is high time that you should leave me, sir,” presently said Miss Aubrey, determinedly. “I have suffered surely sufficiently already; and my first answer is also my last. I beg now, sir, that you will retire.”

“Madam, you are obeyed,” replied Gammon, rising, and speaking in a tone of sorrowful deference. He felt that his fate was sealed. “I now seem fully aware, to myself even, of the unwarrantable liberty I have taken, and solicit your forgiveness.” Miss Aubrey bowed to him loftily. “I will not presume to solicit your silence to Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey concerning this visit I have paid you?” he continued, very anxiously.

“I am not in the habit, sir, of concealing anything from my brother and sister; but I shall freely exercise my own discretion in the matter.”

“Well, madam,” said he, preparing to move toward the door, while Miss Aubrey raised her hand to the bell—“In taking leave of you,” he paused,—“let me hope, not for ever—receive my solemn assurance, given before Heaven! that, haughtily as you have repelled my advances this day, I will yet continue to do all that is in my power to avert the troubles now threatening your brother—which I fear, however, will be but of little avail! Farewell, farewell, Miss Aubrey!” he exclaimed; and was the next moment rapidly descending the stairs. Miss Aubrey, bursting afresh into tears, threw herself again upon the sofa, and continued long in a state of excessive agitation. Mr. Gammon walked eastward at a rapid pace, and in a state of mind which cannot be described. How he loathed the sight of Saffron Hill, and its disgusting approaches! He merely looked into the office for a moment, saying that he felt too much indisposed to attend to business; and then betook himself to his solitary chambers—a thousand times more solitary and cheerless than ever they had appeared before—where he remained in a sort of reverie for hours. About eleven o'clock, he was guilty of a strange piece of extravagance; for his fevered soul being unable to find rest anywhere, he set off for Vivian Street, and paced up and down it, with his eye constantly fixed upon Mr. Aubrey's house; he saw the lights disappear from the drawing-room, and re-appear in the bed-rooms: then also he watched out—still he lingered in the neighborhood, which seemed to have a sort of fatal fascination about it; and it was past three o'clock before exhausted in mind and body, he regained his chamber, and throwing himself upon the bed, slept from mere weariness.

STANLEY THORN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “VALENTINE VOX.”

CHAP. XXXVIII....The commencement of Stanley's speculation.

To those who have been accustomed to view only the unamiable portions of the female character, as developed on the one hand by the restless scheming creature of the world, and on the other by the designing hollow-hearted courtesan, the mean, cowardly practice of defrauding a woman is sport; but by married men who have studied the character deeply, and who appreciate those beautiful feelings by which it is essentially distinguished, that practice is happily held in abhorrence. Marriage induces a higher estimate of female virtue: it inspires men with a chivalrous, gallant spirit, of which the peculiar promptings are to those who never experienced the blessings which spring from the gentle characteristics of an amiable wife, altogether unknown; and hence Stanley—he being the only married man present during the performance of the disgraceful, cruel mockery detailed in the preceding chapter—was the only man by whom it was not viewed as a jest. But although he was thoroughly disgusted with the heartless conduct of his associates, he felt bound to fulfil the engagement into which he had entered, but from which he would then most gladly have withdrawn. He had no longer the slightest confidence in the men; he conceived it to be almost impossible for them to be actuated by any correct feeling,—still, having entered into the speculation so far, he was unable to see how he could with honor retire.

Having reflected upon the matter for some time, vainly hoping for something to suggest itself whereby the speculation might with grace be abandoned, he named the subject to Sir William, in order that he might, if possible, point out the means by which an honorable retreat could be accomplished.

“I feel so indignant,” said he, after explaining the manner in which the mock marriage had been conducted, “at having, although unconsciously, been made a party to so disreputable a proceeding, that I declare to you I would almost as soon forfeit the money I have engaged to put down, than have any farther connection with the men.”

“Had you taken my advice,” said Sir William, “you would not have entered into it at all; but I do not see how you can call off now.”

“Nor do I; and yet one might imagine that conduct like that which I have described would form a sufficient pretext for withdrawing?”

“Oh! you must not think for a moment of making that a pretext. Were you to do so, you would only get laughed at.”

“But do you not deem it disgraceful?”

“Why, I must say that, strictly speaking, it is not the thing; but in the circle, my dear fellow, in which they move, an affair of the kind is really thought but little of. Had he married the girl in reality, the case would have been widely different—it would then have been considered disgraceful indeed: but as it is, being merely a nominal marriage, which may at any moment be dissolved, why, his family are free from the stain of a low alliance, and his friends look upon him of course as before.”

“Notwithstanding, he has utterly destroyed that poor girl by blasting her happiness forever.”

“The conduct of men of high connections must not, my good fellow, be scrutinized too closely. You must consider the peculiarity of their position. Suppose for instance, now, that this had been an absolute marriage, what must of necessity have followed? Why, his family, who would have considered themselves thereby eternally disgraced, would have spurned him for being a fool.”

“But this is no justification—”

“Justification! I grant you. But a family of this description would rather there should be five hundred mock marriages than a real one with a creature of plebeian origin, unless, indeed, she possess a mine of wealth. The influence of affection or love in such a case is never allowed; they'll not hear it. Rank or wealth, Thorne,—rank or wealth. No other influence can possibly be recognized by them. And perhaps it is as well that it is so.”

“Conceive, for example, the absurdity of such an announcement as this:—‘MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We have authority to state, that the Earl of Clarendale will shortly lead to the hymeneal altar Miss Sophonisba Gills, the lovely daughter of the late Mr. Timothy Gills, for many years the confidential carman of the celebrated Jonas Carp, Esq. the distinguished fishmonger of Billingsgate Market.’—Why it would throw every member of the noble family into fits, while the bridegroom himself would become the legitimate laughing-stock of the world. And then look at the position of the girl. Would it not be one of perpetual misery? Even suppose she were received by the family in question, their very courtesy would make her wretched, if even their sarcasms failed to break her heart. The absurdity of persons wishing to form alliances in a sphere far above that in which they have been accustomed to move is really monstrous. As far as happiness is concerned, the ambition is fatal if the object be attained. They cannot be happy. Even their servants will sneer at the meanness of their birth. In a word, Thorne, the belief that anything but bitter mortification on either side can spring from a marriage of this character is based upon ignorance the most gross.”

“All this I admit to be correct,” rejoined Stanley. “In an essentially artificial state of society it invariably is so; and none but densely ignorant persons would dream of forming such a connection. But this is not the point—”

“Why, it proves that this girl, for example, as far as regards her happiness, is not in a worse position than she would have been had the earl really married her.”

“But it does not prove the conduct of the Earl to be a whit less disgraceful.”

“Granted!—as far as that goes; but it does not by any means follow, that because men of his caste delude a lot of ignorant girls, whom they consider fair game, they should therefore be incapable of acting in all other respects with strict honor. As I said before, Thorne, I regret that you ever entered into this speculation; not because this affair has occurred, for that is too paltry to be considered for a moment but because I conceive that the profits, whatever they may be, will never be commensurate with the trouble it may occasion. As however, you are in it, I cannot see how you can well call off.”

Nor could Stanley. The disgust with which the heartless proceeding had inspired him was not in the slightest degree diminished; his confidence in the honor of his new associates had not by the arguments of Sir William been to any extent increased; still, jealous of his reputation as a man of spirit, anxious to be deemed by all a high-toned fellow, and therefore dreading the possibility of being suspected of meanness, or even of irresolution, he determined at once to go on with the speculation precisely as if nothing of a disreputable character had occurred.

In pursuance of this determination, he in the course of the day called upon Captain Filcher, whom he found most appropriately engaged in the honorable occupation of fixing an entirely new roulette table, the secret springs of which had been constructed with surpassing ingenuity.

“My dear fellow!” exclaimed the gallant Captain, as Stanley entered, “I am positively too glad to see you. I feared that something queer had occurred, you cut away so abruptly. You should have stopped. Oh! I'd have given the world if you had remained. We kept it up till daylight; and such sport! I thought I should have died. But how came you to leave us so early?”

“I was anxious to get away,” replied Stanley; “and I always find that the safest course to adopt in such a case is that of leaving without giving even the slightest intimation.”

“And so it is; but I am nevertheless sorry you started.” Which was perfectly true. The sorrow expressed was entertained very sincerely, and moreover very affectionately, considering that he and a bosom friend had laid a well-conceived plan for fleecing Stanley to a highly respectable extent. “But I say, my dear fellow,” he continued, “those bills, now—I have not the cash for them yet. It seems strange, but the money market is in such a state. I've been about them this morning. Four-and-twenty bills returned in three days—that tells a little tale! However, I left them; but if you have any channel, I'll get them out of his hands.”

“I can do nothing with them,” said Stanley.

“Oh! well then, a day or two probably will be of no importance?”

“None whatever.”

“I always like these things to be done at once; but to-morrow, or the next day, I shall be able, no doubt, to get a cheque for the amount.”

“That will do quite as well,” replied Stanley. “But when do we commence operations?”

“Why, I should say this day week. As far as the play is concerned, you see everything now is nearly ready; but there are rooms to be fitted up for the Countess.”

“Will she reside here?”

“Oh! yes; and mamma is to be the comptroller of the household.”

“Indeed! When do they return?”

“To-morrow, I hear; and some excellent sport we shall have. Did you ever see anything more admirably managed? Oh! the whole thing was capital!”

Stanley made no observation upon this, but directed his attention to the arrangement of the tables, more with a view of changing the subject than of ascertaining what had been done. The Captain, however, entered into a variety of minute explanations having reference to the course they intended to pursue; and when he had explained all he wished him to know, Stanley left with the understanding that he was to call the next morning for the cheque.

On the following day he accordingly went: but the Captain had been still unsuccessful. He was to have it the next day; and he called the next day, and the next; in short, he continued to call day after day until the time had been fixed for putting down the first five hundred each, as per agreement, when he mortgaged his estate for the two thousand pounds, and regretted that he had not pursued this course at once, without exposing his poverty to the Captain.

Having effected this mortgage, he at once expressed his sorrow to that gallant person that he should have given him so much trouble, and stated, that as he had then sufficient money in his possession, he no longer required the bills to be done.

“I am glad to hear it,” said the Captain, on receiving this intelligence, “although I gave them this morning to a friend of mine who promised to bring me the cash in the course of the day. But as it is, why, they had better be destroyed. I regret exceedingly that I should have been unable to get the thing done without delay; but you know what bill-discounters are.”

“I've never had anything to do with them,” said Stanley; “but I believe they are not angels.”

“Angels!—devils, sir—absolute devils. However, I'll get the bills together and see that they are destroyed.”

Stanley thanked him, and was satisfied. Scarcely knowing the nature of bills, it never struck him that he himself ought to see them destroyed; and if it had, he possessed too much delicacy to hint that he deemed it essential. That, in his view, would have been a direct imputation upon the honor of the Captain, which he would not have cast, even if he had thought of the possibility of the bills getting into circulation; but the fact is, as the Captain undertook to destroy them, he thought nothing more about the matter.

The time now arrived for making up the first bank to commence with, and they met at their own club, which they had named the European, and put down five hundred pounds each. The Earl and his friends, however, manifested no inconsiderable surprise at the unaccustomed promptitude of the Captain in this particular. They evidently anticipated nothing more substantial from him than an I. O. U., and therefore looked at each other with great significance when, on drawing forth his pocket-book, he put down ten fifties with the air of a man having the power to produce fifty more of the same sort at a moment's notice. It was held to be mysterious obviously by them all, although nothing was said on the subject at the time. The money was taken, the bank was formed, and the “European” opened the following night.

CHAPTER XXXIX....Is one which the ladies will appreciate highly.

“Now, my precious,” observed Mrs. Gills, addressing the “Countess,” the morning after the speculation had commenced, “now your spirits is a little bit tranquil, you know, you must begin to look about you as a lady of title ought, and take care you're not imposed upon, or anything of that; because now you are a Countess, my dear, you must do, of course, as Countesses does, and keep up a proper spirit and dignity.”

“Yes, ma,” mildly replied the Countess.

“Nor you mustn't be put off neither, my dear. You must have your own way, as all Countesses has. Insist upon having all you want, and you'll get it.”

“But I have all I want, ma, already.”

“Nonsense, child!—truly ridiculous! Oh! do n't tell me! You ought to have a separate carriage, and a box at the operer, and give a splendid series of parties, and all that, and have all the new novels, and harps, and pianers—”

“But you know, ma, I never learned to play.”

“What of that? The whole world needn't know it. When you give a soiree, you know, or anything of that, engage them to play, my love, as gets their living by it. Countesses never play in public. Don't you know, my dear, that that's beneath their dignity? Never try to play, and then nobody'll know you can't. There's no occasion to tell the world what you do n't know.”

“No, ma, no more there is n't.”

“Very well, then, my dear, then you don't ought to do it.”

“I won't, ma; I'll always make believe that I can play.”

“In course. And mind, never suffer them stuck up things of servants to address you as anything but ‘my lady,’ or ‘your ladyship.’—‘Did your ladyship please to ring for me, my lady?’—‘May it please your ladyship,’ and so on. I'm not sure it don't ought to be ‘your grace;’ but ‘your ladyship’ will do for the present. Be sure and make 'em stick to that; if they dox't, ask 'em who they are speaking to with their impudence. Mind that particular. Always keep them gals at a respectable distance: they are sure to take liberties where they can. If you give 'em an inch, they'll take an ell, and you don't ought to do it. Always know what is due your dignity, my precious, and make 'em conduct themselves in a way as becomes 'em. Look at that low vulgar feller, the porter. The ideor of bringing up the baker's bill in his naked hand, for all the world as if there want a piece of plate upon the premises. And then look at that impudent thing, Susan. She's always agigling and going on. I see her, although she thinks I don't. What does she mean, I should like to know? Perhaps she thinks the situation ain't good enough for her. I'd give her a month's warning: she don't know her place. I don't think she's much better than she should be, my dear. Look at her curls! What business has a low common housemaid with all them there curls! Twelve pounds a-year, my love, won't support that. Besides, she don't treat me with proper respect; and I'd have her to know, that although I am not a Countess myself, I'm mother of a Countess, and that, too, of as good a Countess as any in the kingdom. What does she mean by laughing, and sneering, and opening her ignorant eyes to other servants, when I'm giving 'em the necessary orders? Does she think I'll put up with her low-bred ways? The insolence of such dressed up things is exclusive. Either she or me must quit."

"Dear ma," observed the Countess, "don't drop yourself down to the level of her."

"I drop myself down to her level! No, my love; I think I do know myself better than that comes to. Her level! I don't think I'd go quite so low as that, neither!"

"Well, never mind, ma; I'll give her warning."

"In course. And very proper. I shall make a woman of spirit of you yet. But that, my darling, isn't all. You mustn't let the noble Earl take no advantage of your innocence; for Earls is but men, and all men in this regard is alike; they'll all impose where they can; and you don't ought to suffer him to do it. Assume enough my precious. Begin as you mean to go on. There's nothing like striking the iron while it's hot. It saves a world of trouble, my dear. If you wait till a man gets cool, you'll find him very difficult to bend to your own shape; but if you tell him at first what you mean, you establish your dignity, and when he knows he has to expect, why, he ain't after that disappointed. You take my advice, my love, and insist upon doing what you please; there's nothing like it. A woman ain't a woman of spirit as don't, and especially a Countess. You must go out a-patternizing people, particular them foreigners as sings; and give blankets away to the poor in cold weather: it all tells, my love, to make a noise in the world. And when you a-shopping, make 'em bring the goods out to the carriage, instead of going in; and when you don't want your carriage, have your footman behind you with a long stick, with a large gold knob at the top. Nothing on earth my dear, looks so respectable as that; and the taller the footman, and the longer the stick is, the better. Besides, you have n't been to court yet; nor I have n't seen your name a single once in the papers! And another thing, the Earl has n't once introduced you to his family!"

"Oh! ma!" exclaimed the Countess, "I should tremble like anything, I know, if he was."

"Tremble! Fiddledede! Why should you tremble? You're as good as them any day in the week."

"Oh dear, ma! I shiver at the thought. What I should do when I saw 'em I can't think. I am sure I should turn as pale as a I don't know what."

"Pale, my precious! What do that signifies? Paint—all Countesses paints—and then nobody'll know whether you turn pale or not."

"Oh! but I should feel so queer, I know I should."

"Rubbish, my love! What's to make you feel queer? Always look upon people as being beneath you; there's nothing on earth gives such confidence as that. If you look up to them, they'll look down upon you; that's the way people gets over people, my precious. And then there's another thing: where is your cards? I never heard of such a thing as a Countess without cards! We'll go and order 'em this blessed morning, my love, and have your court of arms upon 'em, you know, and all that. Nothing can be done without cards. And then I'll tell you what we'll do while we're about it. Dear me! now, how strange it never struck me before!—it will be the very thing—my love, we'll order a whole lot of invitation cards at the same time. And then we'll get up a party, and invite all the other nobility in town; all the Duchesses, and all the Marquises, and all the Earls, and all the foreign ambassadors and their suits. Oh! we'll have such a jolly night of it, my precious!"

"But will my lord like it?"

"There's not the least occasion, my love, to let him know anything about it until they all come, and then, oh! won't it be an agreeable surprise! But let's see—who can we get now to manage it all for us? It must be somebody that knows all about it, you know. There's the Captain; but I don't like that Captain: he's always a-sneering and smirking, and going on so, as if he war n't as good as him, and a precious sight better. I can't a-bear such ways!"

"There's Mr. Thorn, ma!" suggested the Countess.

"Ah! he's a nice gentleman. He'd be the one. He knows how to behave himself. Nobody can conduct themselves more gentlemanly than him. He'll manage it for us. I know he will, if I ask him."

At this moment Stanley was dashing down street in his cab, with the view of ascertaining the result of the previous night's play; but as, on pulling up, he happened to see a person in livery at the door of the European, he laid the whip into Marmion with so much effect, that the animal, darting off in an instant, left Bob, who had got down with all his wonted alacrity, a considerable distance in the rear before he had time to recover his faculties. The whole of which had been thus unceremoniously upset. Feeling, however, that he had not a single moment to lose, and being, moreover, extremely swift of foot, he by virtue of making a desperate rush, soon overtook the cab, and remounted.

"Well," he exclaimed, "I should on'y just like to know what's o'clock now! There's something in the weather-glass, safe! As true as I'm alive, I do n't know what's come to all the masters. It's my belief they're all a-going stark naked mad. Here's a mess—here's a pickle!"—he added, taking a retrospective view of his clothes—"splashed up to the very eyes!—a full hour and arf's brushing; it ain't to be done under. I'm blessed if it ain't enough to aggravate a bishop. If he did n't mean to stop there at all, what did he make believe to pull up for?"

That was the point; and while Bob was thus occupied in giving expression to his own private feelings upon it, Stanley's rage was unbounded; for as Venerable Joe was the person whom he saw—but whom Bob in his desperate haste failed to see—he leaped at once to the conclusion that the General, having heard of the speculation into which he had entered, had planted him there as a spy.

Such was, however, by no means the fact; and, in order to prove that it was not, it will be highly correct to accompany the venerable gentleman, who, after laughing very heartily at Bob's rapid movements, and wondering very naturally what it all meant, was admitted between the outer doors of the "European," when he sent up his name to Mrs. Gills, whom he had had the honor of knowing for a series of years.

Mrs. Gills, on the name being announced, blushed deeply as she repeated it again and again, marvelling who, in the name of all that was gracious, it could be, and bit her lips with due violence as she protested that the singular cognomen of the individual lived not in her memory; still she thought somehow she had heard the name somewhere—but where? Eventually, by a miracle, she recollected that there was a sort of person of that name in the service of General Johnson, a very intimate friend of hers, from whom, she had no doubt on earth, this person had brought some strictly confidential communication. She therefore directed the servant to show the person into the parlor; and, after having explained most lucidly to the Countess how essential to the preservation of dignity it was to repudiate all low connections, descended from the drawing-room with all the severity of aspect and stateliness of deportment at her command.

On entering the room in which the venerable gentleman stood, marvelling greatly at the fact of his being shown into a parlor, Mrs. Gills reared her chin, and bowed with such surpassing grace, that in an instant he felt friendship freezing. He nevertheless approached, and was about to take her hand, which, however, she with a truly icy elegance waved towards a chair, and with an expression of sublimity desired him to be seated.

"Your manners is very cold, Mrs. Gills," observed the venerable gentleman, who could not but deem all this deeply mysterious. "Have I offended you in anything?"

"Oh, dear me, no!" replied the lady, tossing her head with a most superb air.

"Oh! I thought p'raps I had," rejoined the venerable gentleman, "as you seem to be werry much changed. I should n't a-called, on'y I appened to 'ear that Sophy was married."

"My daughter, sir, the Countess of Clarendale, is married," returned Mrs. Gills, with great dignity.

The venerable gentleman looked amazed. Could he believe it? Could he believe that the same individual Sophy, whom Mrs. Gills tried so extremely hard to plant upon him, was a Countess? He was about to take a comprehensive view of the matter, in order to ascertain whether he could really believe it or not; but Mrs. Gills interposed at the moment an observation, which rendered his imaginative faculties subservient to the influence of straight-forward facts.

"As circumstances is so much changed,"—this was the memorable observation—"and as you must in course be aware that there's now a propriety as is proper to be observed, may I inquire your object in honoring us with this visit?"

"Oh! I on'y merely thought I'd look in to give Sophy—I mean the Countess—joy."

"Sir," said the lady, apparently quite shocked at the vulgar idea, "I'd have you understand that my son-in-law, the noble Earl, ain't a mechanic."

"I did n't suppose he vos. There's werry few noble Hurls as is. But can't I see the Countess. I should like to see her."

"Impossible. It aint because I'm proud, no; but what would the noble Earl say? Why, he'd think it a disgrace to his 'scutcheon."

"It strikes me forcible," said the venerable gentleman, who felt rather piqued, "that half what you know about 'scutcheons, ain't much."

"Well, I'm sure! I'd have you to know I do n't tolerate no insolence, and so you need n't come it."

"Oh! werry well, mum. But I must say, as a hold friend, I did n't expect to be treated in this 'ere upish way."

"You may think yourself honored that I saw you at all. I know I did n't ought to do it; but I beg, sir, that in future we may n't be troubled by your calling any more."

"Oh! that you may take your oath on. But as I remember there's a little trifle atween us of seventeen and sixteen, p'raps it von't be inconvenient for you to settle without my summoning on you to the court of requests?"

"What do you mean to insinuate?" cried the lady,—"seventeen and sixteen, or seventeen hundred pound seventeen and sixteen; it's all one to me! I'll discharge the paltry sum, sir, immediate! what do you mean?"

Mrs. Gills, being highly indignant, was about to bounce out of the room for her purse, when the folding-doors opened, and the Countess, who had been listening in the adjoining room, appeared.

"Dear ma!" she exclaimed, "here's a purse; but do n't be angry with Mr. Joseph. You know he has always been kind to us, ma."

And she extended her hand to the venerable gentleman, who was about to receive it with the utmost respect, when Mrs. Gills promptly interposed her person, exclaiming,

"My precious! What would the noble Earl say? what would he think were he to see you shaking hands with a person in livery? Fie! my love, fie! I'm putrified to think that you have n't more respect for your dignity."

"Well, ma, I'm sure there's no harm in shaking hands."

"There is harm, my love! Gracious! what would the world say? What would be thought of you in high life? Why, you would n't be received in good society! Consider!"

"My lady," said the venerable gentleman—"for though it seems very rum, I am still glad to call you my lady—I vornt at all aware as you'd married a Hurl, or I shoed n't a come; no, I know my place better; but I s'pose they vos havin' a game vi'me rayther ven they giv me your address, and said they thought I ought to call. However, I'm glad to 'ear of your good fortune, and give you joy, and 'ope you'll always be 'appy; but I must say your mother aint treated me vell; cos under the circumstances, knowin' her so vell as I have done so long, and bein' always werry glad to do all I could to serve her ven she vos but a servant like myself, I do think that if haven't you'd become the Queen of Hingland, she ought n't to be so stuck up."

During the delivery of this eloquent speech, Mrs. Gills, with excessive hautecur, was counting out the seventeen and sixteen, and having done so, in due form tendered the amount. But the venerable gentleman disdained to receive it.

"I'll not touch it!" he exclaimed with magnanimity. "No; it ain't that as I care for; twenty times the sum don't make no hods to me!"

"But I insist!" cried the lady.

"So you may, mum; but I'd just as soon touch a dose of p'son."

"But you shall have it, sir!"

"Not a penny on it. No; I wish you a werry good day, mum. I do n't," he continued, addressing the Countess, "mean any disrespect to your ladyship. I voodn't offend you for the world; but it's a hold sayin' an' a true un about the beggar on oosback." And hereupon, feeling much better in consequence of having made this observation, he quitted the house.

"The low-bred creature!" exclaimed Mrs. Gills, as the venerable gentleman departed.

"But you should n't go on so, ma," said the Countess. "People don't like it."

"Of what importance to us, child, what such people like, or what they do n't like? You must know what is due to your own dignity, my love, or you'll never be fit to be a Countess. I declare I'm in such a frustration, I do n't know how to contain myself. Oh, I only wish for his sake I'd been a man."

Before the nerves of this amiable lady had become tranquil, Stanley, having taken an impetuous sweep round the Park, returned with the full determination to enter the club, no matter who might be on the watch. Bob, however, allowed him to make a dead stop before he attempted again to alight, for he felt, and very naturally, that he had enough running for one day at least.

"You look like a scavenger," said Stanley, as Bob approached Marmion's head. "Where did you pick up that mud?"

"A pelting arter you, sir, when you made believe to stop here afore," replied Bob.

Stanley smiled as he entered the house, and Bob thought that his reply was particularly pointed and severe; and he winked confidentially at Marmion on the door being closed, with the view to intimating to that sagacious animal that that really was his unbiased opinion. "It strikes me I shut up his shop then," he observed. "There's nothing like getting the best of a master. Directly they find out they're wrong, they cuts their sticks with their tails atween their legs, dead beat."

On entering the principal play-room, Stanley ascertained from one of the attendants that the bank had been on the previous night well nigh broken. He was also informed that the persons who had won had signified their intention of playing that night, when, doubtless, the luck would be changed; and that it was deemed by the highest authorities politic to let a bank lose at first, in order not only to stimulate players, but to inspire due confidence by virtue of its stability being tested.

To this fellow's description of the extraordinary "run of luck" which had characterized the play, Stanley listened with the most marked attention. The prospect seemed cheerless. Two thousand five hundred pounds lost in one night. His high hopes were depressed. It was a "Bear" account with him; and yet, why should he despair? Had not the Earl himself told him before they commenced that they ought as a matter of course to lose at first? Why then should he feel disappointed? He tried to revive his hopes by looking upon their depression under the circumstances as the mere result of folly; and having learned that his partners in the speculation had appointed to meet at eight, for the purpose of replenishing the bank, he was about to take leave, when he was formally summoned by the Countess and her mamma.

On entering the drawing-room, he was received with unusual parade. Mrs. Gills was particularly fussy, and hoped that he was well, and rang for the cake and wine, and most eloquently labored to convey to him an idea of the delight she was sure she should derive from an early introduction to Mrs. Thorn. "Oh! do bring her with you some day," she continued, "and let us have a quiet cup of tea. It will be so delightful you can't think. I'm sure she's a dear nice lady: I am sure of it, judging from you."

Stanley smiled, and acknowledged the compliment profoundly, and said all that was necessary to convince Mrs. Gills, that he thought her extremely polite.

"And now, Mr. Thorn, I've a secret," she continued—"a secret which I don't want anybody to know on but you. I know I can trust you, and I'm sure you'll assist us. The fact is, my daughter, the Countess, and me, is a-thinking of getting up a party, for we finds it very lonely a-mumping here alone. Now, in course you know all about the other nobility, the Dukes, Lords, Wiscounts, Ambassadors, and such like; and, as we have never yet given a jollification, all we want is for you just to put us in the way of it."

"I should think," returned Stanley, "that the Earl would be the more proper person to apply to."

"Oh! but we want to do it unbeknown to him! We want to surprise him! to show him just what we can do. Oh, it will be so glorious! You and Mrs. Thorn must come and meet all the nobility. Oh! we shall have such a frolic!"

Stanley could not help laughing. He thought the conception excessively rich, and one that ought to be carried into immediate execution. Feeling, however, that he was not in a position to enter into the spirit of the thing himself, he advised them to apply to Captain Filcher, whom he described as being perfectly conversant with matters of that description, and who, he doubted not, would be but too happy to aid them.

"But does he know all about the invitation-cards, the etiquettes, and all that?" inquired Mrs. Gills anxiously.

"My firm impression is," replied Stanley, "that in a case of this peculiar character you cannot have the aid of a more useful man."

"Oh, well then, I'm sure I'll apply to him. I'm certain he won't refuse. But do you think he'll keep the thing a secret?"

"I have not the slightest doubt of it," said Stanley. Nor had he. He believed him to be the very man to carry out the idea to perfection; and having explained to them how strongly he felt that the Captain would be delighted to serve them in such a merry cause, he received their warmest thanks and departed.

CHAPTER XL.—Is one which Gentlemen will not condemn.

As the bank was impoverished every night, notwithstanding immense sums of money were lost by the majority of the players, Stanley soon began to view the speculation as a failure. He thought it strange, that with the chances in favor of the table, and experienced men for managers, the bank should so constantly lose; and that he did think it strange was not extraordinary, seeing that he was perfectly unconscious of the fact that the projectors of the scheme, through the instrumentality of confederates, were realising fortunes. He knew nothing of the villainous system pursued: he had no idea of knaves being deputed nightly by the two persons with whom the speculation originated, to fleece the fair players, and to plunder the bank. He thought that, of course, all was square as far as they were concerned, and yet it struck him as being singular that their spirits should be raised after each night's loss. Instead, however, of thinking of confederacy, false dice, "despatching," and "securing," and thereby attributing all to the true cause, he imbibed the pernicious, soul-enslaving doctrine of Destiny, and madly ascribed all his losses to Fate.

This made him wretched, irascible, and occasionally, although perhaps involuntarily, brutal. He was satisfied with nothing: everything displeased him: trifles, at which before he would have smiled, now inspired him with rage; in his sleep he would constantly start and talk wildly, and when awake he would fitfully pace the room with pursed lips and overhanging brows.

This change poor Amelia perceived with alarm. To her gentle spirit it was a source of deep affliction: it filled her heart with sorrow, and her eyes with scalding tears. She wept bitterly, but in secret: before him she assumed a soft gaiety, and labored to cheer him; and when she perceived upon his brow a more than usual dark cloud, she in silence caressed him the more.

Days of misery passed; and whenever he returned she would watch his clouded countenance anxiously, in the fond hope of finding his spirit soothed, but in vain: still fearing it might vex him, she never breathed a syllable having reference to his depression, until, finding her caresses repulsed as an annoyance, she became apprehensive that she herself might be, although unconsciously, the cause.

At first the bare thought of this being possible dreadfully distressed her; but, on reflection, being unable to recollect any single act of hers at all likely to have excited his displeasure, she began to think that something which she had either said or done had been by him misconstrued, feeling convinced that if that were all, she should be able, by removing the misconception, to restore his tranquillity.

Having dwelt upon this for some time, to the exclusion of all other considerations, she resolved to embrace the earliest opportunity of alluding to the subject, and blamed herself for having permitted a mere misapprehension—for that she felt sure it was then—to continue in existence so long.

When this resolution was formed Stanley was absent from home: he had left to meet his partners by appointment, with the view of putting down the fourth and last five hundred each: and as he had made up his mind that the whole was irrevocably lost, he returned more sullen and peevish than ever.

As he entered, Amelia flew as usual to meet him, and when he had passively received her fond welcome, he sunk into a chair in the most listless style, and with a countenance enveloped in gloom.

"I have something, dear, to say to you," she observed, with a gaiety of expression which contrasted strongly with his dismal aspect—"something, my love, of importance. It is a question, and one that must be answered distinctly, too."

"A question?" cried Stanley, peevishly. "Well, what is it?"

"Nay, do not be cross, dear Stanley." And yet, perhaps, I must allow you to be so until you have answered my question, and I have replied." She then threw her arms round his neck, and while gazing earnestly in his face said, in tones of surpassing sweetness, "Have I displeased you?"

"Displeased me? Nonsense; no."

"Pray, Stanley, tell me. I fear that I have."

"I do tell you that I have not. Don't annoy me."

"Dear Stanley, do not be unkind! You have been for some time very sad, dear; my heart bleeds to see you. I cannot be happy if you are not so. Indeed, my dearest love, if I have in any way offended you—"

"I tell you again that you have not!"

"Then what is the cause of your sadness? Pray let me know all! I can bear it, my love; let it be what it may, I can bear it. Believe me, I can endure with more fortitude the knowledge of the very worst calamity that could befall us than ignorance of the cause of that affliction, which is unhappily so apparent. Do, dear, pray tell me all. Do not keep me longer in suspense. You kindly, fondly let me share your joys—am I not bound to share your sorrows? Believe me, dear Stanley, it will to me be an additional joy to know that your confidence in me is unbounded."

As a rebellious tear glistened in his eye, Stanley kissed her, and pressed her to his heart.

"Bless you!" she continued, as she wiped the tear away.

"But I must not see that: anything but that I can bear. But you will tell me, dear, will you not?"

"My good girl, what have I to tell you?"

"Do not allow me to be tortured by conjectures. They afflict me, Stanley, far more than a knowledge of the real cause can, let it be what it may."

"Amelia, rest satisfied with this, that that which vexes me is not of any permanent importance."

"I thank Heaven for that! And yet if it be not, why do you allow it to torment you thus? Come, be cheerful, dear Stanley; it will be such a delight to me to see you smile again; but I cannot be content with this assurance. If I had," she continued archly, "sufficient influence over you, I would insist upon knowing more; but as I have not, I must of course in the tone of a suppliant beg of you to tell me all about it. Come, dear, as a favor? I may be able to assist you. Besides, have I not a right to know? Upon my word, I am any thing but sure that I have not. It strikes me that there should be no secrets between us. I may be wrong; but I incline, nevertheless, to the belief that a wife absolutely ought to know all that pertains to her husband."

"But even assuming that she ought, would it be wise, would it be kind on the part of a man to suffer his wife to be annoyed by the knowledge of every difficulty he has to encounter?"

"He frequently, I apprehend, annoys her far more by withholding that knowledge. When we see you depressed—and that we can see, my love, in an instant, however much you may endeavor to conceal it—the conjectures which arise in most cases create far more pain than would be induced by an actual knowledge of the facts. When you good creatures keep us thus in darkness, that we may not be afflicted by the troubles you endure, you little think that the kind, generous object you have in view is not thereby attained. We are troubled by seeing that you are troubled; the very fact of your spirits being depressed, depresses ours; and although we endeavor to cheer you when dull, the gaiety we assume is but assumed, dear Stanley, and the assumption of itself costs many a latent pang. But, come, let me prevail upon you. What is the matter? It is true my reputation for ingenuity is not yet established, but a thousand things might be suggested even by me. Stanley, is there any thing papa can do for you? If there be, let me know, there's a dear! Nothing could delight him more than to have it in his power to render you assistance. It would give him, believe me, the purest joy a man can experience. Tell me, dear—do pray tell me if he can in any way aid you. You know not how he would rejoice in the opportunity; indeed you do not; but be sure that he would serve you with all his soul. Let me name it to him, dear. What is it? Do tell me."

"Amelia," said Stanley, regarding her intently, "let us change the subject. Let it be sufficient for you to know, that I have felt perhaps far more annoyed than I ought to have felt. The affair will soon be over, and you will then find me as cheerful as ever; but if you do not wish to annoy me, and I cannot think you do, you will not in any way allude to it again."

Amelia's lips were thus sealed, and the subject therefore dropped.

CHAPTER XLII. . . The Countess of Clarendale's Soirée Musicale.

Having explained to Captain Filcher precisely what she wanted, Mrs. Gills had the heartfelt felicity to find that he prepared to meet her views to a hair. He was in fact, as Stanley had intimated, the very man to carry her conception fully out. He was in raptures with it. Nothing could have delighted him more; and so heartily did he enter into the spirit of the thing, and so promptly did he settle the preliminaries, feeling well convinced that before many days had expired the club would be completely broken up, and the glorious opportunity thereby lost, that he got cards engraved expressly for the occasion with the Earl's arms thereon emblazoned, and all his plans laid down to absolute perfection, in a space of time almost incredible in point of shortness.

It became, however, essential to the due execution of these plans that the Earl should be temporarily absent; and it happened most conveniently that, having put down his share of the bank, which was doomed to be the last, and just as the Captain had arranged to get him down to Newmarket, he announced his intention of going to Brighton for a day or two, ostensibly in order to pay a long-promised visit.

For Brighton he therefore started, and no sooner had he left, than the gallant Captain issued the cards. He sent them to all the Ministers, to all the peers and peeresses in town, to all the ambassadors, to all the members of the House of Commons without distinction, to all the Judges and chief members of the Bar and their ladies, to the principal literary men of the day, to the Lord Mayor and the whole Court of Aldermen; in short, he proceeded in such an exemplary spirit, that no person of distinction in town could complain of being slighted.

It was to be a soirée musicale; and as such was the case, he patronized the two most fashionable bands, and engaged not only the chief Italian singers, but all the native talent available. His views in that, as indeed in all other respects, were extremely comprehensive; in a word, he was firmly determined to do the whole thing on a scale of magnificence not to be surpassed.

"Now, my dear madam," said he, having settled this necessary part of the business to the entire satisfaction of Mrs. Gills, "Pray what do you intend to give them?"

"Oh! they shall have such a capital hot supper," replied the lady, "and just as much wine, rum, brandy, and gin, as they like to lay into. There shall be no stint of nothing. And then we'll have some punch; the punch alley Roman, I hear is the nicest; they shall have some of that. And I'll tell you what jints I mean to have. First, for instance, there shall be a tremendous biled round of beef at the top, and another sirline at the bottom; a large plum-pudding in the middle, two saddles of mutton near that, a line of pork, a fillet of veal and ham, a turkey and sausages, lots of mince pies, a goose and apple sarce, carrots, turnips, taters, sparrows, and every other delicacy in season; and if they can't manage to make a decent supper off that, why, it will be a strange thing to me."

"It will be strange," observed the Captain. "I should say that they have not had such a supper lately."

"Is there anything else besides that you think we ought to have? Because if there is, you know, Captain we'll have it."

"No; I am really unable to suggest anything else. Your arrangements appear to be excellent. You must have enough porter."

"Oh! they shall have lots of that. But what time do you think they'll be here?"

"Why, I should say that they'll begin to arrive about nine."

"That will do nicely. Oh! won't the Earl be surprised! But you'll excuse me, I know, for I've got a world of business in hand; but if you should think of anything more in the meantime, please tell me."

The Captain promised faithfully to do so, and Mrs. Gills went about her business.

In less than an hour after that, however, certain of the noble Earl's family called, and on being informed that he was then out of town, the Marchioness, being resolved to have her matter explained, sent her card at once up to the Countess.

On receiving this card, the Countess almost fainted. "Oh, ma!" she cried tremulously, "I never can go down; I should drop."

"Rubbish, my precious!" exclaimed her mamma. "Why, what have you to fear? She won't eat you. Besides, you're every bit as good as her."

"Oh! I saw her get out of her carriage. The very look of her was enough. She's such a lady!—oh!"

"Well, my love, and ain't you a lady? And can't you get out of your carriage? I'll go down myself and see her."

"Do, ma, pray do."

"Oh! if she thinks to come any of her stuck-up fine ways over me, she'll find I can give her as good as she sends. I ain't to be frightened—do n't think it."

Whereupon she adjusted her comprehensive cap, which was richly embellished with roses and lilies, and having completely satisfied herself that she could look fiercely if occasion should demand a look of fierceness, she tossed her head proudly, and descended.

"The Countess of Clarendale," observed the Marchioness, who was certainly a most majestic woman, "is the lady whom I am anxious to see."

"The Countess," returned Mrs. Gills, who tried very laudably to look as tall as possible. "The Countess is rather poorly; but I am her mother!"

This announcement had the effect of almost stunning the Marchioness, who drew back a trifle, and looked at Mrs. Gills with the most intense earnestness of which she was capable; while two of her sons, by whom she was accompanied, seemed ready to burst into a roar, they enjoyed the thing so highly.

"It is really very strange," said the Marchioness, on recovering herself somewhat, "that I should not have even heard of my son's marriage until this morning."

"Well, it is odd he did n't let you know."

"At what church were they married?"

"Oh! it was done here, by special licence!"

"Indeed! Can I not have the pleasure of seeing the Countess?"

"Oh, yes; I'll go and fetch her; but she's such a timid thing, you do n't know."

"Well, this is a start!" exclaimed one of the sons, as Mrs. Gills quitted the room.

"He's not married!" cried the other. "He's not such a fool."

"I only hope to Heaven that he is not!" exclaimed the Marchioness. "But you hear what she says!"

"Oh, I don't care what she says. Depend upon it they are not married. But I long to see what sort of a creature she is. If she be anything like her mamma, she's a beauty!"

While they were thus engaged, Mrs. Gills was endeavoring to prevail upon her precious to "come down, and make no bones at all about the matter;" but the Countess was still extremely tremulous.

"Oh! ma," she cried, "I'm fit to faint."

"The ideor!" exclaimed Mrs. Gills. "As if you expected she'd gobble you up! I never see such a thing! Pluck up your spirits, and bemean yourself like a Countess as you are."

"Oh! but I feel so frightened, ma."

"What are you got to be frightened on? I'm shocked at you. Why ain't I frightened? A mere common paltry servant would have more spirit. You do n't look as if you belonged to the nobility at all!"

"But I can't help it, ma."

"Exorbitant!—do n't tell me! You should have a little more aristocracy about you! Come, come my precious; come, take them there knots out of your hankecher, and come down without any more affected ways."

"I can't, ma: no, indeed, I can't."

"You provoke me! I shall never make anything on you. What, is she any more than you are? She's only a lady of title like yourself! I never heered tell of such a thing! I'm ashamed of you, reely."

And having delivered herself to this effect, she again with due boldness descended alone.

"My daughter, the Countess, says as you must excuse her," she observed as she hastily re-entered the room. "She do n't feel at all the thing this morning. At any time you like to come she'd be happy."

Well! The Marchioness could do no more. She could not insist upon seeing her, certainly, although she much wished to arrive at the truth; and therefore feeling it to be useless to press the point then, she rose, and without any unnecessary ceremony, left the house, intimating that she was not by any means satisfied, and that she felt herself bound to see into the matter further.

As the soirée had been fixed to come off on the morrow, the Captain wrote to the Earl by that night's post, to inform him that his presence in town at a certain hour was absolutely indispensable; and, as he made it appear that this special command had been prompted by something connected with the speculation, that noble person duly arrived, and found his partners pretending—in order that there might be a sufficient excuse for the summons—to be deeply engaged in a discussion having reference to the propriety of continuing the scheme.

In this really animated discussion the noble Earl entered with spirit, with a view of proving the advantages which would as a matter of necessity spring from the very fact of putting down ten thousand pounds more; as it was then but eight o'clock, the discussion was kept up with warmth until nine, at which hour the company began to arrive.

The professional people came first, and were received by the Countess and her mamma with unexampled condescension; but as the rattling of carriages continued, the Earl suddenly inquired if they knew what it meant?

"Oh! yes," replied the Captain. "The Countess gives a soirée musicale!"

"A soirée devit!" exclaimed the noble Earl: and starting up in a rage, he rushed from the room amidst loud peals of laughter.

"What is the meaning of this?" he demanded, on reaching the brilliantly illuminated salon, in which the Countess and Mrs. Gills—dressed in all conceivable colors, and further embellished, in order to look sweetly pretty, with a greater variety of artificial flowers than ever adorned the active person of a sweep on May-day—were entertaining the professional people with characteristic dignity and grace—"what, I ask, is the meaning of it all?"

"My noble lord," replied the Countess, "we are only going to have a little party!"

"A little party! Are you mad?"

"But it's the Countess's own party!" interrupted Mrs. Gills.

"I'll have no parties!" thundered forth the Earl.

"Why did you not let me know of it, madam?"

"We thought it would be an agreeable surprise!"

"Tom!" cried the Earl, calling loudly to the porter. "Do you hear? Lock that door! Open it to no one! Not another soul shall enter to-night. What persons are these?" he added, turning to the Countess with a look which made her tremble.

"They are the singers, my lord."

"Dismiss them! I'll not have them here: they're not wanted."

Whereupon he returned to his associates, who were all extremely merry, and demanded of them why they had not informed him of the issue of the cards for the soirée musicale?

"We thought it by far too good a joke," was the reply. "A joke!" exclaimed the Earl. "It may be a joke to you, gentlemen; but look at the position in which it places me! Tom!" he added, calling again to the porter, as the knocking at the door became tremendous. "Never mind their knocking! If you let another person in I'll strangle you. Are those people gone?"

"No, my lord."

"Turn them out! Why do they remain?"

The reason soon appeared. They had resolved not to leave the house without being paid; and no sooner was the Earl informed of this, than he rushed fiercely up to them again, with a forcible ejection in view.

"I'll hear nothing of your demands," said he, "to-night. I insist upon your leaving instantly. If you remain another moment you will draw upon yourselves consequences which may not be pleasing."

Several of the professional gentlemen here endeavored to reason with him on the subject, but he would not hear a word, and exhibited such excessive violence that they eventually deemed it expedient to depart.

He saw them out, while Tom kept on guard, and then closed the door on them himself. But the knocking still continued, for the street was full of carriages, and the whole neighborhood seemed to be in a state of commotion.

"Wrench off that knocker," he cried, "and then write upon the door."

"What, my lord?"

"Gone to the devil!—to let!—anything!—run away!—no matter what!"

Tom mixed up some whitening with great expedition, and while the enraged Earl himself kept guard, he wrenched off the knocker, and marked upon the door in legible characters, "TO LET. GONE AWAY."

"Now," said the Earl, "let them thunder if they can. Snap that bell-wire—snap it at once! I charge you, Tom, not to let another soul in to-night." And having given this charge with violent emphasis, he quitted the house, leaving the Countess and her mamma sobbing over each other like children, while the Captain and his band were enjoying themselves highly, and making a soirée musicale of it, occasionally looking out upon the long row of carriages which continued to arrive and to depart with their loads until past one o'clock in the morning.

Master Humphrey's Clock.

BARNABY RUDGE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XIX.

Dolly Varden's pretty little head was yet bewildered by various recollections of the party, and her bright eyes were yet dazzled by a crowd of images, dancing before them like motes in the sunbeams, among which the effigy of one partner in particular did especially figure, the same being a young coachmaker (a master in his own right) who had given her to understand, when he handed her into the chair at parting, that it was his fixed resolve to neglect his business from that time, and die slowly for the love of her—Dolly's head, and eyes, and thoughts, and seven senses, were all in a state of flutter and confusion for which the party was accountable, although it was now three days old, when, as she was sitting listlessly at breakfast, reading all manner of fortunes (that is to say, of married and flourishing fortunes) in the grounds of her teacup, a step was heard in the workshop, and Mr. Edward Chester was descried through the glass door, standing among the rusty locks and keys, like love among the roses—for which apt comparison the historian may by no means take any credit to himself, the same being the invention, in a sentimental mood, of the chaste and modest Miggs, who, beholding him from the doorsteps she was then cleaning, did, in her maiden meditation, give utterance to the simile.

The locksmith, who happened at the moment to have his eyes thrown upward and his head backward, in an intense communion with Toby, did not see his visitor, until Mrs. Varden, more watchful than the rest, had desired Sim Tappertit to open the glass door and give him admission—from which untoward circumstance the good lady argued (for she could deduce a most precious moral from the most trifling event) that to take a draught of small ale in the morning was to observe a pernicious, irreligious, and Pagan custom, the relish whereof should be left to swine, and Satan, or at least to Popish persons, and should be shunned by the righteous as a work of sin and evil. She would no doubt have pursued her admonition much farther, and would have founded on it a long list of precious precepts of inestimable value, but that the young gentleman standing by in a somewhat uncomfortable and discomfited manner while she read her spouse this lecture, occasioned her to bring it to a permanent conclusion.

"I'm sure you'll excuse me, sir," said Mrs. Varden, rising and curtseying. "Varden is so very thoughtless, and needs so much reminding—Sim, bring a chair here."

Mr. Tappertit obeyed, with a flourish implying that he did so, under protest.

"And you can go, Sim," said the locksmith.

Mr. Tappertit obeyed again, still under protest; and betaking himself to the workshop, began seriously to fear that he might find it necessary to poison his master, before his time was out.

In the meantime, Edward returned suitable replies to Mrs. Varden's courtesies, and that lady brightened up very much; so that when he accepted a dish of tea from the fair hands of Dolly, she was perfectly agreeable.

"I am sure if there's anything we can do—Varden, or I, or Dolly either—to serve you, sir, at any time, you have only to say it, and it shall be done," said Mrs. V.

"I am obliged to you, I am sure," returned Edward. "You encourage me to say that I have come here now to beg your good offices."

Mrs. Varden was delighted beyond measure.

"It occurred to me that probably your fair daughter might be going to the Warren, either to-day or to-morrow," said Edward, glancing at Dolly; "and if so, and you will allow her to take charge of this letter, Ma'am, you will oblige me more than I can tell you. The truth is, that while I am very anxious it should reach its destination, I have particular reasons for not trusting it to any other conveyance; so that without your help, I am wholly at a loss."

"She was not going that way, sir, either to-day or to-morrow, nor indeed all next week," the lady graciously rejoined, "but we shall be very glad to put ourselves out of the way on your account, and if you wish it, you may depend on its going to-day. You might suppose," said Mrs. Varden, frowning at her husband, "from Varden's sitting there so glum and silent, that he objected to this arrangement; but you must not mind that, sir, if you please. It's his way at home. Out of doors he can be cheerful and talkative enough."

Now, the fact was, that the unfortunate locksmith, blessing his stars to find his helpmate in such good humor, had been sitting with a beaming face, hearing this discourse with a joy past all expression. Wherefore this sudden attack quite took him by surprise.

"My dear Martha—" he said.

"Oh yes, I dare say," interrupted Mrs. Varden, with a smile of mingled scorn and pleasantry. "Very dear; We all know that."

"No, but my good soul," said Gabriel, "you are quite mistaken. You are, indeed. I was delighted to find you so kind and ready. I waited, my dear, anxiously, I assure you, to hear what you would say."

"You waited anxiously," repeated Mrs. V. "Yes! Thank you, Varden. You waited, as you always do, that I might bear the blame, if any came of it. But I am used to it," said the lady, with a kind of solemn titter, "and hat's my comfort!"

"I give you my word, Martha—" said Gabriel.

"Let me give you my word, my dear," interposed his wife with a christian smile, "that such discussions as these between married people, are much better left alone. Therefore, if you please, Varden, we'll drop the subject. I have no wish to pursue it. I could—I might say a great deal. But I would rather not. Pray don't say any more."

"I don't want to say any more," rejoined the goaded locksmith.

"Well then, do n't," said Mrs. Varden.

"Nor did I begin it, Martha," added the locksmith, good humoredly, "I must say that."

"You did not begin it, Varden!" exclaimed his wife, opening her eyes wide and looking round upon the company, as though she would say, you hear this man! "You did not begin it, Varden! But you shall not say I was out of temper. No, you did not begin it, oh dear no, not you, my dear!"

"Well, well," said the locksmith. "That's settled then."

"Oh yes," rejoined his wife, "quite. If you like to say Dolly began it, my dear, I shall not contradict you. I know my duty. I need know it, I am sure. I am often obliged to bear it in mind, when my inclination perhaps would be for the moment to forget it. Thank you, Varden." And so, with a mighty show of humility and forgiveness, she folded her hands, and looked round again, with a smile which plainly said "If you desire to see the first and foremost among female martyrs, here she is, in view!"

This little incident, illustrative though it was of Mrs. Varden's extraordinary sweetness and amiability, had so strong a tendency to check the conversation and to disconcert all parties but that excellent lady, that only a few monosyllables were uttered until Edward withdrew; which he presently did, thanking the lady of the house a great many times for her condescension, and whispering in Dolly's ear that he would call on the morrow, in case there should happen to be an answer to the note—which, indeed, she knew without his telling, as Barnaby and his friend Grip had dropped in on the previous night to prepare her for the visit which was then terminating.

Gabriel, who had attended Edward to the door, came back with his hands in his pockets; and, after fidgeting about the room in a very uneasy manner, and casting a great many sidelong looks at Mrs. Varden (who with the calmest countenance in the world was five fathoms deep in the Protestant Manual), inquired of Dolly how she meant to go. Dolly supposed by the stage-coach, and looked at her lady mother, who finding herself silently appealed to, dived down at least another fathom into the Manual, and became unconscious of all earthly things.

"Martha—" said the locksmith.

"I hear you, Varden," said his wife, without rising to the surface.

"I am sorry, my dear, you have such an objection to the Maypole and old John, for otherways as it's a very fine morning, and Saturday's not a busy day with us, we might have all three gone to Chigwell in the chaise, and had quite a happy day of it."

Mrs. Varden immediately closed the Manual, and bursting into tears, requested to be led up stairs.

"What is the matter now, Martha?" inquired the locksmith.

To which Martha rejoined "Oh! do n't speak to me," and protested in agony, that if anybody had told her so, she would n't have believed it.

"But Martha," said Gabriel, putting himself in the way as she was moving off with the aid of Dolly's shoulder, "would n't have believed what? Tell me what's wrong now. Do tell me. Upon my soul I don't know. Do you know, child? Damme!" cried the locksmith, plucking at his wig in a kind of frenzy, "nobody does know, I verily believe, but Miggs!"

"Miggs," said Mrs. Varden faintly, and with symptoms of approaching incoherence, "is attached to me, and that is sufficient to draw down hatred upon her in this house. She is a comfort to me, whatever she may be to others."

"She's no comfort to me," cried Gabriel, made bold by despair. "She's the misery of my life. She's all the plagues of Egypt in one."

"She's considered so, I have no doubt," said Mrs. Varden. "I was prepared for that; it's natural; its of a piece with the rest. When you taunt me as you do to my face, how can I wonder that you taunt her behind her back!" And here the incoherence coming on very strong, Mrs. Varden wept, and laughed, and sobbed, and shivered, and hiccupped, and choked; and said she knew it was very foolish but she could n't help it; and that when she was dead and gone, perhaps they would be sorry for it—which really under the circumstances did not appear quite so probable as she seemed to think—with a great deal more to the same effect. In a word, she passed with great decency through all the ceremonies incidental to such occasions; and being supported up-stairs, was deposited in a highly spasmodic state on her own bed, where Miss Miggs shortly afterwards flung herself upon the body.

The philosophy of all this was, that Mrs. Varden wanted to go to Chigwell; that she did not want to make any concession or explanation; that she would only go on being implored and entreated so to do; and that she would accept no other terms. Accordingly, after a vast amount of moaning and crying up-stairs, and much damping of foreheads, and vinegaring of temples, and hartshorning of noses, and so forth; and after most pathetic adjurations from Miggs, assisted by warm brandy-and-water not over-weak, and divers other cordials, also of a stimulating quality, administered at first in tea-spoonsful and afterwards in increasing doses, and of which Miss Miggs herself partook as a preventive measure (for fainting is infectious;) after all these remedies, and many more too numerous to mention, but not to take, had been applied; and many verbal consolations, moral, religious, and miscellaneous, had been superadded thereto; the locksmith humbled himself, and the end was gained.

"If it's only for the sake of peace and quietness, father," said Dolly, urging him to go up-stairs.

"Oh, Doll, Doll," said her good-natured father. "If you ever have a husband of your own—"

Dolly glanced at the glass.

"—Well, when you have," said the locksmith, "never faint, my darling. More domestic unhappiness has come of easy fainting, Doll, than from all the greater passions put together. Remember that, my dear, if you would be really happy, which you never can be, if your husband is n't. And a word in your ear, my precious. Never have a Miggs about you!"

With this advice he kissed his blooming daughter on the cheek, and slowly repaired to Mrs. Varden's room; where that lady, lying all pale and languid on her couch, was refreshing herself with a sight of her last new bonnet, which Miggs, as a means of calming her scattered spirits, displayed to the best advantage at her bedside.

"Here's master, mim," said Miggs. "Oh, what a happiness it is when man and wife come round again! Oh, gracious, to think that him and her should ever have a word together!" In the energy of these sentiments, which were uttered as an apostrophe to the Heavens in general, Miss Miggs perched the bonnet on the top of her own head, and folding her hands, turned on her tears.

"I can't help it," cried Miggs. "I could n't, if I was to be drowned in 'em. She has such a forgiving spirit! She'll forget all that has passed, and go along with you, sir—Oh, if it was to the world's end, she'd go along with you."

Mrs. Varden with a faint smile gently reproved her attendant for this enthusiasm, and reminded her at the same time that she was too far unwell to venture out that day.

"Oh no, you're not, mim, indeed you're not," said Miggs; "I repeat to master; master knows you're not, mim. The hair, and motion of the shay, will do you good, mim, and you must not give way, you must rally. She must keep up must n't she, sir, for all our sakes? I was a telling her that, just now. She must remember us, even if she forgets herself. Master will persuade you, mim, I'm sure. There's Miss Dolly's a going, you know, and master, and you, and all so happy and so comfortable. Oh!" cried Miggs, turning on the tears again, previous to quitting the room in great emotion, "I never see such a blessed one as she is for the forgiveness of her spirit, I never, never, never did. Nor more did master neither; no, nor no one—never!"

For five minutes or thereabouts, Mrs. Varden remained mildly opposed to all her husband's prayers that she would oblige him by taking a day's pleasure, but relenting at length, she suffered herself to be persuaded, and granting him her free forgiveness (the merit whereof, she meekly said, rested with the Manual and not with her,) desired that Miggs might come and help her dress. The handmaid attended promptly, and it is but justice to their joint exertions to record that, when the good lady came down stairs in course of time, completely decked out for their journey, she really looked as if nothing had happened, and appeared in the very best health imaginable.

As to Dolly, there she was again, the very pink and pattern of good looks, in a smart little cherry-colored mantle, with a hood of the same drawn over her head, and upon the top of that hood, a little straw hat trimmed with cherry-colored ribbons, and worn the merest trifle on one side—just enough in short to make it the wickedest and most provoking head-dress that ever malicious milliner devised. And not to speak of the manner in which these cherry-colored decorations brightened her eyes, or vied with her lips, or shed a new bloom on her face, she wore such a cruel little muff, and such a heart-rending pair of shoes, and was so surrounded and hemmed in, as it were, by aggravations, that when Mr. Tappertit, holding the horse's head, saw her come out of the house alone, that such impulses came over him to decoy her into the chaise and drive off like mad, that he would unquestionably have done it, but for certain uneasy doubts besetting him as to the shortest way to Gretna Green; whether it was up the street or down, or up the right-hand turning or the left; and whether, supposing all the turnpikes to be carried by storm, the blacksmith in the end would marry them on credit; which by reason of his clerical office appeared, even to his excited imagination, so unlikely, that he hesitated. And while he stood hesitating, and looking post-chaises and six at Dolly, out came his master and his mistress, and the constant Miggs, and the opportunity was gone for ever. For now the chaise creaked upon its springs, and Mrs. Varden was inside; and now it creaked again, and more than ever, and the locksmith was inside; and now it bounded once, as if its heart beat lightly, and Dolly was inside; and now it was gone and its place was empty, and he and that dreary Miggs were standing in the street together.

The hearty locksmith was in as good humor as if nothing had occurred for the last twelve months to put him out of his way. Dolly was all smiles and graces, and Mrs. Varden was agreeable beyond all precedent. As they jogged through the streets talking of this thing and of that, who should be descried upon the pavement but that very coach-maker, looking so genteel that nobody would have believed he had every thing to do with a coach but riding in it, and bowing like any nobleman. To be sure Dolly was confused when she bowed again, and to be sure the cherry-colored ribbons trembled a little when she met his mournful eye, which seemed to say, "I have kept my word, I have begun, the business is going to the devil, and you're the cause of it." There he stood, rooted to the ground: as Dolly said, like a statue; and as Mrs. Varden said, like a pump; till they turned the corner: and when her father thought it was like his impudence, and her mother wondered what he meant by it, Dolly blushed again till her very hood was pale.

But on they went, not less the merrily for this, and there was the locksmith in the incautious fulness of his heart "pulling up" at all manner of places, and evincing a most intimate acquaintance with all the taverns on the road, and all the landlords and all the landladies, with whom, indeed, the little horse was on equally friendly terms, for he kept on stopping of his own accord. Never were people so glad to see other people as these landlords and landladies were to behold Mr. and Mrs. Varden and Miss Varden, and would not they get out, said one; and they really must walk up stairs; said another, and she would take it ill and be quite certain they were proud if they would not have a little taste of something, said a third; and so on, that it really was quite a Progress rather than a ride, and one continued scene of hospitality from beginning to end. It was pleasant enough to be held in such esteem, not to mention the refreshments; so Mrs. Varden said nothing at the time, and what all affability and delight—but such a body of evidence as she collected against the unfortunate locksmith that day, to be used thereafter as occasion might require, never got together for matrimonial purposes.

In course of time—and in a course of a pretty long time too, for these agreeable interruptions delayed them not a little,—they arrived upon the skirts of the Forest, and riding pleasantly on among the trees, came at last to the Maypole, where the locksmith's cheerful "Yoho!" speedily brought to the porch old John, and after him young Joe, both of whom were so transfixed at sight of the ladies, that for a moment they were perfectly unable to give them any welcome, and could do nothing but stare.

It was only for a moment, however, that Joe forgot himself, for speedily reviving he thrust his drowsy father aside—to Mr. Willit's mighty and inexpressible indignation—and darting out, stood ready to help them to alight. It was necessary for Dolly to get out first. Joe had her in his arms;—yes, though for a space of time no longer than you could count one in, Joe had her in his arms. Here was a glimpse of happiness!

It would be difficult to describe what a flat and commonplace affair the helping Mrs. Varden out afterwards was, but Joe did it, and did it too, with the best grace in the world. Then old Joe, who entertaining a dull and foggy sort of idea that Mrs. Varden wasn't fond of him, had been in some doubt whether she might not have come for purposes of assault and battery, took courage, hoped she was well, and offered to conduct her into the house. This tender being amicably received, they marched in together; Joe and Dolly followed, arm-in-arm, (happiness again!) and Varden brought up the rear.

Old John would have it that they must sit in the bar, and nobody objecting, into the bar they went. All bars are snug places, but the Maypole's was the very snugest, coziest, and completest bar, that ever the wit of man devised. Such amazing bottles in old oaken pigeon-holes; such gleaming tankards dangling from pegs at about the same inclination as thirsty men would hold them to their lips; such sturdy little Dutch kegs ranged in rows on shelves; so many lemons hanging on separate nets, and forming the fragrant grove already mentioned in this chronicle, suggestive, with goodly loaves of snowy sugar stewed away hard by, of punch, idealised beyond all mortal knowledge; such closets, such presses, such drawers full of pipes, such places for putting things away in hollow window-seats, all crammed to the throats with eatables, drinkables, or savory condiments; lastly, and to crown all, as typical of the immense resources of the establishment, and its defiance to all visitors to cut and come again, a stupendous cheese!

It is a poor heart that never rejoices—it must have been the poorest, weakest, and most watery heart that ever beat, which would not have warmed towards the Maypole bar. Mrs. Varden's did directly. She could have no more reproached John Willit among those household gods, the kegs and bottles, lemons, pipes, and cheese, than she could have stabbed him with his own bright carving-knife. The order for dinner too—it might have soothed a savage. "A bit of fish," said John to the cook, "and some lamb chops (breaded, with plenty of ketchup), and a good salad, and a roast spring chicken, with a dish of sausages and mashed potatoes, or something of that sort." Something of that sort! The resources of these inns! To talk carelessly about dishes, which in themselves were a first-rate holiday kind of dinner, suitable to one's wedding day, or something of that sort: meaning, if you can't get a spring chicken, any other trifle in the way of poultry will do—such as a Peacock, perhaps! The kitchen too, with its great broad cavernous chimney; the kitchen, where nothing in the way of cookery seemed impossible; where you could believe in anything to eat, they chose to tell you of. Mrs. Varden returned from the contemplation of those wonders to the bar again, with a head quite dizzy and bewildered. She was obliged to go to sleep. Waking was pain, in the midst of such immensity.

Dolly in the meanwhile, whose gay heart and head ran upon other matters, passed out at the garden door, and glancing back now and then (but of course not wondering whether Joe saw her), tripped away by a path across the fields with which she was well acquainted, to discharge her mission at the Warren; and this deponent hath been informed and verily believes, that you might have seen many less pleasant objects than the cherry-coloured mantle and ribbons, as they went fluttering along the green meadows in the bright light of the day, like giddy things as they were.

CHAPTER XX.

The proud consciousness of her trust, and the great importance she derived from it, might have advertised it to all the house if she had had to run the gauntlet of its inhabitants; but as Dolly had played in every dull room and passage many and many a time, when a child, and had ever since been the humble friend of Miss Haredale, whose foster-sister she was, and she was as free of the building as the young lady herself. So using no greater precaution than holding her breath and walking on tiptoe as she passed the library door, she went straight to Emma's room as a privileged visitor.

It was the liveliest room in the building. The chamber was sombre like the rest for the matter of that, but the presence of youth and beauty would make a prison cheerful (saving alas! that confinement withers them), and lend some charms of their own to the gloomiest scene. Birds, flowers, books, drawing, music, and a hundred such graceful tokens of feminine loves and cares, filled it with more of life and human sympathy than the whole house besides seemed to be made to hold. There was heart in the room; and who that was a heart, ever fails to recognize the silent presence of another!

Dolly had one undoubtedly, and it was not a tough one either, though there was a little mist of coquettishness about it, such as sometimes surrounds that sun of life in its morning, and slightly dims its lustre. Thus, when Emma rose to greet her, and kissing her affectionately on the cheek, told her, in her quiet way, that she had been very unhappy, the tears stood in Dolly's eyes, and she felt more sorry than she could tell; but next moment she happened to raise them to the glass, and really there was something there so exceedingly agreeable, that as she sighed, she smiled, and felt surprisingly consoled.

"I have heard about it Miss," said Dolly, "and it's very sad indeed, but when things are at the worst they are sure to mend."

"But are you sure they are at the worst?" asked Emma with a smile.

"Why, I do not see how they can very well be more unpromising than they are; I really do not," said Dolly, "And I bring something to begin with."

"Not from Edward?"

Dolly nodded and smiled, and feeling in her pockets, (there were pockets in those days) with an affection of not being able to find what she wanted, which greatly enhanced her importance, at length produced the letter. As Emma hastily broke the seal and became absorbed in its contents, Dolly's eyes, by one of those strange accidents for which there is no accounting, wandered to the glass again. She could not help wondering whether the coachmaker suffered very much, and quite pitied the poor man.

It was a long letter—a very long letter, written close on all four sides of the sheet of paper, and crossed afterwards; but it was not a consolatory letter, for as Emma read it she stopped from time to time to put her handkerchief to her eyes. To be sure Dolly marvelled greatly to see her in so much distress, for to her thinking a love affair ought to be one of the best jokes, and the slyest, merriest kind of thing in life. But she set it down in her own mind that all this came from Miss Haredale's being so constant, and that if she would only take on with some other young gentleman—just in the most innocent way possible, to keep her first lover up to the mark—she would find herself inexpressibly comforted.

"I am sure that's what I should do if it was me," thought Dolly. "To make one's sweethearts miserable is well enough and quite right, but to be made miserable one's self is a little too much!"

However it would not do to say so, and therefore she sat looking on in silence. She needed a pretty considerable stretch of patience, for when the long letter had been read once all through it was read again, and when it had been read twice all through it was read again. During this tedious process, Dolly beguiled the time in the most improving manner that occurred to her, by curling her hair on her fingers, with the aid of the looking-glass, before mentioned, and giving it some killing twists.

Every thing has an end. Even young ladies in love cannot read their letters for ever. In course of time the packet was folded up, and it only remained to write the answer.

But as this promised to be a work of time likewise, Emma said she would put it off until after dinner, and that Dolly must dine with her. As Dolly had made up her mind to do so beforehand, she required very little pressing; and when they had settled this point, they went to walk in the garden.

They strolled up and down the terrace walks, talking incessantly—at least, Dolly never left off once—and making that quarter of the sad and mournful house quite gay. Not that they talked loudly or laughed much, but they were both so very handsome, and it was such a breezy day, and their light dresses and dark curls appeared so free and joyous in their abandonment, and Emma was so fair, and Dolly so rosy, and Emma so delicately shaped, and Dolly so plump, and—in short, there are no flowers for any garden like such flowers, let horticulturists say what they may, and both house and garden seemed to know it, and to brighten up sensibly.

After this, came the dinner and the letter writing, and some more talking, in the course of which Miss Haredale took occasion to charge upon Dolly certain flirtish and inconstant propensities, which accusations Dolly seemed to think very complimentary indeed, and to be mightily amused with. Finding her quite incorrigible in this respect, Emma suffered her to depart; but not before she had confided to her that important and never-sufficiently-to-be-taken-care-of answer, and endowed her, moreover, with a pretty little bracelet as a keepsake. Having clasped it on her arm, and again advised her half in jest and half in earnest to amend her roguish ways, for she knew she was fond of Joe at heart (which Dolly stoutly denied, with a great many haughty protestations that she hoped she could do better than that indeed! and so forth,) she bade her farewell; and after calling her back to give her more supplementary messages for Edward, than any body with tenfold the gravity of Dolly Varden could be reasonably expected to remember, at length dismissed her.

Dolly bade her good by, and tripping lightly down the stairs arrived at the dreaded library door, and was about to pass it again on tiptoe, when it opened, and behold! there stood Mr. Haredale. Now, Dolly from her childhood associated with this gentleman the idea of something grim and ghastly, and being at the moment conscience-stricken besides, the sight of him threw her into such a flurry that she could neither acknowledge his presence or run away, so she gave a great start, and then with downcast eyes stood still and trembled.

"Come here, girl," said Mr. Haredale, taking her by the hand. "I want to speak to you."

"If you please sir, I'm in a hurry," faltered Dolly, "and—and you have frightened me by coming so suddenly upon me sir—I would rather go sir, if you'll be so good as to let me."

"Immediately," said Mr. Haredale, who had by this time led her into the room and closed the door. "You shall go directly. You have just left Emma?"

"Yes sir, just this minute.—Father's waiting for me, if you'll please to have the goodness—"

"I know I know," said Haredale. Answer me a question. What did you bring here to-day?"

"Bring here, sir?" faltered Dolly.

Dolly hesitated for a little while, and somewhat emboldened by his manner, said at last, "Well then sir. It was a letter."

"From Mr. Edward Chester, of course. And you are the bearer of the answer?"

Dolly hesitated again, and not being able to decide upon any other course of action, burst into tears.

"You alarm yourself without cause," said Mr. Haredale. "Why are you so foolish? Surely you can answer me. You know that I have but to put the question to Emma and learn the truth directly. Have you the answer with you?"

Dolly had what is popularly called a spirit of her own, and being now fairly at bay, made the best of it.

"Yes sir," she rejoined, trembling and frightened as she was "Yes sir, I have. You may kill me if you please sir, but I won't give it up. I'm very sorry,—but I won't. There sir."

"I commend your firmness, and your plain-speaking," said Mr. Haredale. "Rest assured that I have as little desire to take your letter as your life. You are a very discreet messenger, and a good girl."

Not feeling quite certain, as she afterwards said, whether he might not be "coming over her" with these compliments, Dolly kept as far from him as she could, cried again, and resolved to defend her pocket (for the letter was there) to the last extremity.

"I have some design," said Mr. Haredale after a short silence, during which a smile, as he regarded her, had struggled through the gloom and melancholy that was natural to his face, "of providing a companion for my niece; for her life is a very lonely one. Would you like the office? You are the oldest friend she has, and the best entitled to it."

"I don't know sir," answered Dolly, not sure but he was bantering her; "I can't say. I don't know what they might want at home, I couldn't give an opinion sir."

"If your friends had no objection, would you have any?" said Mr. Haredale. "Come. There's a plain question; and easy to answer."

"None at all that I know of sir," replied Dolly. "I should be very glad to be near Miss Emma of course, and always am."

"That's well," said Mr. Haredale. "That is all I had to say. You are anxious to go. Don't let me detain you."

Dolly didn't let him, nor did she wait for him to try, for the words had no sooner passed his lips than she was out of the room, out of the house, and in the fields again.

The first thing to be done, of course, when she came to herself and considered what a flurry she had been in, was to cry afresh; and the next thing, when she reflected how well she had got over it, was to laugh heartily. The tears once banished gave place to the smiles, and last Dolly laughed so much that she was fain to lean against a tree, and give vent to her exaltation. When she could laugh no longer, and was quite tired, she put her head-dress to rights, dried her eyes, looked back very merrily and triumphantly at the Warren chimneys, which were just visible, and resumed her walk.

The twilight had come on, and it was quickly growing dusk, but the path was so familiar to her from frequent traversing that she hardly thought of this, and certainly felt no uneasiness at being left alone. Moreover there was the bracelet to admire; and when she had given it a good rub, and held it out at arm's length, it sparkled and glittered so beautifully on her wrist, that to look at it in every point of view and with every possible turn of the arm, was quite an absorbing business. There was the letter, too, and it looked so mysterious and knowing, when she took it out of her pocket, and it held, as she knew, so much inside, that to turn it over and over, and think about it, and wonder how it began, and how it ended, and what it said all through, was another matter of constant occupation. Between the bracelet and the letter, there was quite enough to do without thinking of anything else; and admiring each by turns, Dolly went on gaily.

As she passed through a wicket gate to where the path was narrow, and lay between two hedges garnished here and there with trees, she heard a rustling close at hand, which brought her to a sudden stop. She listened. All was very quiet, and she went on again—not absolutely frightened, but a little quicker than before perhaps, and possibly not quite so much at her ease, for a check of that kind is startling.

She had no sooner moved on again, than she was conscious of the same sound, which was like that of a person trampling stealthily among bushes and brushwood. Looking towards the spot whence it appeared to come, she almost fancied she could make out a crouching figure. She stopped again. All was quiet as before. On she went—decidedly faster now—and tried to sing softly to herself. It must be the wind.

But how came the wind to blow only when she walked, and cease when she stood still? She stopped involuntarily as she made the reflection, and the rustling noise stopped likewise. She was really frightened now, and was yet hesitating what to do, when the bushes crackled and snapped, and a man came plunging through them, close before her.

CHAPTER XXI.

It was for the moment an inexpressible relief to Dolly, to recognise in the person who forced himself into the path so abruptly, and now stood directly in her way, Hugh of the Maypole, whose name she uttered in a tone of delighted surprise that came from her heart.

"Was it you?" she said, "how glad I am to see you! and how could you terrify me so?"

In answer to which, he said nothing at all, but stood quite still, looking at her.

"Did you come to meet me?" asked Dolly.

Hugh nodded, and muttered something to the effect that he had been waiting for her, and had expected her sooner.

"I thought it likely they would send," said Dolly, greatly reassured by this.

"Nobody sent me," was his sullen answer. "I came of my own accord."

The rough bearing of this fellow, and his wild uncouth appearance, had often filled the girl with vague apprehension even when other people were by, and had occasioned her to shrink from him involuntarily. The having him for an unbidden companion in so solitary a place, with the darkness fast gathering about them, renewed and even increased the alarm she had felt at first.

If his manner had been merely dogged and passively fierce, as usual, she would have had no greater dislike to his company than she always felt—perhaps, indeed, would have been rather glad to have had him at hand. But there was something of coarse bold admiration in his look, which terrified her very much. She glanced timidly towards him, uncertain whether to go forward or retreat, and he stood gazing at her like a handsome satyr; and so they remained for some short time without stirring or breaking silence. At length Dolly took courage, shot past him, and hurried on.

"Why do you spend so much breath in avoiding me?" said Hugh, accommodating his pace to hers, and keeping close at her side.

"I wish to get back as quickly as I can, and you walk too near me," answered Dolly.

"Too near?" said Hugh, stooping over her so that she could feel his breath upon her forehead. "Why too near? You're always proud to me, mistress."

"I am proud to no one. You mistake me," answered Dolly. "Fall back, if you please, or go on."

"Nay mistress," he rejoined, endeavoring to draw her arm through his. "I'll walk with you."

She released herself, and clenching her little hand, struck him with right good will. At this Maypole Hugh burst into a roar of laughter, and passing his arm about her waist, held her in his strong grasp as easily as if she had been a bird.

"Ha ha ha! Well done mistress! Strike again. You shall beat my face, and tear my hair, and pluck my beard up by the roots, and welcome, for the sake of your bright eyes. Strike again mistress. Do. Ha ha ha! I like it."

"Let me go," she cried, endeavoring with both her hands to push him off. "Let me go this moment."

"You had as good be kinder to me, Sweetlips," said Hugh. "You had, indeed. Come. Tell me now. Why are you always so proud? I don't quarrel with you for it. I love you when you're proud. Ha ha ha! You can't hide your beauty from a poor fellow; that's a comfort!"

She gave him no answer, but as he had not yet checked her progress, continued to press forward as rapidly as she could. At length, between the hurry she had made, her terror, and the tightness of his embrace, her strength failed her, and she could go no further.

"Hugh," cried the panting girl, "good Hugh; if you will leave me I will give you anything—everything I have—and never tell one word of this to any living creature."

"You had best not," he answered. "Harkye, little dove, you had best not. All about here know me, and what I dare do if I have a mind. If ever you are going to tell, stop when the words are on your lips, and think of the mischief you'll bring, if you do, upon some innocent heads that you would not wish to hurt a hair of. Bring trouble on me, and I'll bring trouble and something more on them in return. I care no more for them than for so many dogs; not so much—why should I? I'd sooner kill a man than a dog any day. I've never been sorry for a man's death in all my life, and have for a dog's."

There was something so thoroughly savage in the manner of these expressions, and the looks and gestures by which they were accompanied, that her great fear of him gave her new strength, and enabled her by a sudden effort to extricate herself and run fleetly from him. But Hugh was as nimble, strong, and swift of foot, as any man in broad England, and it was but a fruitless expediture of energy, for he had her in his encircling arms again before she had gone a hundred yards.

"Softly, darling—gently—would you fly from rough Hugh, that loves you as well as any drawing-room gallant?"

"I would," she answered, struggling to free herself again.

"I will. Help!"

"A fine for crying out," said Hugh. "Ha, ha, ha! A fine, pretty one, from your lips. I pay myself! Ha, ha, ha!"

"Help! Help! Help!" As she shrieked with the utmost violence she could exert, a shout was heard in answer, and another, and another.

"Thank Heaven!" cried the girl in an ecstasy. "Joe, dear Joe, this way. Help!"

Her assailant paused, and stood irresolute for a moment, but the shouts drawing nearer and coming quick upon them, forced him to a speedy decision. He released her, whispering with a menacing look, "Tell him; and see what follows!" and leaping the hedge, was gone in an instant. Dolly darted off, and fairly ran into Joe Willet's open arms.

"What is the matter? are you hurt? what was it? who was it? where is he? what was he like?" with a great many encouraging expressions and assurances of safety, were the first words Joe poured forth. But poor little Dolly was so breathless and terrified, that for some time she was quite unable to answer him, and hung upon his shoulder, sobbing and crying as if her heart would break.

Joe had not the smallest objection to have her hanging on his shoulder; no, not the least, though it crushed the cherry-colored ribbons sadly, and put the smart little hat out of all shape. But he could not bear to see her cry; it went to his very heart. He tried to console her, bent over her—some say kissed her, but that's a fable. At any rate he said all the kind and tender things he could think of, and Dolly let him go on and did not interrupt him once, and it was a good ten minutes before she was able to raise her head and thank him.

"What was it that frightened you?" said Joe.

A man whose person was unknown to her had followed her, she answered; he began by begging, and went on to threats of robbery, which he was on the point of carrying into execution, and would have executed, but for Joe's timely aid. The hesitation and confusion with which she said this, Joe attributed to the fright she had sustained, and no suspicion of the truth occurred to him for a moment.

"Stop when the words are on your lips." A hundred times that night, and very often afterward, when the disclosure was rising to her tongue, Dolly thought of that, and repressed it. A deeply rooted dread of the man; the conviction that his ferocious nature, once roused, would stop at nothing; and the strong assurance that if she impeached him, the full measure of his wrath and vengeance would be wreaked on Joe, who had preserved her; these were considerations she had not the courage to overcome, and inducements for secrecy too powerful for her to surmount.

Joe, for his part, was a great deal too happy to inquire very curiously into the matter; and Dolly being yet too tremulous to walk without assistance, they went forward very slowly, and in his mind very pleasantly, when Dolly stopped suddenly and with a half scream exclaimed,

"The letter!"

"What letter?" cried Joe.

"That I was carrying—I had it in my hand. My bracelet too," she said, clasping her wrist. "I have lost them both."

"Do you mean just now?" said Joe.

"Either I dropped them then, or they were taken from me," answered Dolly, vainly searching her pocket and rustling her dress. "They are gone, both gone. What an unhappy girl I am!" With these words poor Dolly, who to do her justice was quite as sorry for the loss of the letter as for her bracelet, fell a crying again, and bemoaned her fate most movingly.

Joe tried to comfort her with the assurance that directly he had housed her safely in the Maypole, he would return to the spot with a lantern (for it was now quite dark) and make strict search for the missing articles, which there was great probability of his finding, as it was not likely that anybody had passed that way since, and she was not conscious of their having been forcibly taken from her. Dolly thanked him very heartily for his offer, though with no great hope of his quest being successful; and so, with many lamentations on her side, and many hopeful words on his, and much weakness on the part of Dolly and much tender supporting on the part of Joe, they reached the Maypole bar at last, where the locksmith and his wife and old John were yet keeping high festival.

Mr. Willet received the intelligence of Dolly's trouble with that surprising presence of mind and readiness of speech for which he was so eminently distinguished above all other men. Mrs. Varden expressed her sympathy for her daughter's distress by scolding her roundly for being so late; and the honest locksmith divided himself between condoling with and kissing Dolly, and shaking hands heartily with Joe, whom he could not sufficiently praise or thank.

In reference to this latter point, old John was far from agreeing with his friend; for besides that he by no means approved of an adventurous spirit in the abstract, it occurred to him that if his son and heir had been seriously damaged in a scuffle, the consequences would assuredly have been expensive and inconvenient, and might perhaps have proved detrimental to the Maypole business. Wherefore, and because he looked with no favorable eye upon young girls, but rather considered that they and the whole female sex were a kind of nonsensical mistake on the part of Nature, he took occasion to retire and shake his head in private at the boiler; inspired by which silent oracle, he was moved to give Joe various stealthy nudges with his elbow, as a parental reproof and gentle admonition to mind his own business and not make a fool of himself.

Joe, however, took down the lantern and lighted it; and arming himself with a stout stick, asked whether Hugh was in the stable.

"He's lying asleep before the kitchen fire, sir," said Mr. Willet. "What do you want with him?"

"I want him to come with me to look after this bracelet and letter," answered Joe. "Halloa there! Hugh!"

Dolly turned as pale as death, and felt as if she must faint forthwith. After a few moments, Hugh came staggering in, stretching himself and yawning according to custom, and presenting the appearance of having been roused from a sound nap.

"Here, sleepy-head," said Joe, giving him the lantern. "Carry this, and bring the dog, and that small cudgel of yours. And woe betide the fellow if we come upon him."

"What fellow?" growled Hugh, rubbing his eyes and shaking himself.

"What fellow!" returned Joe, who was in a state of great valor and bustle; "a fellow you ought to know of, and be more alive about. It's well for the like of you, lazy giant that you are, to be snoring your time away in chimney-corners, when honest men's daughters can't cross even our quiet meadows at nightfall without being set upon by footpads, and frightened out of their precious lives."

"They never rob me," cried Hugh with a laugh. "I have got nothing to lose. But I'd as lief knock them at head as any other man. How many are there?"

"Only one," said Dolly, for everybody looked at her.

"And what was he like, mistress?" said Hugh with a glance at young Willet, so slight and momentary that the scowl it conveyed was lost on all but her. "About my height?"

"Not—not so tall," Dolly replied, scarce knowing what she said.

"His dress," said Hugh, looking at her keenly, "like—like any of ours now? I know all the people hereabouts, and may be could give a guess at the man, if I had anything to guide me."

Dolly faltered and turned paler yet; then answered that he was wrapped in a loose coat and had his face hidden by a handkerchief, and that she could give no other description of him.

"You wouldn't know him if you saw him then, belike?" said Hugh with a malicious grin.

"I should not," answered Dolly, bursting into tears again. "I don't wish to see him. I can't bear to think of him. I can't talk about him any more. Don't go to look for these things, Mr. Joe, pray don't. I entreat you not to go with that man."

"Not to go with me!" cried Hugh. "I'm enough for them all. They're all afraid of me. Why, bless you, mistress, I've the tenderest heart alive. I love all the ladies, ma'am," said Hugh, turning to the locksmith's wife.

Mrs. Varden opined that if he did, he ought to be ashamed of himself; such sentiments being more consistent (so she argued) with a benighted Mussulman or wild Islander than with a staunch Protestant. Arguing from this imperfect state of his morals, Mrs. Varden further opined that he had never studied the Manual. Hugh admitting that he never had, and moreover that he couldn't read, Mrs. Varden declared with much severity, that he ought to be even more ashamed of himself than before, and strongly recommended him to save up his pocket money for the purchase of one, and further to teach himself the contents with all convenient diligence. She was still pursuing this train of discourse, when Hugh, somewhat unceremoniously and irreverently, followed his young master out, and left her to edify the rest of the company. This she proceeded to do, and finding that Mr. Willet's eyes were fixed upon her with an appearance of deep attention, gradually addressed the whole of her discourse to him, whom she entertained with a moral and theological lecture of considerable length, in the conviction that great workings were taking place in his spirit. The simple truth was, however, that Mr. Willet, although his eyes were wide open and he saw a woman before him whose head by long and steady looking at seemed to grow bigger and bigger until it filled the whole bar, was to all other intents and purposes fast asleep; and so sat leaning back in his chair with his hands in his pockets until his son's return caused him to wake up with a deep sigh, and a faint impression that he had been dreaming about pickled pork and greens—a vision of his slumbers which was no doubt referable to the circumstance of Mrs. Varden's having frequently pronounced the word "Grace" with much emphasis; which word, entering the portals of Mr. Willet's brain as they stood ajar, and coupling itself with the words "before meat," which were there ranging about, did in time suggest a particular kind of meat together with that description of vegetable which is usually its companion.

The search was wholly unsuccessful. Joe had groped along the path a dozen times, and among the grass, and in the dry ditch, and in the hedge, but all in vain. Dolly, who was quite inconsolable for her loss, wrote a note to Miss Haredale, giving her the same account of it that she had given at the Maypole, which Joe undertook to deliver as soon as the family were stirring next day. That done, they sat down to tea in the bar, where there was an uncommon display of buttered toast, and—in order that they might not grow faint for want of sustenance, and might have a decent halting-place or half-way house between dinner and supper—a few savory trifles in the shape of great rashers of broiled ham, which being well-cured, done to a turn, and smoking hot, sent forth a tempting and delicious fragrance.

Mrs. Varden was seldom very Protestant at meals, unless it happened that they were under-done, or over-done, or indeed that anything occurred to put her out of humor. Her spirits rose considerably on beholding these goodly preparations, and from the nothingness of good works she passed to the somethingness of ham and toast with great cheerfulness. Nay, under the influence of these wholesome stimulants, she sharply reproved her daughter for being low and despondent, (which she considered an unacceptable frame of mind,) and remarked, as she held her own plate for a fresh supply, that it would be well for Dolly, who pined over the loss of a toy and a sheet of paper, if she would reflect upon the voluntary sacrifices of the missionaries in foreign parts who lived chiefly on salads.

The proceedings of such a day occasion various fluctuations in the human thermometer, and especially in instruments so sensitively and delicately constructed as Mrs. Varden. Thus, at dinner Mrs. V. stood at summer heat; genial, smiling, and delightful. After dinner, in the sunshine of the wine, she went up at least half a dozen degrees, and was perfectly enchanting. As its effect subsided, she fell rapidly, went to sleep for an hour or so at temperate, and awoke at something below freezing. Now she was at summer heat again, in the shade; and when tea was over, and old John, producing a bottle of cordial from one of the oaken cases, insisted on her sipping two glasses thereof in slow succession, she stood steadily at ninety for one hour and a quarter. Profiting by experience, the locksmith took advantage of this genial weather to smoke his pipe in the porch, and in consequence of this prudent management, he was fully prepared, when the glass went down again, to start homewards directly.

The horse was accordingly put in, and the chaise brought round to the door. Joe, who would on no account be dissuaded from escorting them until they had passed the most dreary and solitary part of the road, led up the gray mare at the same time; and having helped Dolly into her seat, (more happiness!) sprang gaily into the saddle. Then, after many good nights, and many admonitions to wrap up, and glancing of lights, and handing in of cloaks and shawls, the chaise rolled away, and Joe trotted beside it—on Dolly's side, no doubt, and pretty close to the wheel, too.

CHAPTER XXII.

It was a fine bright night, and for all her lowness of spirits Dolly kept looking up at the stars in a manner so bewitching (and she knew it!) that Joe was clean out of his senses, and plainly showed that if ever a man were—not to say over head and ears, but over the Monument and the top of Saint Paul's in love, that man was himself. The road was a very good one—not at all a jolting road, or an uneven one—and yet Dolly held the side of the chaise with one little hand, all the way. If there had been an executioner behind him with an uplifted axe ready to chop his head off if he touched that hand, Joe couldn't have helped doing it. From putting his own hand upon it as if by chance, and taking it away again after a minute or so, he got to riding along without taking it off at all; as if he, the escort, were bound to do that as an important part of his duty, and had come out for the purpose. The most curious circumstance about this little incident was, that Dolly didn't seem to know of it. She looked so innocent and unconscious when she turned her eyes on Joe, that it was quite provoking.

She talked, though—talked about her fright, and about Joe's coming up to rescue her, and about her gratitude, and about her fear that she might not have thanked him enough, and about their always being friends from that time forth—and about all that sort of thing. And when Joe said, no friends he hoped, Dolly was quite surprised, and said not enemies she hoped; and when Joe, said, couldn't they be something much better than either, Dolly all of a sudden found out a star which was brighter than all the other stars, and begged to call his attention to the same, and was ten thousand times more innocent and unconscious than ever.

In this manner they traveled along, talking very little above a whisper, and wishing the road could be stretched out to some dozen times its natural length—at least that was Joe's desire—when, as they were getting clear of the forest, and emerging on the more frequented road, they heard behind them the sound of a horse's feet at a round trot, which growing rapidly louder as it drew nearer, elicited a scream from Mrs. Varden, and the cry "a friend!" from the rider, who now came panting up, and checked his horse beside them.

"This man again!" cried Dolly, shuddering.

"Hugh!" said Joe, "what errand are you upon?"

"I come to ride back with you," he answered, glancing covertly at the locksmith's daughter. "He sent me."

"My father!" said poor Joe; adding under his breath, with a very unflattering apostrophe, "Will he never think me man enough to take care of myself!"

"Ay!" returned Hugh to the first part of the inquiry.—

"The roads are not safe just now, he says, and you'd better have a companion."

"Ride on, then," said Joe. "I'm not going to turn yet."

Hugh complied, and they went on again. It was his whim or humor to ride immediately before the chaise, and from this position he constantly turned his head, and looked back. Dolly felt that he looked at her, but she averted her eyes and feared to raise them once, so great was the dread with which he had inspired her.

This interruption, and the consequent wakefulness of Mrs. Varden, who had been nodding in her sleep up to this point, except for a minute or two at a time, when she roused herself to scold the locksmith for audaciously taking hold of her to prevent her nodding herself out of the chaise, put a restraint upon the whispered conversation, and made it difficult of resumption. Indeed, before they had gone another mile, Gabriel stopped at his wife's desire, and that good lady protested that she would not hear of Joe's going a step further on any account whatever. It was in vain for Joe to protest on the other hand that he was by no means tired, and would turn back presently, and would see them safely past such and such a point, and so forth. Mrs. Varden was obstinate, and being so, was not to be overcome by mortal agency.

"Good night—if I must say it," said Joe, sorrowfully.

"Good night," said Dolly. She would have added, "Take care of that man, and pray don't trust him," but he had turned his horse's head, and was standing close to them. She had therefore nothing for it but to suffer Joe to give her hand a gentle squeeze, and when the chaise had gone on for some distance, to look back and wave it, as he still lingered on the spot where they had parted, with the tall figure of Hugh beside him.

What she thought about, going home, and whether the coachmaker held as favorable a place in her meditations as he had occupied in the morning, is unknown. They reached home at last—at last, for it was a long way, made none the shorter by Mrs. Varden's grumbling. Miggs hearing the sound of wheels was at the door immediately.

"Here they are, Simmun! Here they are!" cried Miggs, clapping her hands, and issuing forth to help her mistress to alight. "Bring a chair, Simmun. Now, an't you the better for it, min? Don't you feel more yourself than you would have done if you'd have stopped at home? Oh, gracious! how cold you are! Goodness me, sir, she's a perfect heap of ice."

"I can't not help it, my good girl. You had better take her in to the fire," said the locksmith.

"Master sounds unfeeling, mim," said Miggs, in a tone of commiseration, "but such is not his intentions, I'm sure. After what he has seen of you this day, I never will believe but that he has a deal more affection in his heart than to speak unkind. Come in and sit yourself down by the fire; there's a good dear—do."

Mrs. Varden complied. The locksmith followed with his hands in his pockets, and Mr. Tappertit trundled off with the chaise to a neighboring stable.

"Martha, my dear," said the locksmith, when they reached the parlor, "if you'll look to Dolly yourself, or let somebody else do it, perhaps it will be only kind and reasonable. She has been frightened, you know, and is not at all well to-night."

In fact, Dolly had thrown herself upon the sofa, quite regardless of all the little finery of which she had been so proud in the morning, and with her face buried in her hands, was crying very much.

At first sight of this phenomenon (for Dolly was by no means accustomed to displays of this sort, rather learning from her mother's example to avoid them as much as possible,) Mrs. Varden expressed her belief that never was any woman so beset as she; that her life was a continued scene of trial; that whenever she was disposed to be well and cheerful, so sure were the people around her to throw, by some means or other, a damp upon her spirits; and that, as she had enjoyed herself that day, and Heaven knew it was very seldom she did enjoy herself, so she was now to pay the penalty. To all such propositions Miggs assented freely. Poor Dolly, however, grew none the better for these restoratives but rather worse, indeed; and seeing that she was really ill, both Mrs. Varden and Miggs were moved to compassion, and tended her in earnest.

But even then, their very kindness shaped itself into their usual course of policy, and though Dolly was in a swoon, it was rendered clear to the meanest capacity, that Mrs. Varden was the sufferer. Thus, when Dolly began to get a little better, and passed into that stage in which matrons hold that remonstrance and argument may be successfully applied, her mother represented to her, with tears in her eyes, that if she had been flurried and worried that day, she must remember that it was the common lot of humanity, and in especial of womankind, who through the whole of their existence must expect no less, and were bound to make up their minds to meek endurance and patient resignation. Mrs. Varden entreated her to remember that one of these days she would, in all probability, have to do violence to her feelings so far as to be married; and that marriage, as she might see every day of her life, (and truly she did,) was a state requiring great fortitude and forbearance. She represented to her in lively colors, that if she (Mrs. V.) had not, in steering her course through this vale of tears, been supported by a strong principle of duty which alone upheld and prevented her from drooping, she must have been in her grave many years ago; in which case she desired to know what would have become of that errant spirit, (meaning the locksmith,) of whose eye she was the very apple, and in whose path she was, as it were, a shining light and a guiding star?

Miss Miggs also put in her word to the same effect. She said that indeed and indeed Miss Dolly might take pattern by her blessed mother, who, always had said, and always would say, though she were to be hanged, drawn and quartered for it the next minute, was the mildest, forgivingest, spirit, longest-sufferingest female as ever she could have believed; the mere narration of whose excellencies had worked such a wholesome change in the mind of her sister-in-law, that, whereas, before, she and her husband lived like cat and dog, and were in the habit of exchanging brass candlesticks, pot-lids, flat-irons, and other such strong resentments, they were now the happiest and affectionatest couple upon earth; as could be proved on any day on application at Golden Lion Court, number twenty-seven, second bell-handle on the right-hand post. After glancing at herself as a comparatively worthless vessel, but still as one of some desert, she besought her to bear in mind that her aforesaid dear and only mother was of a weakly constitution and excitable temperament, who had constantly to sustain afflictions in domestic life, compared with which thieves and robbers were as nothing, and yet never sunk down or gave way to despair or wrath, but, in prize-fighting phraseology, always came up to time with a cheerful countenance, and went into win as if nothing had happened. When Miggs had finished her solo, her mistress struck in again, and the two together performed a duet to the same purpose; the burden being that Mrs. Varden was persecuted perfection, and Mr. Varden, as the representative of mankind in that apartment, a creature of vicious and brutal habits, utterly insensible to the blessings he enjoyed. Of so refined a character, indeed, was their talent of assault under the mask of sympathy, that when Dolly, recovering, embraced her father tenderly, as in vindication of his goodness, Mrs. Varden expressed her solemn hope that this would be a lesson to him for the remainder of his life, and that he would do some little justice to a woman's nature ever afterwards—in which aspiration Miss Miggs, by divers sniffs and coughs, more significant than the longest oration, expressed her entire concurrence.

But the great joy of Miggs's heart was, that she not only picked up a full account of what had happened, but had the exquisite delight of conveying to Mr. Tappertit for his jealousy and torture. For that gentleman, on account of Dolly's indisposition, had been requested to take his supper in the workshop, and it was conveyed thither by Miss Miggs's own fair hands.

"Oh, Simmun!" said the young lady, "such goings on to-day! Oh, gracious me, Simmun!"

"Mr. Tappertit, who was not in the best humor, and who disliked Miss Miggs more when she laid her hand on her heart and panted for breath than at any other time, as her deficiency of outline was most apparent under such circumstances, eyed her over in his loftiest style, and deigned to express no curiosity whatever.

"I never heard the like, nor nobody else," pursued Miggs. "The idea of interfering with her. What people can see in her to make it worth their while to do so, that's the joke—he, he, he!"

Finding there was a lady in the case, Mr. Tappertit haughtily requested his fair friend to be more explicit, and demanded to know what she meant by "her."

"Why, that Dolly," said Miggs, with an extremely sharp emphasis on the name. "But, oh upon my word and honor, young Joseph Willet is a brave one; and he do deserve her, that he do."

"Woman!" said Mr. Tappertit, jumping off the counter on which he seated; "beware!"

"My stars, Simmun!" cried Miggs, in affected astonishment. "You frighten me to death! What's the matter?"

"There are strings," said Mr. Tappertit, flourishing his bread-and-cheese knife in the air, "in the human heart that had better not be vibrated. That's what's the matter."

"Oh, very well—if you're in a huff," cried Miggs, turning away.

"Huff or no huff," said Mr. Tappertit, detaining her by the wrist. "What do you mean, Jezebel? What were you going to say? Answer me!"

Notwithstanding this uncivil exhortation, Miggs gladly did as he was required; and told him how their young mistress, being alone in the meadows after dark, had been attacked by three or four tall men, who would have certainly borne her away and perhaps murdered her, but for the timely arrival of Joseph Willet, who with his own single hand put them all to flight, and rescued her; to the lasting admiration of his fellow-creatures generally, and to the eternal love and gratitude of Dolly Varden.

"Very good," said Mr. Tappertit, fetching a long breath when the tale was told, and rubbing his hair up till it stood stiff and straight on end all over his head. His days are numbered."

"Oh, Simmun!"

"I tell you," said the 'prentice, "his days are numbered. Leave me. Get along with you."

Miggs departed at his bidding, but less because of his bidding than because she desired to chackle in secret. When she had given vent to her satisfaction, she returned to the parlor; where the locksmith, stimulated by quietness and Toby, had become talkative, and was disposed to take a cheerful review of the occurrences of the day. But Mrs. Varden, whose practical religion (as is not uncommon) was usually of the retrospective order, cut him short by declaiming on the sinfulness of such junketings, and holding that it was high time to go to bed. To bed therefore she withdrew, with an aspect as grim and gloomy as that of the Maypole's own state couch; and to bed the rest of the establishment soon after repaired.

—The story of a man in New Hampshire having had an addition to his family, of five members at a birth is pronounced a hoax.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1841.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"Hope" will do, and "Love and Jealously" suit us. More from the same graceful hand will be received with pleasure.

BARNABY RUDGE.—In order to make room for the whole of the two parts of this popular work, received at a late hour by the Caledonia, we are compelled to omit a piece of Music, prepared for this number, as well as our usual variety of news, &c. We beg our readers to be patient with us for a season, as we shall be able to give them a larger quantity of reading, and a choicer variety, after our enlargement on the 1st of July.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE NEW WORLD.

We have the satisfaction to announce to the numerous readers of our paper, that, in consequence of the great success which has attended the New World from the first day of its publication to this, and on account of the recent accessions to our list of subscribers, we have determined to enlarge its dimensions, from the first of July next, BEING THE PERIOD OF THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE NEW QUARTO VOLUME.

The Quarto Volume of the New World, to commence on the first of July, will be considerably increased in size, and will contain four printed columns on each page, instead of three as heretofore. Thus each number will hereafter consist of sixteen elegantly printed pages—SIXTY-FOUR COLUMNS—one half more "matter" than the ALBION, literary journal, which is sold at Six Dollars a year, and as much as the SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, sporting journal, which is sold at Ten Dollars a year, and three times as much as the New YORK MIRROR, a journal of taste, which is sold at Five Dollars a year. The Terms of the Quarto New World will not be altered, but continue to be Three Dollars for one year, or Five Dollars for two years.

The Folio Edition will contain nine columns on each page, instead of eight.

THE EVENING SIGNAL, DAILY NEWSPAPER, AND THE EVERGREEN, MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The majority of the subscribers to the New World in the country, are probably unaware that we have, heretofore, published daily, a newspaper, entitled the EVENING SIGNAL. The editorial articles of the New World, as well as all the news, intelligence, correspondence, and short miscellanies have first appeared in the Signal—which has enjoyed, and still continues to enjoy, in the city of New-York, a handsome circulation.

But we have not failed to experience considerable difficulty from the connection of the Signal and New World. Articles, prepared for the former, have been obliged to be remodelled to be suited to the latter—and, in the press of editorial business, they have frequently been suffered to wear, in the latter, a mongrel aspect which was displeasing.

The time requisite for the due preparation of a daily paper would be so great that the New World could not fail to suffer in consequence. The question then arose, shall we not devote our energies singly and wholly to the New World? Upon this, after due meditation, we at length determined. All other considerations must yield to the good of the "New World." If we can devote ourselves exclusively to that, it cannot fail to be greatly improved. In the city it will be much more highly prized: the "matter" will all wear the charm of novelty and originality. In the country, our subscribers will soon discover a more exclusive spirit and a superior care, and they cannot fail to be gratified with the thought that they are reading articles which have never been published or seen before, and are as new to them as to all others. Accordingly—although the Evening Signal is doing well, and extending its circulation—we have concluded to forego its publication after the present week. We have disposed of its list of subscribers to the New-York Tribune, a daily paper of similar character edited by Horace Greeley, Esq., long and favorably known to the New-York public. There will not, however, be the remotest alliance between his paper and the New World; and the New World will contain not one line, except what was expressly and especially prepared for its columns.

THE EVERGREEN, a monthly magazine, containing sometimes the choicest articles of the New World, as well as the continued stories, Old Saint Paul's and George Saint Julian, will not be published by us after the June number. Its subscribers will be supplied during the remainder of the present year with ROBERTS'S SEMI-MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In transferring the list of subscriptions to Mr. Roberts, of Boston, we have felt that we were doing no disfavor, since his periodical is a much handsomer one than the Evergreen, and publishes nearly the same continued stories.

The arrangements thus announced have not been made in any manner except from choice, and a settled conviction that the New World would receive great advantages from commanding the exclusive services of both Publisher and Editor.

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.

The steam-ship Caledonia arrived at Boston on Wednesday morning, in fourteen days and a half from Liverpool. The following letter from our London correspondent gives all the intelligence of importance :

From our Foreign Correspondent.

LONDON, May 1, 1841.

The President steamer is still missing, and nearly all hope of her safety is now extinguished. It is possible, certainly, that she may yet be afloat, but there is but little reasonable probability that she could be so, and yet be out till this time—50 days—unseen and unheard of. Her fate will perhaps remain a melancholy mystery.

Capt. Roberts, as in duty bound, did his best during the late trip to inspire confidence in this unfortunate vessel, and I have no doubt he believed all he said. Poor fellow!—We can but hope against hope, that the catastrophe has not been so fearful as there is now too much reason to suppose. The dates from Bermuda are to the 1st of April, when the President had been out 20 days; from the Azores much later; and the only thread of a chance left is that she might have missed Bermuda and reached Antigua, or some West India island, or is yet at sea disabled. Her fate is yet the topic of interest and anxiety here. I do not know personally any of the passengers. Lord William Lenox, son of the Duke of Richmond, Mr. Power, the comedian, and Rev. G. C. Cookman, late chaplain to the Senate, are, as you know, among them.

The British Queen arrived on the 28th, with the distressing news of the death of President Harrison. Mr. Stevenson has invited Americans in London to his house to-day, in reference to this unexpected event.

It is a little singular that the President steamer should have reached New York the same day that our late President arrived at Washington to assume his office—and now they are both among things that have been.

POLITICAL.—Two occurrences this week have occasioned some little excitement: First, the defeat of Ministers on the Irish-Registration-of-Voters-Bill, (based on the £5 franchise,) by a vote of 300 to 289. This result was of course considered a sufficient reason for the resignation of the Melbourne Ministry, which has now held office six years or more. They are, however, decidedly tenacious in their attachment to the loaves and fishes—and while the Tories were in high glee with their supposed chance of getting the helm once more, the wily little Lord John suddenly astonished them last evening by a notice of his intention of a motion for considering the duties on Corn—another words, declaring the Abolition of the Corn Laws a Cabinet question. This bold movement was loudly cheered by the liberals, and will doubtless be warmly responded to by the people. The Tories were not a little vexed at what they termed, justly, perhaps, a last resort of Ministers in behalf of their places.

Mr. Baring also brought in his "Budget," estimating the expenses of the year at 50 millions, and the revenue at £18,000,000, leaving a deficiency of £1,800,000, which he said no half-way measures would meet. He therefore proposed to raise the wind on Timber, Sugar and Corn, thus:

I. To raise the duty on Canada lumber from 10s. to 20s. and reduce that on Baltic timber from 5s. to 50s. still leaving a protective duty of 300 per cent., by which he would gain £600,000.

II. To leave the duty on Colonial sugars as it is, 24s. per cwt—but reduce the duty on foreign sugars from 63s. to 36s.—estimated gain to revenue £900,000.

III. The balance to be expected by a change in the Corn Laws to a moderate fixed duty. This budget is said to have been got up after the late defeat and for political purposes. The bullion in the Bank of England on the 27th, was £4,638,000, being more than at any time for two years. Consols closed to-day at 90 1/8. The Budget produced a favorable effect at the Stock-Exchange.

ODDS AND ENDS.—A fire at the Great Western Depot at Bristol, on the 28th, destroyed £100,000 worth of timber.—St. George's Hotel, Albemarle street, London, was burnt last night.—Sir George Arthur is to be rewarded for his "eminent services in Canada," by a Baronetcy.—A shocking tragedy was acted at Liverpool this week: a Mr. Jenner, (lately a respectable Cotton-broker, but now in reduced circumstances,) in a fit of despondency or insanity, shot his wife and one of his sons.—The Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Carr, died this week.—Sir John Hervey has been appointed Governor of Newfoundland.—The Lord Chancellor has announced that he shall bring in a bill to abolish the privilege of Peers in cases of felony.

The London "Season" is now in its prime—the Queen having "opened it in person" by a drawing-room and a couple of levees—thereby requiring the appearance in town of all liege subjects of Queen Fashion and herself. The weather for a fortnight has been delightful—clear and soft as July—indeed I verily believe the sun was to be seen 12 consecutive hours—which is a phenomenon in these parts.

All sorts of exhibitions and amusements are in vogue—such as four or five galleries of pictures—the British Institution with a rich collection of choice works of modern artists, loaned by the owners for the season—two galleries of paintings in water colors, very pretty and attractive—the royal Academy—and Dioramas, Panoramas, Kineoramas, without number, indicated by "walking sandwiches," or hand-bills, hung fore and aft—divers men, who go to and fro in the earth diffusing useful knowledge of the sublime, beautiful and ridiculous—so that he who runs may read—and he who reads may be persuaded to spend a shilling in witnessing "the most wonderful curiosity in all London."

FRANCE.

The fortifications of Paris are to be proceeded with loute suite—10,000 men being employed at once, at all points. The Budget shows a deficiency of 170,000,000 of francs for 1840—242,000,000 for 1841—114,000,000 for 1842; besides 534,000,000 required for extraordinary works.

Great preparations were making for the public baptism of the Count of Paris at Notre Dame on the 2d of May, when the Royal family, foreign ministers, &c. were to be present. The fêtes, illuminations, &c. were to continue till the 4th. A grand ball is to be given at the Louvre, for which 7,500 tickets have been issued.

There is nothing new from the Continent—except a change in the Turkish Ministry, which I suppose will not have much effect upon the world at large.

From our own Correspondents.

WASHINGTON, May 15, 1841.

Yesterday was very solemnly observed, according to the recommendation of the President, as a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, by the different religious denominations of our city. All business was suspended in the Public Offices, and by the citizens without distinction of party, and the quiet of the Sabbath prevailed in the streets and markets. The ceremonies at St. John's Church, in which the departed President worshipped, were peculiarly imposing. The church was hung with black drapery throughout, and the pew in which Gen. Harrison used to sit was shrouded with crape. No one has ever entered it since his death; and on this occasion it remained empty, though the body of the church, aisles and galleries were crowded to overflowing. The vacant seat spoke touchingly to the heart of the spectators, of him who was reposing in the narrow tomb, and of those whom he loved, now desolate and sorrowing for his loss, at a distance from the scenes of their late splendor and joy. PRESIDENT TYLER and his family were present, besides the Heads of Departments, Generals Scott, Jesup, Macomb, and other distinguished officers, Military, Naval, and Civil, and many eminent citizens. The Episcopal Bishop of Maryland preached a most beautiful and classical sermon appropriate to the occasion. In the afternoon the Volunteer Military Companies of the District marched in a body to the Unitarian Church, bearing their banners in mourning; but without arms or music, where a most eloquent discourse was delivered to them by the Rev. Mr. Bullfinch. In the evening the religious services usual on the Sabbath were solemnized in the different churches. The day and the ordinances have made a powerful impression on the religious community. May the prayers of a united people be answered by renewed blessings on our beloved country!

WASHINGTON, May 17, 1841.

We have all around us here indications that a session of Congress is approaching. The dull and dingy hotels have put on something like a fresher look. The boarding-houses, which, with few exceptions, are exceedingly shabby, seem to be a little renovated; and all is ready for the crowd of M. C's and visitors who are expected soon to make their appearance. The journals in the interior bring us, by every mail, intelligence that the Hon. Mr. Suck-a-onk has left home for the seat of Government; and two or three members drop in almost every day by the steamboats from the South, or the cars from the North.

The Twenty-Seventh Congress meets this day fortnight. The session will probably be more exciting, important and interesting, in every respect, than any that has been held since the last war.

The President is busily engaged on his Message, in which he will present a comprehensive view of the affairs of each Executive Department, leaving to his Secretaries the task of giving the details. The heads of Departments are industriously pushing investigations, both for their own satisfaction, and in order to be ready for the calls of Congress.

TOMB OF GEN. HARRISON.—By the following paragraph, copied from the Shelby, (Ky.) News of the 5th ult., it will be seen that those with whom the decision of the question properly rests, have decided that the remains of Harrison, are to find their permanent resting place on the bank of the Ohio river, at North Bend.

We learn from Col. Todd, that on his way to his residence in this county last week, he, in performance of a sacred duty, called upon the venerable Widow of our lamented deceased President. Whilst there, he was invited by that lady to a consultation with herself and her only remaining son, as to the ultimate depository of the remains of her distinguished beloved husband,—the Great and Good President. It was determined, at this consultation, to remove the remains immediately to North Bend, to be deposited upon a beautiful and elevated natural mound where the monument may be seen several miles up and down the Ohio river. * * * There the traveller of distant ages, will be refreshed by a visit to the tomb of the Warrior, who was never defeated, of the Patriot who died poor; and of the Statesman, who from the proud height of President, "fell, like a star struck from its sphere, covered with glory and renown."

NEW-YORK CANAL TOLLS.—There was received for tolls on all the canals in the State, during the last week in April ..... $91,244 37
And the first week in May ..... 98,472 99

Total..... $159,717 36
There was received during the same period in 1840..... 137,152 23

Excess in favor of 1841..... $22,565 13

How gloriously the Canals are vindicating the cause of Improvement and policy of the Administration! In despite of the efforts of the Destructives, they are filling our cities with abundance and fortifying our Treasury with revenue. With three days less of navigation up to the close of the first week in May than we had in 1840, the Canals have given us $22,565 13 more tolls! We may look, therefore, for more than $2,000,000 as the result of the present season of Canal Navigation.—[Alb. Eve. Jour.]

THE CASE OF MCLEOD.—The case of Alexander McLeod has been before the Supreme Court, which is now sitting in this city, for several days past, and at the time of our going to press had not been terminated.

Mr. Joshua A. Spencer and Mr. Bradley appeared as counsel for the prisoner, and the Attorney General (Mr. Willis Hall) and Mr. Woods, attorney for Niagara county, appeared on behalf of the people.

We have not space to enter upon various points raised by the counsel, which were discussed at much length and with great ability; it will be sufficient to give the opinion of the Court, which will probably be delivered in time for our next paper.

MITCHELL THE FORGER.—The ex-honorable Charles F. Mitchell arrived in this city on Monday evening, in custody of officer Bowyer of the police, and is now lodged in safe keeping. Gov. Seward, having been applied to for the purpose, made a respectful requisition upon the Canadian authorities for the delivery of the forger, which was promptly complied with. Mr. Bowyer left Montreal on Saturday, having Mitchell in irons, and accompanied by Capt. Cormeau, of the Montreal police. Capt. C. accompanied them to the American waters, where he formally surrendered the prisoner.

THE STEAMER PRESIDENT.—To the disappointment (though probably not to the surprise) of all who are anxious about the fate of this vessel, the Caledonia brings no intelligence of her arrival; and this fact may be regarded as nearly decisive. On the day that the Caledonia sailed the President had been out fifty-six days; of course, her safety is a thing almost out of the question.

SLAVERS CAPTURED.—A letter received here yesterday from H. Cartell, Esq., U. S. Consul at St. Helena, dated March 26th, 1841, states that five Portuguese slaves had just been brought in at St. Helena, having been captured on the West Coast of Africa by the British naval force on that station, with upwards of one thousand slaves on board. The slaves had been landed at St. Helena, and remained of course subject to the orders of the British Government.—[New Bedford Mercury.]

FROM FLORIDA.—Authentic information has been received that about two hundred Indians have been shipped from Tampa Bay for Arkansas, of whom fifty are warriors, making the total number during the year about four hundred and twenty, of whom one hundred and twenty-one are warriors.

☞ Patrick H. Pope, formerly member of Congress from Kentucky, died at Louisville on the 5th inst., aged 32.

CHARLES O'MALLEY,
THE IRISH DRAGOON.

BY HARRY LORREQUER.

This "extra" number of the Quarto edition of the New World is issued and presented to all of our subscribers, for the purpose of publishing the first chapters of the second volume of "Charles O'Malley." Subsequent chapters will appear in our regular editions of the New World, both Folio and Quarto, not as they come out from month to month in the Dublin University Magazine, but considerably in advance of the receipt of that Magazine in this country. Arrangements have been made with Curry & Co. of Dublin, publishers, so that they will forward to us advance proof-sheets of every new number. We shall thus be enabled to anticipate all other publications of this admirable series of humorous papers in this country. It is hoped that our subscribers will discover in this a new proof of our desire to contribute to their gratification.

No apology is due for thus commencing a publication, as it were, in the middle of a story. The previous numbers have been issued and universally read in a volume published by Carey and Hart, of Philadelphia—from whom and from all booksellers, it may be obtained for a moderate sum by those into whose hands the present "extra" number may fall. Moreover, there is little or no continuity in the series—no consequential interest; one number does not depend upon that by which it is preceded, but each may be read separately with scarcely any less pleasure than if it were taken up in continuation. The first volume consists, for the most part, of distinct stories and adventures, related by the characters introduced into the work. These have been already largely republished in newspapers throughout the United States, and have excited a universal wish to peruse all the rest which may appear.

It may, perhaps, be necessary to record—for such as have not met with the preceding volume and may not wish to delay a perusal of the present—that Charles O'Malley, the hero, is a young scion of an ancient though decayed family in Ireland. He enlisted in a regiment of Dragoons in the army of Great Britain, went over to the Continent, and was engaged in several of the famous battles fought under Sir Arthur Wellesley, the present Duke of Wellington. A recountal of his adventures and those of his companions in arms forms the staple of the work. A brief mention of the personages, who have been introduced and who may figure hereafter will be quite sufficient for the intelligent reader.

Michael Free, or "Mike," as he is called, is the body servant of Charles O'Malley, "a fellow of excellent wit," full of Irish blunders, Irish wit, Irish humors and Irish exaggerations. He always accompanies his master and clings to him with the tenacity of a retainer of the merry feudal times.
